d THE death of the queen of Spain, after an illness of three days, on the 12th of February, made a great change in the face of affairs, more especially as the French gave out very positively, that she died of poison^b. A modern writer^c, after citing the memoirs of a person of distinction, in which it is asserted, that Louis XIV. affirmed so much at supper, treats it as a fable; but this is certain, that it was believed at the time, and that it was expected the French court would have published a manifesto upon it. However, she was buried with little ceremony, and, which was thought extraordinary, her household kept up; but the reason quickly appeared; for, in the space of about two months, the king's marriage was declared with the princess Mary Anne, daughter to the elector palatine, and, on the 15th of June following, he espoused her by proxy^d. There were two powerful motives to this marriage, first, that she was sister to the reigning empress and the queen of Portugal; the other, that she was young, handsome, and of a family remarkable for their fertility; to which we may add, that the match was agreeable to the queen mother, who now governed all. The marquis de Ribaynac pressed the king, in the name of his most Christian majesty, to declare what part he would take; upon which the king proposed a neutrality, which the marquis told him his master would not accept, and soon after the French declared war. That declaration was answered by the marquis de Gastanaga in very strong terms: and both in Spain and in the Low Countries all commerce was prohibited, and, by the catholic king's order, all French effects were seized^e. The duke de Noailles took the field early on the side of Roussillon, and made himself master of the town and castle of Campredon; but the duke de Villabermosa, who commanded in Catalonia, marched against him with a superior army, invested his new conquest, into which the French had put a strong garrison, and, with some difficulty the duke de Noailles disengaged them, and blew up the place, but not without considerable loss. The Spaniards continued to press the enemy all the rest of the campaign and levied great contributions in Roussillon, so that on this side they were clearly victorious. In Flanders the French proposed to take three or four of the best places the king of Spain had left; but the Dutch and Brandenburgh troops coming early to the assistance of the marquis of Gastanaga, preserved them all; and marshal Humières having received a severe check from prince Waldeck at Valcourt, on the 20th of August, the rest of the campaign was not very fertile in events *. In Barbary his catholic majesty was less fortunate ; for the famous Muley Ishmael, emperor of Morocco, having invested Larache, took it, after a long and obstinate siege, notwithstanding it was very gallantly defended by a garrison of one thousand men, and, being carried by storm, a great part of them were cut to pieces † ; the rest, who retired to the castle, were obliged to surrender at discretion, and mouldered away in dungeons, that barbarous prince refusing to ransom them, though he sent over a minister to Spain, under colour of treating on this subject, who concluded a convention, which the emperor immediately disavowed.

Consequences attending this marriage, and the events of the second campaign.

WE have before mentioned the insurrection in Catalonia against the marquis de Leganez, and the complaisance of the king in recalling that nobleman. This, it seems, had a bad effect ; for the peasants, pretending that their privileges were violated by quartering troops amongst them, tho' for their own protection, assembled in great multitudes, and attempted to seize the duke of Villabermosa, who quickly disengaged himself, and obliged them to retire to the mountains nearest Barcelona. There, in a sudden fit of repentance, they cut off the head of one of their chiefs, and sent it to the duke, promising the utmost submission for the future ; upon which he immediately proclaimed a general pardon. But this was only to gain time, and to amuse ; for, having received assurances of succours from France, they took up arms again, and made a powerful diversion in favour of the enemy ‡. The new queen made her public entry into Madrid on the 22d of June, with great magnificence ; she brought with her her brother, the grand master of the Teutonic order, and several other persons of distinction. The king, to shew his great affection for her, created count Mansfield, who went into Germany to conclude the marriage, and to bring her into Spain, prince of Fondi, in the kingdom of Naples ; and the queen mother expressed the same fondness for her as if she had been her own daughter *. The new pope, Alexander VIII. exhorted the king to peace ; which gave him an opportunity of publishing one of the best penned answers that ever came from the court of Madrid, in which all the violences committed by Louis XIV. were strongly tho' succinctly set forth ; and in which it is observed, that as there was not a single power in Europe, his holiness not excepted, whom at some time or other he had not injured, oppressed, and insulted, it was therefore become necessary, for the peace and safety of Christendom, to weaken an exorbitant power, which was the continual instrument of pride and ambition ; so that this war was not only to be considered as just and necessary, till that purpose was answered, but perfectly consistent with the duties of Christian princes, bound to protect their subjects against a prince, whom no considerations of justice or humanity could restrain, and who had so often and so notoriously violated the most solemn treaties †. In consequence of these maxims, he concluded a treaty with the duke of Savoy, in pursuance of which that prince entered into the general alliance ‡. The campaign in Catalonia had been still a better commentary upon his catholic majesty's manifesto, if the disturbances before mentioned had not hindered the duke of Villabermosa from taking the field so early as otherwise he would have done ; but when he was at last able to act against the French, he compelled the duke of Noailles to retire, and would have forced him to a battle, if that cautious officer had not exerted his utmost skill to prevent it. However, the Spanish fleet made a descent on the coast, and burnt all the country about Perpignan. In Flanders, notwithstanding the loss of the battle of Flerus, the Spaniards were no great sufferers ; and France saw with regret, that she was no longer able to make those terrible impressions which had rendered her so formidable to her neighbours but a few years before. The Moors threatened much this year, which obliged the Spaniards to send such timely succours, that, after a few faint attempts, the infidels quitted the field §.

Count Oropeza disgraced, on account of the new regulations in the finances.

AT a season when the Spaniards were so much distressed for money, that no better method could be devised for the present than laying open the necessities of the public to the grandees, and depending on their public spirit to do for the crown what the crown was unable to do for itself, the galleons arrived safely at Cadiz with thirty millions on board. This had a very happy effect, and enabled his majesty to make remittances into Italy and the Low Countries, where all things suffered grievously for want of the stipulated supplies. The marquis de Leganez was sent governor general into the duchy of Milan, where he found things in great disorder, which, with much vigilance and activity, he laboured to repair *. The duke de Medina Celi, upon whom the king always relied, deceased, after a long illness ; and the count de Oropeza, who succeeded when the duke was obliged to resign his office of prime minister, was so much a and so generally hated, that the king was obliged to part with him. In the month of September his majesty was so dangerously ill, that all Spain expected his death, and could hardly be persuaded that it was possible for him to recover. It was upon this illness that the world began freely to canvass the succession; and that some proposed sending for the young archduke, and giving him the title of presumptive successor; while others insinuated, that perhaps a good peace might be made by adopting the second son of the dauphin, who, as they understood it, had the better title of the two. The king's recovery put an end for the present to these intrigues; till the queen's falling more dangerously ill introduced some of another kind. However, contrary even to the sentiments of the physicians, she likewise recovered ^f.

b IN relation to the progress of the war, the coasts of Spain suffered extremely from the French ^{the third campaign in Flanders, more particularly unfortunate to Spain.} fleet commanded by marshal d'Etrees, which first bombarded Barcelona; and, after ruining part of that fine city, did still more mischief at Alicant. This incensed the people to such a degree, that they plundered, and were with difficulty hindered from murdering, all the French settled amongst them. The duke de Medina Sidonia was sent viceroy into Catalonia, merely to please the people. He managed the war but very indifferently, though he had a better army than his predecessor. Marshal Noailles took Urgel, and made incursions into the kingdom of Arragon. The Spanish duke, having superior forces, marched towards him, as if he would give him battle; but afterwards amused himself with besieging a place of no great consequence, and that in so strange a manner, as induced count Pignatelli, who commanded under him, to retire with the best part of the army to Barcelona; this forced the c duke to follow him, and both parties appealed in justification of their conduct to the court of Spain, which had no great reason to be satisfied with either ^e. In Flanders, Mons was taken on the 9th of April, after a short siege, in the sight, as the French were pleased to say, and to the terror, of all Europe; but it is certain, with so much amazement to the Spanish court, that the ministers would have been willing, if they had thought it practicable, to conceal it from the king. His knowledge of it, however, had a very good effect, for he resolved immediately to perform what had been more than once under consideration, the detaching in some measure from the crown these distant dominions. Accordingly, at the close of the year, letters patents were dispatched, declaring his serene highness the elector of Bavaria hereditary governor of the Low Countries, with incomparably higher powers than d had been granted to the archduke Leopold, or to Don Juan of Austria, with a promise of a punctual subsidy of 75,000 pieces of eight per month. This measure is by some ascribed entirely to the influence of king William's councils; whereas others affirm that it had been stipulated some years before, upon the elector's marriage with the king's niece. It is not improbable that both may be true; and that, after so long a delay, his catholic majesty was at length determined to this step by the representations of king William, who knew by experience the great difficulty, or rather impossibility, of concerting proper measures for the defence of countries of such consequence to the maritime powers, with governors seldom continued above three years, generally intent upon making their private fortunes, and who could do nothing of moment till they received orders from Madrid ^h, where they were not always the best judges e of things at such a distance.

As the former, so this year, opened with a most agreeable and seasonable supply, the gal- ^{Things go pretty equally on both sides in the fourth.} leons returning from America with forty-eight millions on board, of which the king had four by way of indulto, which enabled him to send very large sums into the Low Countries and Italy; but his finances, notwithstanding, were in great disorder, and therefore a new junta was appointed to bring them under proper regulations, at the head of which was the count de Monterey. One of their first resolutions was to examine into the conduct of such as had been formerly trusted; and, that it might appear they were in earnest, the marquis de Gastanaga no sooner arrived in Spain, than he was sent prisoner to the castle of Burgos, with a note of the immense sums he had received, and an intimation that he must give an exact account of what was become f of them ⁱ. The queen dowager of England, passing through Spain into her native country of Portugal, was complimented by a person of distinction on the part of his catholic majesty at Valladolid. The Spanish fleet, under the command of admiral Papachin, sailed to Genoa, which induced that republic to act for the service of the emperor, and the rest of the allies; and the same fleet was very serviceable afterwards to the duke of Savoy, in his glorious campaign against the French. The marquis de Conflans was appointed viceroy of Catalonia; but it was so late in the year before he arrived, that the duke commanded the Spanish army, which however did nothing very considerable. On the other hand, marshal Noailles, being obliged to make a great detachment to reinforce the army employed against the duke of Savoy, was not in a condition to do much. As for the French fleet under marshal d'Etrees, it was so roughly handled by the elements, that, though it appeared before Malaga, and threatened a bombardment, yet after exchanging some civilities, such as releasing prisoners on one side, and receiving provisions on the other, it quitted the coast. In Flanders, the loss of the important city and fortrefs of Namur, after a month's siege, and the defeat at Steenkirk, could not but chagrin the court, which however was in some measure consoled by certain applications, that plainly shewed that France was not only disposed to make, but was even desirous of purchasing a peace; an inclination she had never discovered before¹.

Two parties

as to the succession.

THE pains taken by his catholic majesty and his ministers in regulating the finances had a very good effect, and brought the ordinary expences of the government into a proper method; but the unforeseen emergencies of the war threw them, notwithstanding, into such distress, as might easily have undone all they had been doing, if, upon mature deliberation, they had not taken the same measure they took before of engaging the public to relieve itself. The great councils paid each a certain sum, the grandees and officers of the court did the like; their examples were followed by the cities and great towns, so that a very large sum was levied for once. In order to remedy the state of their military affairs, and that they might have troops when and where-ever they were wanted, the king appointed four lieutenant-generals to have the superintendence in that respect of all Spain. These were quickly reduced to three; for the count de Monterey, who was of the number, desired to be excused; and soon after he refused a civil employment of great consequence, which was then ascribed to discontent, but it appeared afterwards that he meditated a retreat from the world, which he executed, and went into orders. The marquis de Gastanaga made a very good precedent for subsequent governors, since, after the strict examination, he administered the affairs of the Low Countries with great integrity and honour, so that, in approbation of his conduct, as well as in reward for his services, he was made viceroy of Catalonia; but he refusing that employment, it was bestowed on the marquis of Villena. The rumour of the queen's being with child excited for some time a general joy throughout the nation, which gradually sunk when it was known to be a mistake, and, upon this, the intrigues to engage his catholic majesty to settle the succession were renewed with greater vigour than ever^m. The queen mother, and the count de Oropesa, who still retained no small credit with his master, were vigorous in the support of the electoral prince of Bavaria; but the cardinals Portocarrero and Cordova, Don Juan Henriques de Cabrera, the count de Aguilar, the marquis de Villafranca, and other great politicians, declared in favour of the archduke Charles, the emperor's second son; and at this time his interest seemed to be the best of the two, though it was a chapter not very pleasing to the monarch, whose will was to settle the right of these contending princes, and, except count Lobkowitz the imperial minister, none of the ambassadors of the allies could be brought to interfereⁿ, as apprehending it equally unpleasant and indecent.

Spain and her new allies have the worst almost on every side in the fifth campaign.

MARSHAL Tourville, with the French fleet, hovered upon the coast of Spain, which filled the court with apprehensions either of a descent or a bombardment; at length he appeared before Roses in Catalonia about the beginning of June, and the place was at the same time invested by land, the French army being commanded by marshal Noailles. Their operations were commenced by a bombardment, in which the governor being dangerously wounded, the place capitulated on the 9th, and it was upon this misfortune that the ministers demanded a free gift^o. The marshal de Tourville, towards the latter end of the same month, surprised the Smyrna fleet, destroyed four men of war, and either took, sunk, or burnt, 80 English and Dutch ships richly laden. This action happened between Lagos and Cadiz; but the enemy pursued the ships into the Spanish ports, and burnt many of them under the guns of their fortresses^p. The rest of the campaign in Catalonia was spent in marches and countermarches; the duke de Medina Sidonia commanding the Spanish army, as the marquis de Villena was not sent thither till towards the close of the year. The Spanish fleet remained this summer on the coast of Italy; and his catholic majesty applied to the maritime powers to send a naval force sufficient to cover his dominions the next year, in pursuance of a treaty made with the crown of Great Britain two years before^q. As to the military operations in Flanders, they were far enough from being successful. Furnes and Dixmude were taken at the very beginning of the campaign. Marshal Luxemburgh had the advantage in the battle of Nerwind, fought on the 29th of July, in which some Spanish volunteers of distinction were killed. But the most mortifying stroke was the loss of Charleroi, defended by the Marquis of Castillo, with a garrison of four thousand five hundred men, after twenty-seven days open trenches. The army of France was commanded by a marshal Villeroi, and was covered by another army under the command of marshal Luxembourg. The attacks were directed by Monsieur Vauban, who had fortified the place, and was therefore supposed to be best acquainted with it, yet, by an unaccountable mistake, he attacked it where it was strongest. After all these misfortunes, the pope's nuncio insinuated at Madrid his most Christian majesty's inclination to peace, which was rejected with great firmness, as overtures of the like kind were by the rest of the allies^r.

His catholic majesty having received from his allies an account of the propositions made to them on the part of France, in which there were some insinuations in regard to settling the succession of his dominions, he thought fit to write a letter, dated the 23d of January, to the states general, in which he assured them of his resolution to carry on the war, mentioned his having taken notice of those insinuations, and considered them with horror and execrations, adding, that he hoped Heaven, in compliance with the fervent prayers of his subjects, would yet grant him a successor^s. The galleons arrived this year with sixteen millions, of which the king had but a small share. The junta for reforming the management of the finances had recourse to many expedients, and yet were not able to furnish the subsidies that had been promised to the duke of Savoy and the elector of Bavaria. The scarcity of men also was almost as great as that of money; and the factions that reigned at court, where those who opposed the French interest were divided among themselves, did not a little contribute to distract their measures, and to frustrate some of their best-concerted undertakings. It was owing to these that the marquis de Villena, and duke of Escalona, one of the wisest and worthiest men in Spain, could not assemble above sixteen thousand men in Catalonia, and part of these raw troops, though he had been assured they would enable him to take the field early, and with an army superior to that of the enemy. His presence was acceptable to the people; the ministers knew it, and hoped they would assist him; notwithstanding which, they did what was in their power; but, all things taken together, he had not above half of what was really requisite for him to defend the province committed to his charge. This was notwithstanding the point most attended to, and we may conceive from thence what became of the rest^t, and how easily miscarriages in Spain might be accounted for.

THE French king and his ministers, who, for many reasons, but more especially that they might dissolve the grand alliance, were become very desirous of peace, believed that nothing could contribute to it so much as pushing the Spaniards in Catalonia: for this reason marshal Tourville was sent with a fleet in the spring upon that coast; and marshal Noailles, with 30,000 men, entered the Spanish frontiers in the beginning of May. The duke of Escalona endeavoured to defend the banks of the river Ter, tho' it was fordable in many places; he performed this as well as it was possible, but the duke of Noailles forced the passage on the 22d of May, after an obstinate resistance, in which the Spaniards lost about 2000 men. He afterwards took Palamos, with the assistance of the fleet, and then besieged Gironne. The place was strong, and had a good garrison, but very unluckily composed of new troops, who deserted the works, and obliged the governor to capitulate in less than a week. The marshal afterwards made himself master of Ostelrich, upon which the duke of Escalona threw himself into Barcelona^u. When the campaign was over, the king prevailed upon the marquis de Gastanaga to accept of that government. The fleet of the allies, under the command of admiral Russel, came, as the king desired, into the Mediterranean, and continued there the whole year, with which he was so pleased, that he sent a jewel to the admiral valued at fourscore thousand crowns. The Moors besieged Ceuta and Melilla, but without effect. The campaign in Flanders was barren of events. Huy and Dixmude were retaken by the allies; and, if they were no gainers, the Spaniards had however the satisfaction of losing nothing, and of seeing France more and more oppressed by the length and weight of the war^w; to which a kind of famine, which prevailed in that kingdom, did not a little contribute.

As the junta for the improvement of the finances, which the Spaniards as well as we called the junta or committee of ways and means, had daily more and more success, a resolution was taken of bringing over a body of German and Italian troops, to augment the forces in Catalonia; which however had been impracticable, but for the assistance of the fleet of the allies, by whom it was executed without any difficulty. The death of queen Mary of England was esteemed so great a misfortune, that the court of Spain not only went into deep mourning, but directed their ministers in all foreign courts to do the same^x. Their catholic majesties were both indisposed this year, and, as had fallen out more than once before, the queen's illness was very industriously ascribed to a miscarriage, which perhaps she never had^y. In Catalonia the marquis de Gastanaga did wonders; for, instead of keeping the field with the regular troops, he applied himself with indefatigable diligence to discipline the militia and the peasants; and, as the French had fortified and put garrisons into many places, he contrived sometimes to block up one, sometimes another, chiefly with a view to cut off the convoys and detachments sent to relieve them, in which he was very successful. The French viceroy (for marshal Noailles had that title), being much indisposed, quitted his employment, in which he was replaced by the duke of Vendosme, who turned this method of making war upon the Spaniards, by demolishing and abandoning most of those small places, and harrassing the troops of the count of Gastanaga, sent to repair them; but, upon the whole, the Spaniards were gainers by this campaign². In Italy, with the assistance of Spanish troops and money, the duke of Savoy reduced Casal; the fortifications of which being demolished, the town was restored to its natural sovereign, the duke of *Mantua*³. In Flanders, marshal Villeroy bombarded Brussels the 13th, 14th, and 15th, of August, during which he threw several thousand bombs and red-hot bullets into the place, by which he did a great deal of mischief, but at the same time excited an implacable hatred to the French, and brought upon himself the imputation of having done it in a fit of despair. Namur surrendered on the fourth of August, and the citadel on the second of September, notwithstanding Villeroi had threatened to fight the army of the allies commanded by king William, which he durst not perform. These successes on every side raised the spirits of the Spanish ministers, and confirmed them in their inclinations to carry on the war⁴.

THE supplies from the Indies not arriving, the ministers found themselves exceedingly distressed for money, which induced them to put a tax, or rather a fine, upon all the lucrative governments, which proved a good expedient, tho' attended with ill consequences. The death of the queen mother on the 16th of May produced no great alterations at court, as it had been long expected. Her disease was a cancer of many years continuance; and, as she had been long in a dying condition, she had in a manner outlived her credit⁵. It was not, however, till after her decease that the count de Oropeza came publicly to court, and was again admitted into the king's councils. In the month of September their catholic majesties were both very much indisposed, and it was some time before the king found himself well enough to appear in public, which occasioned a general consternation through his dominions, and great distraction in his councils, more especially since at this time there was nothing regulated as to the succession⁶. The Moors had lain two years before Ceuta, with a numerous army; it was first defended by the marquis de Valparaiso, with invincible courage, and afterwards with indefatigable diligence by the marquis de Avallaneda, who was sent to relieve it; so that, after losing 15,000 men, and being in the field twenty-five months, the infidels abandoned their design. The marquis de Gastanaga, finding it impracticable to struggle with the difficulties to which his post was exposed, and the haughty temper of the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who commanded the German troops, resigned his viceroyalty, and was succeeded by Don Francisco de Velasco. The duke de Vendosme, who had the title of viceroy from the king of France, gained some advantage over the prince of Hesse; and, except a dispute at the beginning, there happened nothing of consequence during this campaign, the duke's army being but weak⁷. In Italy things took a very ill turn; for the duke of Savoy, who had renewed his treaty with the allies but the year before, and demanded extraordinary succours in men and money, to protect his capital from being besieged by the French, acted therein but a delusive part, as having made a secret treaty with France. At length having separated the foreign auxiliaries into different posts, he declared for a neutrality in Italy; and, as the Spaniards did not readily embrace it, he put himself at the head of the French army, and besieged Valenza, which, thro' the care of the marquis de Leganez, was in a good state of defence. However, as the courts of Vienna and Madrid found it impossible to regain him, tho' they offered the duchy of Milan in property, and were also apprised that most of the Italian powers approved his measures, they were obliged to comply, and accept a neutrality likewise⁸. In Flanders, tho' the French and the allies had great armies, and though the latter were commanded by king William and the elector of Bavaria in person, yet in effect there was little or nothing done, no battle fought, no place so much as besieged; but, towards the end of the year, plenipotentiaries were appointed, and a place settled for a congress, which seemed to explain the inactivity of the preceding campaign⁹.

- a In Spain the winters are generally sharp, and yet a very hard winter is a rare thing. This proved so severe, that his catholic majesty diverted himself with seeing some Dutch sailors skate upon the ice at Madrid. The want of money, and the necessity of finding it, being equally great, the ministers had once more recourse to a free gift, to which some of the grandees, when they had given what they could afford; added the profit of their offices, which they sold for the public benefit. In the mean time arrived the galleons with thirty millions, out of which the king's share was not much, and the demands from Catalonia were very high. ^h Lewis XIV. finding that he could easily compromise matters with the maritime powers, offered, in complaisance to the Spaniards, a neutrality in Catalonia, which they absolutely rejected. Upon this, the army of the prince of Hesse Darmstadt was very considerably augmented, ^{A. D. 1697:} the fortifications of Barcelona repaired, and directions given for a fleet. But while they were executing in the Spanish way, that is, very slowly, the duke of Noailles took the field with a numerous army, attended with a fine train of artillery, and directed his march immediately towards that city. At the same time the count d'Etrees and the bailiff de Noailles appeared upon the coast, one with a large fleet, and the other with a strong squadron of gallies, so that the place was quickly invested by land and by sea, though not completely, for the prince of Hesse, who had thrown himself into it with the best part of the infantry, had still a communication with the viceroy, who, with between six and seven thousand horse, foot, and dragoons, were encamped behind him. The siege was long and bloody, more especially the action by which the duke of Vendosme cut off the communication between the army and the town.
- b At length, however, after fifty-two days open trenches, the capitulation was signed on the 10th of *August*¹. In Flanders the important fortress of Ath was taken by the marshal Catinat, which, with the news of the loss of Carthage in the West Indies, besieged, reduced, and plundered, by the sieur Pontis, and ransacked again by the buccaniers, brought the ministers at Madrid to see clearly that they must accept of those terms which their allies thought reasonable, and to oblige them to accept of which, at least as they surmised, they had given them little or no assistance^k. Accordingly, proper orders being dispatched to Don Bernard de Quiros, the treaty was signed at the castle of Ryswick, on the 20th of *September*¹, by which all that had been taken from them in Catalonia, the important fortress of Luxembourg, the county of Chine, the fortresses of Charle-roi, Mons, Ath, Courtrai, and all that had been torn from them by the chambers of reunion were
- d restored. The peace was solemnly proclaimed at Madrid; and the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, in consideration of the gallant defence of Barcelona, was not only created grandee of Spain, and adorned with the order of the Golden Fleece, but declared likewise viceroy and captain general of Catalonia^m.

- In most countries, and in Spain almost beyond any country, such favours conferred upon a foreigner are apt to create envy and discontent; but if these preferments and honours produced, as certainly they did, some effects of this sort, they were strangely strengthened and encouraged by the king's making him a present of 50,000 pistoles, which was followed by rich gifts from the queen, and very expensive compliments of the same kind from all the grandees, who were desirous of acquiring or preserving her favour. These unpopular strokes, however, were followed by another still more so than any or than all the rest. A regiment of horse-guards was formed mostly out of the inferior officers of the disbanded cavalry, of which the prince himself was colonel, and named all the other officers, and which, as soon as it was formed, was sent to Toledo: this gave very great offence, more especially as this new regiment was established when most of the national corps were discharged; but the queen minded this very little, pursuing her interests, or rather her inclinations, with very remarkable vivacity. The cardinal archbishop of Toledo, better known to the world by the title of cardinal Portocarrero, gave her no small opposition; and, according as their respective credits prevailed, various successive changes took placeⁿ. At this time the queen had an apparent superiority, as appeared from the count de Monterey's being forbidden the court for the freedom with which he expressed himself in council, and raising count d'Oropesa to the high dignity of president of Castile. The king's health continued all this time very precarious; he was subject to fainting fits, to fluxes; and sometimes his hands and legs swelled. The physicians advised a change of air; upon which their majesties made a tour to the city of Toledo, where, under the care of an English gentleman, one doctor Somers, bred at Oxford, the king grew much better, and, by the use of gentle exercise, recovered his strength^o. On the return of the court to Madrid, the ministerial intrigues revived. Count Harrach, the imperial minister, had a great influence over the king, and a greater over the queen; but the marquis de Harcourt, who was sent from France immediately after the conclusion of the peace, had likewise a considerable degree of favour; and the marchioness^a his wife behaved with so much respect to all the Spanish ladies, made them so many presents, and took such pains to render herself popular, that, in the space of a few months, it was surprising to see the progress that was made in raising and augmenting a party. Amongst other arts, the marquis exhibited in the hall of his palace the pictures of the dauphin and of his three sons, the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, and care was taken to point out their resemblance to the infanta Donna Maria Theresa, whose memory was very dear to all the old Spaniards. Besides, the marquis neglected nothing to insinuate himself into the good graces of the clergy; and, being informed by them of many families of old officers that were in distress, he relieved them liberally and secretly. He likewise offered his catholic majesty a squadron for the relief of Ceuta, which was again besieged; and, in respect to some^b differences that arose upon the frontiers, after great pains taken to fix the fault upon the Spaniards, all was left to his catholic majesty's discretion, and no demands of satisfaction were made, as in former times^c.

Makes a will in favour of the prince of Bavaria, declared his heir
by the first treaty of partition.

THE precautions taken for settling the succession to the crown of Spain, in case his catholic majesty should die without heirs, of which there was a strong appearance, on the part of that monarch himself, as well as of his allies, comprehend some of the most curious and interesting points of modern history; and though they have been so often, and in all appearance so exactly, stated, yet, as we have taken the pains to examine them very closely and minutely, and to separate, as well as possible, not only facts from falsehoods but from conjectures, we have reason to flatter ourselves, that what we shall deliver on this head, as succinctly^e as it is possible, will afford the reader some satisfaction. The first treaty of partition was negotiated this summer between king William and Louis XIV. with very great secrecy, and at length concluded and signed at the *Hague*¹, on the 11th of October; on the part of his most Christian majesty, by the count Tallard; by the earl of Portland and Sir Joseph Williamson, on the part of his Britannic majesty; and by eight plenipotentiaries for the states general. The ratifications were dated the 24th of the same month. By this treaty the electoral prince of Bavaria was to enjoy Spain and the Indies; the dauphin the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, with the places on the coast of Tuscany, the town and marquisate of Final, the province of Guipuscoa, including the towns of Fontarabia, St. Sebastian, and Port Passage; and the archduke Charles was to have the duchy of Milan. Some writers say^d, that in resentment of this treaty, and to prevent his dominions from being dismembered, his catholic majesty resolved to make a will in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria, and to declare him his heir general of all his territories in Europe and the Indies. Some writers again^e speak doubtfully of this will, and seem to think that nothing can or ought to be affirmed with certainty about it. Both are mistaken; for it was not the partition treaty that gave occasion to this will, and there is not the least reason to hesitate as to the point of fact that such a will there really was. There had been long a disposition in the king, at the instance of the queen, and some of the ministers to favour the archduke Charles; but it was thought requisite, as a previous measure, that the emperor should send ten thousand men into his catholic majesty's dominions, that there might be a force sufficient to support whatever declaration the king should make. But the emperor Leopold deferred this so long on account of his war with the Turks, and other motives, some of which were concealed, and some assigned, and the bishop of Lerida^f, his catholic majesty's minister at Vienna, sent such strange relations of the contempt expressed for the Spanish nation at Vienna, that, the patience of the king Don Carlos being quite worn out, he at length determined to make, and actually did make, a will, in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria, which was intirely conformable to the disposition of his father Philip the fourth, and to the renunciations upon which that disposition was founded. It is necessary to observe, that the only colour of objection to which this young prince's title was liable, was, the renunciation made by his mother the archduchess Maria Antonietta, upon her marriage with the elector of Bavaria; but the most able lawyers unanimously agreed, that this renunciation was null and void, as not having been communicated to the court, and not having had the sanction of the Cortes, or states of Spain^g; an inquiry and resolution attended with extraordinary consequences.

The death of the prince of Bavaria turns things back into the former state of perplexity.

AT the opening of this year, the testament in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria being made at the close of the last, of which the marquis de Harcourt having received intelligence from cardinal Portocarrero, had given early notice in France, that minister received orders to present a memorial to his catholic majesty upon this head; which we find represented in some collections of state papers as a very secret transaction, and as inconsistent with his most Chris-

^a tian majesty's engagements with his Britannic majesty and the states. It was neither; for it was so public, that it appeared in the common gazettes at that time; and all that is said therein amounts to no more than this, that, considering the harmony subsisting between the two courts, it was with great surprize he learned, in a manner that would not allow him to doubt of the fact, that his catholic majesty had made a testament in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria: that it was fit his majesty should know the most Christian king could not but be attentive to the indubitable rights of his only son the dauphin; and that it was requisite to put his majesty in mind, that the most Christian king, as well out of tenderness as decency, had never troubled him before, even with the most distant hint on this delicate subject. This produced a civil, but a general answer, importing, his catholic majesty's attention to the peace and welfare of his subjects should be ever accompanied with a strict regard to what was due to the relation and friendship subsisting between the two monarchs ^w. In the mean time the young prince, whom the king and whom the allies had destined for his successor, died on the 6th of February, of a short illness, at Brussels, attended with some suspicions that received perhaps too much credit from what was some years after thrown out by the elector of Bavaria, in a manifesto which he published, and which amounts to no more than a proof of his opinion ^x. This unexpected death, however, altered the state of things every-where; for, though it was provided against in a secret article of the partition treaty, in which it was stipulated, that, in such a case, the elector might be substituted in the place of his son, yet, upon mature deliberation, it was judged more expedient to have recourse to a new treaty. In Spain the king was advised by his ministers to make a new will, and to take the sense of the pope, which has ever the greatest weight in that country as to the validity of renunciations, in prejudice to the established rule of succession, which proved a work of time, the result of which will appear in its proper place.

THERE happened about the close of the month of April, at Madrid, a violent sedition, in King Charles which almost all the meaner sort of people were engaged, the cause of which was the scarcity ^{visits the} of bread, and the dearness of all sorts of provisions. The populace demolished the house of ^{tombs, and} the count d'Oropesa, and had murdered him and his family, if they had not found means to escape ^{opens the coffins} in disguise. By the express interposition of the king's authority, and not without much difficulty, ^{of his decease &} it was appeased; upon a strict inquiry, it was found, that the source of this mischief was a new ^{mother and} tax, the produce of which was shared by the count d'Oropesa, the amirante of Castile, and the countess of Berlips, the queen's favourite. Upon this, the king pardoned all who had been imprisoned, moved the count d'Oropesa from being president of Castile, and banished both him and the amirante; and the cardinal of Toledo, with other ministers, who had been for some time out of favour, were recalled and caressed ^y. At the proper season of the year the court went to the Escorial, where the king went to visit the Pantheon, and ordered the coffins of his mother and first queen to be opened. Of the former there was nothing left intire but one hand, which the king stooped down, and kissed with tears. The body of the latter remained not only whole, but the colour of the face remained unchanged; which surprized the king so much, that he immediately retired. There have been various speculations upon this incident; but the foregoing part of our history will shew, that this was no very unusual thing, and his father ^z Philip the fourth had done the very same in the year 1655, when it was observed, that the body of Charles the fifth appeared more fresh than that of his own queen Elizabeth, who died but nine years before ². At the return of the court from the Escorial, the king having granted a pension, on the revenues of the Low Countries, to the countess of Berlips, the count de Monterey, who was president of the council of Flanders, not only opposed it, but inveighed so bitterly against what he called the German government, that he received orders from the king to retire from Madrid in forty-eight hours; upon which a new commotion ensued, and the people, in the king's hearing, cried out, Let the patriots be recalled, and the plunderers banished ^a!

^f WHILE the allies were intent upon their new treaty of partition, the count de Canales, ^{resents highly} the Spanish minister at London, presented a memorial to the regency, the king being then in ^{the conduct of} Holland, conceived in very strong terms, and in which some gross epithets were used with respect to the first treaty. Upon the transmitting of this paper, dated the third of May, to the king ^{Great Britain} at Loo, Mr. secretary Vernon was directed to wait upon the Spanish ambassador, with an order ^{and Holland,} to quit the kingdom in eighteen days, which he accordingly did. On this news arriving ^{as to the par-} at Madrid, Mr. Stanhope, the British minister, received the like orders; to which he answered that he needed not so much time, having received his master's commands to the like purpose some days before ^b. This did not hinder the allies from concluding their second treaty, by which Spain and the Indies were given to the archduke Charles, the duchy of Lorrain was added to the countries assigned the dauphin, in exchange for which duke Leopold of Lorrain was to have the duchy of Milan. The emperor was to signify his consent in three months; and in case the duke of Lorrain would not accept of Milan, it was to be given to the elector of Bavaria, or to the duke of Savoy: in the first case, the dauphin was to have Navarre; and in the latter, the duchy of Savoy and the country of Nice. This second treaty of partition was signed at London, by the French and English ministers, on the 3d of March 1700, N. S.; and at the Hague, on the 25th of the same month, by the plenipotentiaries for the states^c. In the month of August the emperor, by count Harrach, declared to the ministers of France and Holland, and afterwards to the secretary of the English embassy, that he conceived himself to have the sole and indubitable right of succession to the whole of the Spanish monarchy; and that, if his line should fail, that succession belonged to the house of Savoy by the testament of Philip the fourth. At the same time, however, that this declaration was made, his imperial majesty desired that they would not proceed to name another prince in consequence of his refusal, pursuant to one of the articles of the treaty, in case he did not accept it in three months, and which, by a secret article, was extended to five months; and in this situation things rested, at least on the part of the allies, and their differences with the court of Madrid were not long after amicably compromised, and their usual intercourse restored; though through the minister of Holland only, neither of the kings being inclined to recede first, but rather to allow time to act, as the mediator between them^d.

Strange distraction and confusion amongst the ministers, and in the court of Madrid.

A. D. 1700.

As there were many points in regard to the frontiers in the Low Countries left undecided between the two crowns, commissioners were appointed to meet at Lisle, by their catholic and most Christian majesties, who in an amicable manner settled every thing, and subscribed a treaty of convention upon this subject towards the close of the foregoing year; and the ratifications were exchanged in the beginning of this, with great candour and civility on both sides. This proceeded from the situation that things were in, and the king's tenderness for the welfare of his subjects^e. In his heart he was as much attached to his family as ever; and therefore he appointed Don Francisco de Moles, duke of Pareta, his ambassador to the court of Vienna, with the warmest assurances of that nature; from whence a report afterwards prevailed in the world, that this Neapolitan nobleman carried with him a will in favour of the archduke. Not long after one father Moro, who came from Turin, put the whole court in confusion, by pretending to discover that his majesty was bewitched, and that his ill health was owing to charms and practices with evil spirits; and it seems that at first, as foolish as these tales were, they met with credit, since this monk was permitted to exorcise the king, for which, as he was not at all the better, the tables were turned upon the exorcist, so that he fell into the hands of the inquisition. Father Dias, the king's confessor, who ran, or pretended to run, into the same wild notions, and took the liberty from thence of speaking very injuriously of persons of the highest rank, was not only disgraced, but banished, and sent prisoner to his cloister. The marquis of Harcourt, who was grown weary of a court where there was so much discord and confusion, had his audience of leave in May, and soon after returned to France, having first introduced Mr. Blecourt, who was appointed envoy on his departure^f.

The violence of the king's disease much exasperated by chagrin and despair.

ALL possible methods had been tried by the queen, and those in her favour, to prevent the countess of Berlips from being sent back to Germany; but the public clamour became so strong, and some of the principal ministers represented to the king, in such plain terms, the mischiefs she occasioned, that she was at length dismissed, with her son, her niece, and most of the German servants the queen had brought with her, but with great civility, and many rich presents^g. About the same time some endeavours were used to procure a general assembly of the states, in order to take their advice in regulating the succession; but this went no farther than a rumour. The king's health remained very precarious; he was sometimes seized with vomitings, and other evacuations, that threatened him with immediate death: notwithstanding which he recovered, and for some short space of time seemed tolerably well. In these intervals he went so often in procession, took so much exercise, and appeared so frequently in public, that the people might conceive the better of his health, as, in the opinion of his physicians, contributed not a little to those frequent relapses^h. The French minister, and the minister from the states, having each of them communicated, by a memorial, the conclusion of the second treaty of partition, it threw his catholic majesty into a deep melancholy, who thereupon demanded from the emperor the archduke Charles, desiring he might be sent privately into Spain; and proposing that an indisposition should be feigned, to prevent his departure from being discovered as long as possible. To this he received no immediate answer; so that the delays of that court,

^a the memoirs of the allies, the misunderstandings amongst his own ministers, leaving him no quiet, and no creature to whom he could express himself in confidence, the poor king often traversed his apartments, hastily wringing his hands like one in despair, and was overheard to say to himself, Where is my son! where is Charles! where is the archduke! At length, understanding that, under pretence of care for that young prince's health, the emperor had actually refused to send him, he lost all patience and power over himself. At this juncture the French minister presented a menacing memorial, which, added to the load of his former afflictions, brought on, about the middle of September, such a violent fit of his distemper, that he received the sacraments of the church; but, to the amazement of those about him, and even of his physicians, he not only escaped, but seemed to recover strength¹.

^b WHEN he grew a little better, cardinal Portocarrero represented to him the necessity of his fixing the succession by a will; that the secret congregation at Rome, to whom the pope had referred the renunciations of his aunt and of his sister, had declared them null; that the motive of those renunciations, which was preventing the junction of the crowns of France and Spain, might be complied with, and at the same time the dismembering of his dominions prevented, by calling Philip duke of Anjou to the succession. Upon this the king fixed his eyes earnestly on the cardinal, who stood by his bed-side; bid him weigh the matter attentively, and remember that he discharged the whole burden of it upon him, who must be responsible at the last day for his conduct in this important affair. Upon this the cardinal caused the will to be drawn, which the king, not without great reluctance, signed, on the 2d of October following; and, having sealed it up, caused it to be put in a cover before some of the principal nobility, who thereupon indorsed their names as witnesses, viz. the cardinals Portocarrero and Borgio, Don Manuel de Arias, president of Castile, the duke of Medina Sidonia, count de Benevente, and the dukes of Sessa and Infantado. Three days after he made a codicil, by which he confirmed his testament, and added some pious legacies, directing that the queen should have the government either of the Italian provinces, or of the Low Countries; at her own choice^k. Notwithstanding all this, he wrote to the duke of Pareta, to acquaint him with his testament; and ordered him to inform the emperor, that, notwithstanding the low state of his affairs and his health had obliged him to take this step, yet he hoped to live long enough to make another disposition in favour of his imperial majesty, without prejudice to the welfare of his subjects. He had indeed some reason to hope this; for he grew afterwards so much better, that public rejoicings were made at Madrid and at Brussels. On the 26th of October he relapsed for the last time with such mortal symptoms, that he immediately received the sacraments with great resignation, as he likewise did with the same disposition three days afterwards; and on the first of November, between two and three in the afternoon, he breathed his last, being within five days of thirty-nine years old, and having reigned a little more than thirty-five years^l.

^c THE late king's testament was opened the very same day that he died; upon which the queen dowager, cardinal Portocarrero, the president of Castile, the inquisitor general, the count de Frigliano, counsellor of state, and the count de Benevente, grandee of Spain, in quality of regents of the kingdom, notified to the minister of France the nomination of the duke of Anjou. The minister dispatched an account of this, with an extract of the testament, to the court of France. The queen, and the rest of the regents, wrote also the same day to the most Christian king, and, after this, dispatched a second and a third letter, to press the immediate departure of their new king, and to represent the difficulties they laboured under, till they received at least the news of his acceptance of the crown. On the 12th of the same month Louis XIV. notified to them, by a letter, under his own hand, that the duke of Anjou had accepted the crown, and that the dauphin had renounced all his pretensions in his favour^m. It may not be amiss to observe, that some historians have asserted they were for a time divided at the court of Spain as to the choice of a successor out of the house of Bourbon, some of the ministers being inclined to prefer the duke of Orleans, or his son the duke of Chartres; and it has been also insinuated, that this would not have been disagreeable to Louis XIV.; but that, after mature deliberation, this project was laid aside, from an apprehension that his most Christian majesty would be less zealous in the cause of his nephew than in that of his grandson. At first sight this seems very plausible; but a little reflection will shew, that it is far from being solid, since the Spanish ministers might have reasonably concluded, that the want of zeal in the French king might have been balanced by the want of inclination in other princes to have disputed that nomination, which would have quadrated so well with the pacific views of the allies. But to speak the truth without reserve, this is not a in the least degree probable; for, if the ministers had ever reflected upon this matter at all, they would never have omitted the duke of Orleans and his whole line, in the disposition of the Spanish monarchy made by this testament, as it is evident they did. It was for this reason that Philip duke of Orleans, on behalf of himself and his son, made at Paris a solemn protest against the validity of this will, with respect to the preference given to the archduke Charles, in prejudice to the duke and his family, more especially as that testament is founded solely on the inviolable rule of succession to the Spanish monarchy^a. This protest is dated the 1st of December, and on the 4th of the same month the new king set out for his dominions; which naturally brings us to the close of this section, and to the detail of a transaction, one of the most material in modern history, which was immediately the source of a long war, which, at the bottom, has been the cause of every war since, and which it is very possible may prove the ground of disputes that are yet to come.

S E C T. XVII.

The reign of Philip V. from his accession, to the treaty of Utrecht.

Plan of this section, with a view of the method in which, and authorities on which, it is written.

WE had, in the foregoing sections, for the most part, guides sufficiently known, and whose historical labours have received the sanction of public approbation; but we can boast no longer of this advantage. What we are to deliver in this section is a new history, collected from the best materials that we could meet with, and carefully compared, and methodically digested. For these reasons we thought it necessary to be a little more full, that the reader may receive greater satisfaction in regard to a period, where we cannot atone for our succinctness, as we have hitherto done, by referring him to some larger history, as well as from the consideration that what falls near our own times, and within the remembrance of many who are now living, becomes so much the more interesting, and is for that reason read with greater curiosity, and examined with more attention. But, that we might still keep within reasonable bounds, we touch as slightly as possible whatever regards transactions out of Spain, though relative to that crown, leaving them to be more accurately explained in their proper places, and admitting few or no events which are not of real importance, or which are not absolutely necessary to the understanding such as are; so that, in the course of the section, there may be represented the real consequences of the duke of Anjou's being called to this succession, the disposition of the Spaniards towards him, the source of those discontents, that induced whole provinces to embrace the interest of his competitor, the progress of the war, and the means by which he came at last to be left in the quiet possession of Spain and the Indies, after an obstinate and bloody dispute, which was calculated to deprive him of both.

Measures taken by the regents to facilitate the quiet accession of Philip.

THE regents having fixed the twenty-fourth of November for the proclamation of the new king, the ceremony was performed with all possible regularity and splendor, and with loud acclamations of joy by the populace^a. The regents, knowing well how bold a step they had taken, resolved to proceed in the same road, and with the same vigour. They desired the marquis of Harcourt, now honoured with the title of duke and peer, to take his seat in the council; and, in their answer to his most Christian majesty's letter, they desired him to take what measures he thought proper on the behalf of Spain, and assured him of their approbation, as also that they had given instructions to the viceroys of provinces, and governors of places, to obey his orders, and to march or to receive whatever troops he should judge requisite^b. The dukes of Burgundy and Berry attended Philip to the frontiers, and took their leave of him in the Isle of Pheasants. The king slept that night at Irun, which was the 24th of January, where he was received by the bishop of Pampeluna, and other persons of distinction^c. His first act of sovereignty was the bestowing the viceroyalty of Catalonia upon the count de Palma, nephew to cardinal Portocarrero, notwithstanding the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, who was in possession of that dignity, had owned him, as well as the rest of the Spanish viceroys, such as the elector of Bavaria in the Low Countries, prince Vaudemont in the duchy of Milan, and the duke de Medina Celi at Naples. But, in the midst of all this seeming tranquillity, as there was a league forming abroad, so there were contrivances at home to deprive him of that crown which he had so lately received.

^a To give the better colour to this, the count de Harrach, on the 17th of January, protested, in the most solemn manner, at Madrid, against the validity of the late king's will, which he alleged that monarch had no power to make ^d. Father Torres, who had been his confessor, asserted, that, a little before his death, he had declared to him and to the inquisitor-general, that what he did was against his inclination. The queen dowager likewise was disposed to the same way of thinking; of which king Philip being informed, he wrote her a letter with his own hand, desiring her to quit the capital, and go to Valencia, Granada, or Cordova; but, as the season was very cold, she chose to go no further than Toledo ^e. The regents intimated to Bernard de Mendoza, bishop of Segovia, inquisitor-general, and one of their own number, that his absence would be acceptable; and as for the confessor, they banished him without ceremony. They removed likewise some other persons, and even the imperial and palatine ministers, who made at first some difficulty of obeying; but the regents having observed to them, that they could not insist on their public characters to a prince they would not acknowledge, and that they could not be responsible for the safety of their persons, they thought fit to take the advice that was given them ^f. King Philip arrived on the 18th of February at the palace of Buen Retiro, where he was received by cardinal Portocarrero, and many of the grandees, and where he resided till the fourteenth of April, when, all things being ready, he made his public entry into Madrid with all possible magnificence, and attended by such a crowd of people, that some were pressed to death in the streets. His youth, his docility, the sweetness of his temper, his clemency, and, above all, his piety, gained him the affections of the nobility in appearance, and of the middle and meaner sort of people in reality ^g.

THE court of France, desirous of securing the duke of Savoy in the interest of the two crowns, after the refusal, as some say, of an archduchess, demanded the younger daughter of that prince, Donna Louisa Gabriella, sister to the duchess of Burgundy, to which the duke very readily agreed. This marriage was declared at Madrid on the 4th of May, without asking the opinion or consent of the council, at which some took offence. But public rejoicings were made, and the marriage went on. It was afterwards hastily solemnized at the court of Savoy, immediately after which the young princess was sent to Nice, from whence she proceeded by sea to Marseilles, where after being entertained in the most superb manner, she proceeded to Barcelona, to which city the king, upon the notice of her departure, immediately set out from Madrid ^h. Before he left his capital he received the homage of the grandees of Castile, who, according to the old custom, not only swore to serve him with duty and affection, but likewise to disclose whatever designs against him should come to their knowledge, and to fight against the enemies of his government at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. He also made a tour, in the month of August, to Toledo, in order to visit the queen dowager, who received him with all possible marks of kindness and respect, made him a present of a golden fleece richly adorned with jewels, which she fastened with her own hands to his button, and received from him an eagle enriched with diamonds of great price ⁱ. All the provinces of Spain made him a free gift upon his accession, and, amongst the rest, that of Guipuscoa, which had never shewn the like mark of zeal for any of his predecessors. He named, on his leaving Madrid, a cabinet council, at the head of which was cardinal Portocarrero, made a public entry into the city of Saragossa, in his way to Catalonia, and, arriving at Barcelona, held an assembly of the states there in the month of October, where he gave a specimen of his wisdom and goodness, which induced the people for a time to consider him as another Solomon (A). There his marriage was celebrated with great lustre; and there, in consequence of his

(A) The case alluded to in the text regards the son of the duke of Medina Sidonia, the first duke in Castile, grandee of Spain of the first class, master of the horse to the king, and one of the gravest, worthiest, and most potent noblemen in Spain. This young gentleman, being displeased that an officer of the revenue presumed to search his equipage at the entrance of Madrid, gave him some coarse language; to which, either not knowing or not regarding his quality, the fellow answered with all the insolence of a man in office; which so provoked the young lord, that he shot him through the head. For this high offence cardinal Portocarrero caused him to be closely confined, and dispatched an express immediately to Barcelona, with an account of what had happened, to the king, as being unwilling to run any hazard of offending the grandees, by taking any steps, in an affair of so delicate a nature, of his own head. As soon as Philip had received and read the cardinal's dispatch, he called the duke of Medina Sidonia into his cabinet: "There is a young man," said the king, "the son of a person of very high quality, who has killed an officer of the revenue for doing his duty, and while he was doing it; I desire you would give me your opinion, how he ought to be punished for this offence?" The duke, after a little consideration, made answer, that the offence was of a very high nature; that the young man, let him be whose son he would, should be confined for the remainder of his life in his grandfather's advice, which was likewise approved by his own council, he resolved to pass over into Italy, where the war was already begun, and where his presence was on that and on many other accounts become absolutely necessary ^k.

His foreign alliances with Portugal and Savoy, and his marriage with a princess of the last-mentioned house.

As to foreign affairs, the interests of Spain were now intirely managed by the most Christian king, who shewed great wisdom and contrivance; but, having out-lived the great ministers and heroes who had contributed to the elevation of his glory, failed in the execution of them. If he really outwitted the allies, in preferring the spirit to the letter of the partition treaty, they were certainly even with him, by their persevering in such a conduct as hindered him from discerning with certainty whether they intended peace or war. King William and the states of Holland acknowledged king Philip upon his accession; and the latter, by this act of civility, recovered 22 battalions of old troops dispersed in the garrisons of the Low Countries. Yet, in the beginning of the month of September, the grand alliance was signed ^l, which perhaps might have been prevented, if France had made the same vigorous use of her arms she had formerly done. An alliance offensive and defensive was also concluded, by the two crowns, with the duke of Savoy ^m, in consequence of which, and the marriage of his daughter, he was declared generalissimo of their forces in Italy, where, as marshal Catinat suspected, he exposed his person with great intrepidity on one side, while he furnished to, as well as held secret intelligence with, the other ⁿ. An alliance of the like kind was made with the court of Portugal; and his most Christian majesty, amongst other things, undertook to pay the dowry of the queen dowager of England, in case it should, out of resentment of this treaty, be stopped by that crown ^o. Both these alliances, though advantageous in shew, proved detrimental in fact to France and Spain, where they depended upon, and were deceived by, them. The pope was in the interest of king Philip, and yet had not the courage to grant him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples. An insurrection happened in that capital, which was extinguished indeed, but not without effusion of blood, as well in the streets as on the scaffold ^p; so that at the end of this year affairs had a very cloudy aspect at home and abroad, and the young king found himself obliged to quit his consort almost as soon as he had received her, and the kingdoms of which he had just taken possession, to go and expose his person in provinces where a spirit of disaffection had already appeared, and at the head of armies which had already suffered several checks; and where he was to rely intirely upon the conduct of others, having as yet no military experience, and being too young to form any just notions of men or things, at least in proportion to the exigency of his affairs, and that critical conjuncture in which he was called to the government of a nation, distracted in their councils, divided in their affections, and, in point of treasure and power, almost totally exhausted. It is true, that, towards the close of the year, he had the consolation of seeing the plate fleet arrive with a cargo of sixty millions; and was so prudent as to refuse admission to the fleet of the allies, which, without committing hostilities, had demanded entrance into the port of Cadiz ^q; with an intention to seize it.

King Philip makes a tour to Italy, contrary to the sentiments of the Spanish nobility.

THE intended voyage of king Philip into Italy was by no means agreeable to many of the Spanish lords, and it was likewise disapproved by the duke of Harcourt. His-grandfather sent him a long memorial upon the subject, by the count de Marsin; but as he remained fixed to his purpose, after the perusal of that paper, his most Christian majesty consented, and complimented him by a letter upon that firmness ^r. In the mean time there were many things of importance to be settled; the states of Catalonia made high demands, and took very in prison; and his father obliged to provide for the widow of the deceased, and for all his family. "You have spoke," returned Philip, "upon this occasion, like a king, and therefore I must speak to you as a father. The criminal is your son; send him to one of your own castles, and keep him there till he is made thoroughly sensible of his fault; with respect to the widow and family of the deceased, I cannot dispense with that part of your judgment, and I am persuaded you will make no difficulty in assigning them a handsome maintenance." The duke threw himself at the king's feet, to thank him for this act of favour and kindness, and remained always attached to him with the most heroic fidelity (1). An instance he gave of this, when the affairs of Philip were in a very critical situation, that is, after raising the siege of Barcelona, when he was obliged to retire into France, and it was debated in his council, whether he should not remain there. The duke, who was then very old, and also infirm, said, at the close of the debate, "His majesty will determine, from what he has heard, whether he will go; for my part, I have long ago determined to follow him to the last gasp of my breath, and into the most distant corner of the world" (2). But, as the reader will see, things did not come to such extremities.

a little notice of those made by the king. Both their majesties were much indisposed during their residence at Barcelona; and the news they received from Madrid, as well as from most other quarters, was far from being agreeable. At length the king yielded to all the demands of the Catalans; and, in return, they granted him a million, to be paid in ten years, and 50,000 crowns by way of free gift to the queen *. The marquis de Bedmar was appointed commander in chief of the Low Countries, on the departure of the elector of Bavaria for his own dominions; and, at the pressing instances of cardinal Portocarrero, the king consented that the queen should remain in Spain, and that the councils of regency should be held in her presence †.

A. D. 1702.

ALL things being at length adjusted in the best manner possible, the king embarked at Barcelona on the 8th of April, and landed the 15th of the same month in the bay of Naples. Pacific He made his entry into that city the next day, where his presence seemed to re-establish a Naples by his calm. He was not only very affable to the nobility, but granted audiences to all sorts of people, heard their grievances patiently, and redressed them as far as he was able. There was an arrear of about five or six millions due to the crown for quit-rents and taxes, which lay presence, and very heavy, and afforded the officers of the revenue constant colour for vexations. King secures the Sicilians without mak- ing them a visit. Philip made a short end of this; he remitted the whole; at which the people were so distracted with joy, that, when the nobility made him a free gift of three hundred thousand ducats, the commons of Naples gave him four hundred thousand †. He would have crossed the sea to Sicily; but it was represented to him, that the severity of the Spanish government, since the revolt of Messina, had not only spread universal discontent through that island, but had impoverished the nobility and gentry to such a degree, that the expence of a royal visit would absolutely ruin them. He not only desisted, upon this, from his design, but sent his orders to that kingdom for restoring the honours and estates to all that had been condemned and banished, and directed their palaces, that had been demolished, to be rebuilt at his expence; which effectually gained him the hearts of that nation, as appeared afterwards in many instances †. At his leaving Naples, he granted an amnesty to all who had been concerned in the late troubles; which had not the same effect, though it created a great joy for the present.

He quitted that capital on the second of June, went by sea to Leghorn, and proceeded from thence by land to Milan, where he arrived on the 18th of the same month. He went from thence to the army, and intended an interview with his father-in-law, who avoided it, by pretending some disgust in respect to the ceremonial, to decline taking the command of the army, because he had privately changed sides. The king, having joined the duke of Vendosme, was present in the action at Luzara on the 15th of August; the imperialists were commanded by prince Eugene, who was very near surprising and destroying the whole army of the two crowns, and prevented by an accident only. This engagement lasted till one in the morning. King Philip was in the right wing, with the marshal de Crequi, who was killed there. The fire was prodigiously warm; and he gave upon that occasion not only the highest testimonies of personal courage, but of patience also, being near forty-eight hours on horseback, and almost the whole time without any refreshment. Each side sung Tè Deum, and claimed the victory; the slaughter was great on both; but in reality the advantage was on the side of the two crowns, for the next day they took Luzara, with all the enemy's magazines; Guastalla, after a siege of ten days, in which there was a garrison of eighteen hundred men; and soon after Burgoforte, during the siege of which king Philip exposed himself in the trenches, encouraged the soldiers by his liberality, and at length made the garrison, which consisted of four thousand five hundred men, prisoners of war. The campaign being over, the king resolved to return by the way of France into Spain, where his presence was become highly requisite †; through that spirit of discontent and intrigue spread throughout the kingdom.

THE queen opened the states of the kingdom of Arragon, and leaving them sitting at Sa-ragossa, proceeded to Madrid, where her arrival created great joy, and prevented that spirit of intrigue, which began to prevail, from breaking out into open insurrection, as otherwise it would have done, upon the appearance of the fleet of the allies before Cadiz †. As soon as the news came, the queen declared, in a council of regency, that she was ready to go into Andalusia, if that could be of any use; and offered all her jewels to be sold, if money was wanting. This had a great effect; cardinal Portocarrero raised and paid six squadrons of horse, the bishop of Cordova levied a regiment of foot at his own expence †. The same firmness of the queen appeared after the misfortune at Vigo, where the marine of France was ruined, and where the Spaniards lost, by their own confession, to the value of eight millions of gold ^a. The retreat of the admiran- te of Castile was a new misfortune; he had accepted the embassy to France, and, under colour of providing every thing requisite to discharge it with the utmost splendor, he raised immense sums of money, packed up a vast quantity of rich furniture and jewels, which, at a certain stage upon the road, filed off for Portugal, whither he retired himself with great secrecy, and made a kind of public entry into Lisbon, accompanied by about three hundred persons, and one hundred and fifty carriages, on the 23d of October ^b. In the mean time king Philip, having landed at Marseilles, continued his journey with all possible vigilance, and, passing directly into Catalonia, made his entry into Barcelona on the 20th of September; and, from the time of his arrival in Spain, the powers of the regency ceased, and the deliberations of all the councils were transmitted to the king, before any resolutions were taken ^c. All this time cardinal Portocarrero, archbishop of Toledo, was at the head of affairs, and acted in all things as prime minister.

King Philip returns into Spain, and finds great heart-burnings in his conduct.

A. D. 1703.

ABOUT the middle of January, at the request of cardinal Portocarrero, the king returned to Madrid; the very same day the cardinal d'Etrees came thither likewise with the title of ambassador from his most Christian majesty. This prelate explained to him, pursuant to the intelligence they had received from France, the real intentions of the allies, and the certainty of his being attacked in his own dominions. Upon this, king Philip thought proper to enforce the measures already resolved upon for recruiting the Spanish infantry, for remounting their cavalry, and for forming a numerous body of standing forces, under the title of troops of the household. Orders were likewise given in respect to the marine; and, that these necessary projects might be carried into execution with as much vigour as possible, he judged it requisite to make free with six or eight millions of what had been saved out of the galleons at Vigo. The council of the Indies, and the duke of Medina Cæli who was at the head of it, remonstrated very strongly against this proceeding, but in vain. The French cardinal maintained, that a part might be taken to save the whole; and it was believed that the Spaniards were chiefly irritated by the sending immediately two millions into France, to indemnify the most Christian king for the loss of his ships at Vigo, and his subjects in some measure for the loss of their money. The duke de Medina Cæli resigned his employment; the Spanish cardinal quarrelled with the cardinal from France; and the king, to keep them in some measure quiet, was forced to dispatch business without either ^d.

Cardinal Portocarrero quits the post of prime minister, and retires into the diocese of Toledo.

UPON this, orders came from France for the duchess of Braccaciano, better known by the name of the princess d'Ursins, to return to Rome, on account of her declaring, without any management, for cardinal Portocarrero. She was by birth a French woman, of the noble family of Tremouille, and had gained an unaccountable ascendancy over both their majesties, insomuch that the queen fell sick upon the order, which was thereupon suspended ^e. In secret, both the cardinals gave Philip good advice; d'Etrees assured him, that it was impossible to preserve himself upon the throne, but by the assistance of his grandfather: that, through the weakness of the two last reigns, a spirit of faction had diffused itself amongst the grandees, which inclined many of them to postpone the public in favour of their private interest: that they began already to cabal; and that, without having a sufficient number of French troops upon whom he might rely, neither his crown nor his person could be safe. Cardinal Portocarrero treated these suspicions in general as unjust, but, however, did not oppose the measures that were suggested. He desired the king's leave to resign all his employments, on account of his age and infirmities, but assured him of his constant fidelity and best advice, insinuating, that a state of independency would put it more in his power to serve him, and that he might rely upon his integrity in a private as well as in a public station; but the king being unwilling to consent, this step was for some time retarded ^f. The commissioners appointed to inquire into the conduct of the admiran- te declared all his estates forfeited during his life, condemned him to perpetual banishment, and, to justify this sentence, acquitted him of treason; with which the court was not by any means satisfied, apprehending that this would not sufficiently restrain those who still maintained a correspondence with him; and being very well informed of the nature and design of that correspondence, which greatly fortified the credit of that intelligence the French cardinal had given, and augmented the king's fears for what might happen, when the design of the allies came to be disclosed ^g.

AT the time of his retreat, the admiran- te acted with great address; he wrote a very respectful letter to the queen, in which he complained of the injuries done him by his enemies, and particularly of the cardinal of Toledo and the president of Castile, who had ruined him in the opinion of the king; and had projected an embassy to France, to force him out of that a privacy in which he desired to live: that he had accepted this employment beneath his birth, which was a strange notion, since the constable of Castile was then Philip's ambassador, that he might have an opportunity of getting out of their reach, with which view he retired into Portugal^b. At the same time he sent back his secretary, with all the papers of the embassy. But these were all appearances; for at Lisbon he persuaded the ministers of the allies, that if once the archduke was declared king of Spain, Philip might be with ease dethroned: that the greater part of the nobility, and the people in general, were in the interests of the house of Austria; and that it was not so much the succours of France, as the irresolution of the court of France, that maintained Philip at Madrid. The king of Portugal having entered into the grand alliance, the admiralte drew with his own hands the reasons for sending the archduke into Spain; which being insisted upon by the allies, at length induced the emperor of September, all their pretensions to this monarchy; in consequence of which, the archduke was the next day publicly declared king of Spain at Vienna, by the name of Charles the third^c. His correspondence in Spain was certainly great; and though it was managed with much secrecy, yet Philip and his ministers discovered it in part, and suspected more; upon which he was at last attainted of treason, and Philip declared, that he would consider as traitors all who had intercourse with him of any kind. About this time the duke of Savoy, who, in the spring of the year, had complained, both at Paris and Madrid, of the calumnies spread to his prejudice, declared openly for the allies, which afflicted the queen extremely^d. The court of France having recalled the cardinal d'Etrees, cardinal Portocarrero laid hold of that opportunity of executing his former resolution; and accordingly resigned all his offices, and retired^e. This afforded a gloomy prospect, though nothing in comparison of what afterwards happened; for the elector of Bavaria was victorious in Germany, the Low Countries were still preserved, the duke of Vendosme prospered in Italy, and the duke of Savoy saw himself in danger of paying, with the loss of his dominions, for deserting the cause of the two crowns.

As king Philip thought it absolutely necessary to have recourse to the succours offered him by his grandfather, and knowing how expedient it would be to have his finances in perfect order at the opening of a war, he gave into the sentiments of Mr. Orry, who had been sent from France to assist him in matters of this nature, and who, amongst other singular pieces of advice, suggested, that his revenues were but too well collected: that, to prevent the people from defrauding the king of his taxes, and to prevent their own officers from cheating, the Spanish ministers had multiplied them to such a degree, that what the king received was very trifling, in comparison of what was levied; and that these retainers of the treasury were more numerous, and cost the king a greater sum yearly, than all the effective troops in Spain. Upon this Philip demolished that old fabric, and cashiered the far greater part of these unnecessary officers, which however created a great clamour. This was heightened by suppressing all the titular offices about the court, which were either mere sine-cures, or superfluous. But it was augmented to the highest degree, by obliging some of the old officers of the revenue, who made an improper display of their wealth in times of such confusion, to make some proper offerings out of their abundance, to excuse giving any account how they came by the rest. About the middle of February the duke of Berwick arrived, who was to command the French auxiliaries, and a camp was marked out near Badajoz for 30,000 men. The king repaired thither in the beginning of March, in order to command his forces in person^m.

In the mean time Charles III. was arrived in *Portugal*ⁿ, where the admiralte, not content with owning him, wrote a letter to pope Clement XI. in which he asserted king Charles's will to be a forgery, takes to himself the shame of being concerned in that forgery, and affirms, that there was a true will in favour of Charles III.^o The king of Portugal and the new king of Spain published likewise their manifestoes; and, that he might have an equal share in this paper war, Philip V. published his declaration likewise, by much the most moderate and the best drawn. In this he establishes his right as derived from the fundamental laws of the kingdom; the testament of his uncle Charles II. made upon mature deliberation; and the choice of the whole kingdom, testified in the most authentic manner. He observes that he had been four years in possession, and acknowledged by most of the powers of Europe, particularly by the crowns of Great Britain and Portugal, and by the states general, though now embarked in a confederacy to dethrone him. In the close it is added, that if the alliance be increased, it is visibly from motives of interest, certain cessions being made to the king of Portugal out of the territories of Spain, and others to the duke of Savoy out of the Italian dominions. a King Philip took likewise this opportunity of bringing his cousin the duke of Orleans's protest upon the carpet; and established the right of him and his posterity to the succession immediately after the duke of Berry, and before the archduke and the duke of Savoy ^p. As to the campaign, the operations of it were not very considerable, but, such as they were, they turned to his advantage; he took and demolished several places on the frontiers of Portugal, destroyed one half of the English and Dutch auxiliaries, and gave the people of Portugal a very ill impression of the war. On the other hand, those people were by no means pleased to see duke Schomberg and baron Fagel at the head of the troops; the former quarrelled with the king of Portugal; and the admiral with king Charles, about his father's arrears; and with a Spanish nobleman about his notions, which he treated as visions and chimeras. How- b ever the admiral's policy soon after served him in good stead with the two kings. He was restored into favour; and the earl of Galway was appointed to command the army, as the foreign general most acceptable to the troops ^q.

WHILE the king made the campaign in the summer, the order that had been so long respited with regard to the princess of Ursins was carried into execution; and upon receiving an order to quit Madrid in forty-eight hours, she retired accordingly on the 16th of April, to the inexpressible grief of the queen of Spain ^r. It was also supposed to chagrin cardinal Portocarrero, who remained at Toledo, and could not be persuaded to return to court, though the king bestowed upon him the high office of inquisitor-general. The fleet of the allies, under the command of Sir George Rook, having the prince of Darmstadt on board, and between three and four thousand regular troops, made an attempt upon Barcelona; but, through the care of the viceroy Don Francisco de Velasco, it proved ineffectual. They sailed from the coast of Catalonia in the beginning of June, and about two months after appeared before Gibraltar, which was furiously cannonaded. The prince of Darmstadt, with his troops, were landed on the isthmus, but the place was taken by the courage of the English seamen, under the command of the captains Whitaker and Jumper; and indeed it was no great wonder, the garrison consisting but of one hundred men ^s. The prince of Darmstadt was left with a strong garrison; and the fleet, on the 24th of August, engaged, at a small distance from Malaga, the navy of France, commanded by the count de Thoulouse. Both sides claimed the victory, to which neither had a clear title; but it was afterwards known that Sir George Rooke had so d little ammunition, that his obliging the French fleet to retire added as much to his reputation as the most signal victory would have done, if it had been gained before the taking of Gibraltar ^t.

Excessive honours conferred on marshal Tesse, by king Philip.

THE allies promised themselves much from the autumn campaign on the side of Portugal; both the kings, Don Pedro and Don Carlos, were in the field; and the army of king Philip, commanded by marshal Berwick, was very thin; notwithstanding which, they did little or nothing. This was in part owing to the disputes between Lord Galway and Baron Fagel, partly to the hatred the Portuguese had to their heretic allies, but chiefly to their disappointment with respect to the Spaniards, who they imagined would have deserted in great numbers; which was so far from being the case, that the peasants chose to have the villiages burnt, rather than own king Charles ^u. On the other hand, the duke of Berwick found himself so uneasy, that he demanded to be recalled; which was granted, and marshal Tesse sent in his stead, whom king Philip honoured with the order of the Golden Fleece, created him grandee of Spain, and captain general, with the same powers and appointments that Don Juan of Austria had enjoyed; all which, however, contributed nothing to his success, since the sending him into Spain has been compared by the French writers to the replacing Villars by Tallard in Bavaria, which ruined the elector's affairs, as this new grandee had like to have done those of king Philip, who even at Madrid found himself surrounded by enemies; and though he was so fortunate as to discover their designs, yet he missed seizing the count de Cifuentes, by whom they were conducted, who acted in concert with the admiral of Castile, and in whom afterwards Charles III. principally confided ^v, though the warmth of that nobleman's temper gave him frequent uneasiness.

Siege of Gibraltar carried on with great obstinacy, and without effect. A. D. 1705.

IN the present situation of his affairs, king Philip found it equally impracticable to defend his person and dominions, without imposing new taxes, and to levy those taxes without exciting continual murmurs, and in some places insurrections. The great aversion the Spaniards had to the French still subsisted, or rather increased, though they could not but be sensible that the king went every day more and more into the Spanish customs, and had recourse to them out of pure necessity. Commerce in Spain was lost to such a degree, that king Philip

- a was obliged to permit even his enemies to resume it, provided they made use of neutral vessels *. In the midst of these distresses he made some great efforts. He fixed a fund for the maintenance of the army, and, when it was deficient, borrowed of the treasurer of the French troops; which, in spite of their ill-will, induced the Spanish officers to desire that the whole army might be put upon the same foot, and paid in the same way. He established household troops after the mode of his grandfather; and, by having Spanish, Italian, and Walloon guards, found means to draw many young men of the best houses to enter into the service; which was of great use to him. He likewise fixed a cabinet council, composed of persons upon whom he could depend; and into which Mr. Amelot, the French minister, was admitted, who, being of the long robe, and a very wise and grave man, became highly acceptable to the Spaniards. Cardinal Portocarrero, though he declined the high office of inquisitor-general, gave the king all the assistance he could, and, as he had done from the beginning, rendered him all the services in his power †. The king and his ministers, however, persisted in carrying on the siege of Gibraltar, which had been formed in the month of October, in the preceding year, by the marquis de Villadarias, and had been continued through the winter, at a vast expence of men and money, to very little purpose; for the prince of Darmstadt, who defended it, was a good officer, a man of inflexible courage, and, having the sea open, received continual supplies. Once indeed it might have been taken; for a peasant shewed them a road at the back of the mountain, by which a detachment of 500 men reached the top of it, and attacked the works, which were but slight on that side, so vigorously, that, if they had been properly supported, they must have carried the place. This error induced the king to send marshal Tesse thither, and procured an order to Baron Pontis to sail thither with a squadron of five large men of war, notwithstanding he represented how dangerous a step they obliged him to take. He was quickly attacked by the English fleet, by whom three of his ships were taken, and he was forced to run the other two on shore. Upon this, on the 23d of April, the siege was raised ‡.

- WHILE the Spanish army was employed in the fruitless siege of Gibraltar, the Portuguese and their allies were in the field with scarce any force to oppose them, the first place they invested was Salvaterra, the governor of which, having made his terms with the admiral, no sooner received his money, than he opened the gates; but his garrison, consisting of four hundred and thirty men, chose to be conducted prisoners to Lisbon, rather than take arms against King Philip. Valencia de Alcantara was the next, where Don Alonso de Mariaga commanded, with a garrison of three hundred and fifty men, strong by situation, but ill fortified; it made a gallant, indeed a wonderful defence; for the governor stood five assaults, the last of which continued several hours, and, when he surrendered, there were but one hundred and twelve men left; and these, being disarmed and sent prisoners under a guard of a troop of horse, seized the arms of their escort while they were at dinner, and, with the assistance of their horses, made their escape to a man §. Abuquerque in Estramadura was taken after seven days open trenches. And thus ended the summer campaign, during which, however, king Philip met with misfortunes that chagrined him much more than the sense of his losses. The effects of the admiral's correspondencies produced these apprehensions. A plot was discovered at Granada, managed by a physician and a monk, for cutting the throats of the garrison; another of the same kind at Valencia, by mere accident; both fixed the design to the eleventh of June: at length the capital conspiracy came to be known, or rather suspected, for it was never clearly made out; the scheme was to seize the persons of the king and queen at Buen Retiro, and to carry them prisoners to Lisbon, or, if that was found impracticable, to stab them by the way. As the marquis de Leganex was governor of Buen Retiro, and as he had desired leave to make a tour to his estates in the country at the time the design was to have been executed, it drew a suspicion upon him, though he was universally allowed to be the finest gentleman, one of the ablest statesmen, and one of the best officers, in Spain. He was arrested coming out of the king's apartment, and sent prisoner to Pampeluna, from thence removed into France, and at length suffered to reside in his own house at Paris, where he lived in universal esteem to the time of his decease, which was about six years after ¶. The miscarriage of this design, accompanied with some reproaches from some of those to whose interest he had sacrificed his own, broke the heart of the admiral * on the 23d of June, at Lisbon, to the no small satisfaction of the court of Madrid, where, however he might be ridiculed and despised by others, they stood at least in as great fear of his artifices as of the arms of the allies, nor were they intirely delivered from the effects of them even by his death (B). (B) The titles of this extraordinary person, somewhat more at large, run thus; Don Juan Enriquez de Cabrera, seventh duke of Medina de Rio Seco, eleventh admiral of Castile, count of Melgar, Modica, and

taken by the allies, and becomes the seat of Charles the

A GRAND fleet of the allies, commanded by the earl of Peterborough and Sir Cloudsley Shovel,^a having taken Charles the third on board at Lisbon, sailed for the coast of Catalonia, where some places revolted in their favour, and where they landed a body of ten thousand men, between Barcelona and Palamos; and, being joined by a considerable number of Miquelets, broke ground before Barcelona on the 28th of August. Don Francisco de Velasco, viceroy for king Philip, having but a slender garrison, summoned the inhabitants, and told them, that he would deal fairly by them; and that if any person was inclined in his sentiments to the opposite party, he should have free leave to go out; but that, if he discovered any treachery afterwards, he would punish it with the utmost severity; but there were none who accepted of this proposal. It was however believed, that the prince of Hesse had engaged the governor of Montjuic to make the reduction of that fortress no difficult enterprize; but the viceroy prevented this, by hanging the governor, and changing the garrison. When, therefore, the prince came to make the attack, he met with an obstinate resistance, in which himself and four or five hundred English were killed. The Spaniards are persuaded, that this lost them the place; for they affirm, that, when the earl of Peterborough heard the prince of Darmstadt was killed, he suffered himself to say, or rather to think aloud, Then Barcelona is to be taken; and rallying the troops in person, with the assistance of fresh reinforcements, attacked and carried the fortress. Upon this the inhabitants discovered their real sentiments, and compelled the viceroy to give up the place by capitulation, which he did on the 9th of October.^d He was constrained to demand the earl of Peterborough's protection, to prevent his sharing the same fate with his deputy, who was murdered by the inhabitants. All Catalonia, Roses only excepted, declared for king Charles, and the greatest part of the kingdom of Valencia did the like.^e The autumn campaign on the side of Portugal was more favourable to king Philip; for marshal Tesse forced the marquis las Minas to raise the siege of Badajoz, where the earl of Galway lost his right arm, and where the generals of the allies differed so much amongst themselves, that Baron Fagel procured himself to be recalled. The princess of Ursins returned this year into Spain, and the king and queen went some miles out of Madrid to receive her; and, which is stranger, the French court made her very rich presents, to pacify that resentment which her short exile might have raised.^f But these, however, made but little impression.

and Cabrera. Don Fadrique, or Frederick, twin brother to Don Henry the second, king of Castile, the son of Don Alonso the eleventh, by the famous Donna Leonora de Guzman, was the founder of this family, and was the father of Don Alonso Enriquez, though it is not clear who was his mother (3). Some authors say a very beautiful woman, whose name was Paloma; but the generality of writers incline, perhaps out of respect to the family, to make him the son of Blanch of Bourbon, the wife of Don Pedro the Cruel (4). But it is certain that Henry the third conferred upon him the office of admiral of Castile; that Don Juan the second created Frederic Enriquez, the son of Alonso, conde de Melgar; and that the emperor Charles the fifth made Don Ferdinand Enriquez, who was the grandson of Don Frederic, duke of Medina de Rio Seco. But the title of admiral was held so much more honourable, that the rest were hardly ever mentioned (5). This nobleman, in his father's life time, bore the title of Conde de Melgar, and was esteemed one of the ablest persons in the court of Charles the second, had the government of Milan bestowed upon him, and stood so high in the favour of his last queen, that for some time he was in a manner absolute at court. The fierceness of his temper, and the haughtiness of his disposition, made him so many enemies, that he was driven from court in spite of all the interest of his protectors. He had the greatest personal enmity possible to cardinal Portocarrero, opposed him in every thing, and attached himself openly, and with great vehemence, to the interests of the house of Austria (6). This did not hinder king Philip from endeavouring to gain him; and it is very certain that the admiral made not the least scruple of acknowledging his title, or of accepting the character of his ambassador to the court of France. When he retired into Portugal, he sent for his nephew the marquis of Alcanizas to Zamora, where he proposed his going with him. The marquis seeing how he was attended, dissembled his sentiments, that he might not be carried away by force, made his escape in the night, and brought the first news of his uncle's evasion to the queen at Saragossa, where he was received with great joy, and ever after treated with the utmost respect. As for the admiral, he had a graceful person, great courage, and prodigious capacity (7). He was strictly and properly the author of the war in Spain; and though some great men have treated him as a wild, chimerical, visionary politician, and condemned his projects as romantic and impracticable (8), yet, to do him justice, he had most amazing talents, and bid very fair, by his contrivances, for expelling the king he had left, and setting upon the throne the prince whose claim he espoused; but when he saw how little he was considered by those for whom he had done so much, and how obstinate they were in undoing all that he had done, grief, indignation, and resentment, first broke his temper, and then his heart (9).

a On the lots of Barcelona, the friends and the enemies of king Philip began to doubt what turn affairs might take, more especially as a great part of Arragon, and almost all Valentia, gave evident proofs of their inclination to revolt in favour of his competitor. But they began to recover their spirits at Madrid, when it was known what efforts France was determined to make on their behalf. It was then resolved that king Philip should march in person with the army into Catalonia, in order to besiege Barcelona, while the count de Thoulouse, with the French fleet, blocked it up by sea: that the duke of Berwick, with a small army, should watch the motions of the Portuguese, while the duke de Noailles entered Catalonia on the side of France with seven or eight thousand men, in order to hinder the Catalans from disturbing the siege. The queen was to be again left regent, in worse circumstances than ever, for, in reality, she was as much exposed in the capital, as her consort at the head of the army. The plan was certainly well laid; and, notwithstanding all her losses, France took care that on her side it should be well executed; for the duke of Noailles was early in the field, as the count de Thoulouse was at sea; but it was out of the power of king Philip to be so expeditious. The count de la Torres, indeed, took Villa Real in the beginning of January, and the king put himself at the head of his army before the end of February; and yet, through a series of unlucky accidents, the month of April was begun before he arrived in sight of Barcelona, with an army of about 20,000 men, commanded under him by marshal Tesse, and abundantly supplied with artillery, ammunition, and other necessaries, from the fleet. This was one of the most remarkable sieges in the present century, since Charles the third persisted in his resolution of remaining in the place, where he had a strong garrison, and a flying camp under the earl of Peterborough in the neighbourhood. The trenches were opened on the 6th of April; on the 20th of the same month the Catalans found themselves obliged to abandon Montjuic, from which the loss of the city seemed inevitable. But the king's person so animated the besieged, tho' he was almost every day perplexed in pacifying their quarrels, that it held out till the 8th of May, when the fleet of the allies, under the command of vice admiral Leake, appeared upon the coast, which obliged the count of Thoulouse to withdraw with his squadron; notwithstanding which, the army continued the siege till the thirteenth, when it was raised, with the mortifying circumstance of leaving not only their artillery and magazines, but also their hospitals, with a vast number of sick and wounded, whom he recommended to the clemency of the earl of Peterborough, who treated them with the same care and kindness as if they had been his own. This was the greatest misfortune that Philip had hitherto sustained; the rather, because he was obliged to take a vast compass in his retreat, and that the reputation both of the Spanish and French officers suffered by it exceedingly; while, on the other hand, the allies gained great advantage, and the resolution of Charles, by which, out of all doubt Barcelona was preserved, did him great honour in the eyes of Europe.

As the allies had made prodigious efforts to augment their forces in Portugal, and as the army commanded by the duke of Berwick was very weak, the marquis de las Minas and the earl of Galway, having taken possession of Alcantara, resolved to attack Ciudad Rodrigo; which having accomplished, and having received the acceptable news of raising the siege of Barcelona, they continued their march to Salamanca, of which they became masters on the 7th of June. It being evident that they intended to push their good fortune, and to make themselves masters of Madrid, the French ambassador, Mr. Amelot, held a kind of general assembly of the grantees, in which he desired them to explain themselves clearly, for that his most Christian majesty did not desire to impose his grandson upon them; and, if he did, his circumstances at that time left it no way in his power; so that it was become both expedient and necessary for them to consider for whom, and in what manner, they would act for restoring peace, and the blessings of a legal government to their country. The duke de Medina Celi answered, in the name of the grantees, that though they wanted not some reasons of complaint, arising from the slights they had received, and from the too great influence of the princess of Ursins, yet their affections continued inviolable to king Philip, for whose service they were willing to do all that lay in their power. The king himself arrived about this time, having left the remains of his army in Navarre; and, after mature deliberation, sent away the queen and her family to Burgos on the 18th of the same month, under a good escort, and took the same route himself the next day.

The army of the allies, upon his retreat, entered, and took possession of Madrid, after sending express upon express to invite king Charles to come thither without delay; but that monarch being engaged in the reduction of the kingdom of Arragon, and being desirous of Philip recovers his capital. making his public entry as he did into Saragossa, made less haste than they expected, and the earl of Peterborough being also busy in subduing Valencia, they found their hopes frustrated of seeing their whole forces united while they were masters of the capital ^a. They had, however, the satisfaction of learning that Cartagena and Alicant were subdued, and of seeing Toledo for some days in their power. But the scene was quickly changed, through the activity of king Philip, and the abilities of the duke of Berwick, who, after retreating far enough to be joined by the troops from Navarre, and being, by that junction, become superior to the allies, began in their turn to advance towards Madrid, which, for want of subsistence, the allies were forced to quit, and to retreat to the strong camp of Guadalaxara, where they were joined by king Charles, and soon after by the earl of Peterborough; notwithstanding which, through the weakness of their forces, or misintelligence amongst their generals, they still continued their retreat, which gave the duke of Berwick an opportunity of penetrating with his army into Valencia, ^b while king Philip returned to Madrid, into which he made his public entry on the 22d of September ¹. One of the first steps taken upon his return was, to send the duke of Osuna with a troop of guards to remove the queen dowager from Toledo, and to conduct her to Burgos. The people of the first-mentioned city had taken it into their heads, that she invited the Portuguese into Castile; and this afforded the court a pretence, under colour of providing for her safety, to carry her first to Burgos, and from thence to Bayonne, where she was received with all possible testimonies of joy and respect, and where she lived in great tranquillity upon her annuity of four hundred thousand pieces of eight ^m. Before the end of the year count Mahony, who had gallantly defended Alicant, made himself master ^c of Cartagena, and the marquis de Baye recovered Alcantara from the Portuguese. These small successes, however, made no amends for the loss of the islands of Majorca and Ivica, of the Low Countries, in consequence of the battle of Ramillies, and of the duchy of Milan, which followed upon the defeat of the army of the two crowns before Turin ⁿ.

Methods pursued by him, in order to re-establish his affairs. It must be allowed, that king Philip, by the advice probably of cardinal Portocarrero, availed himself prodigiously, at the beginning of this year, of those disgraces which had been suffered in the last. He confiscated the estates of the conde de Oropesa, the conde de Cordona, the conde de Cisuentes, and, in general, of all the nobility that had declared for Charles III. and obliged their families to quit Castile, and retire to Barcelona; which was alleged to be a necessary severity, to prevent that kind of intelligence which might have been fatal to his affairs ^o. He annexed several hereditary offices of great profit to the crown, which, though at any other time it would have been liable to censure, was now applauded. He drew great sums from the clergy, by an adroit management of the danger they were under, if the arms of heretics should prevail. He solicited the voluntary assistance of his subjects, and accepted very graciously the smallest marks of it, either in money or in men ^p. Some fortunate circumstances concurred with these endeavours; a few ships from America arrived safely at Brest, and they brought a free gift of a million from the duke of Albuquerque, as a testimony of his subjects loyalty. The count de Villars, brother to the marshal, recovered the island of Minorca, which had revolted; and the queen's pregnancy was declared, which filled the people with joy and hopes ^q. On the 18th of April the duke of Orleans, afterwards regent of France, arrived at Madrid, where the king ^c caused him to be received as an infant of Castile ^r.

Marshal Berwick beats the army of the allies in the plains of Almanza. MARSHAL Berwick was in the field with the army, to prevent the enemy from returning into Castile; and, when joined by the troops he expected, to proceed in the conquest of the kingdom of Valencia. The marquis de las Minas and the earl of Galway, with about sixteen thousand horse and foot, began the campaign early, in hopes of destroying the Spanish magazines, and covering the kingdom of Valencia. They did destroy several magazines, which they had better have kept, since they afterwards resolved to besiege the castle of Villuna. It was a place of little strength, and no great consequence, yet the duke of Berwick marched to relieve it, for he knew the allies wanted subsistence, and thought their retreat before him would raise the spirits of his soldiers, and add reputation to his arms. The earl of Galway was for fighting, and prevailed upon the other generals to come into his opinion, upon which they advanced into the plain of Almanza, where they attacked the duke of Berwick on the 25th of April. The English troops, at the beginning of the action, penetrated through the centre of the Spanish army; but the Spanish cavalry having broke the Portuguese, and the French infantry making a dreadful fire upon their flanks, the army of the allies was at last broke, and, when it was almost dark, began their retreat. Colonel Hill carried off the remains of thirteen battalions towards the river Xucar, which, if they could have passed, they

- a might have been safe; but as they marched in the morning as soon as it was light, and had fought till it was dark, their fatigue obliged them to halt; and this gave the Spaniards an opportunity to surround them, so that they were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. In short, the victory was complete; there was a great number killed and wounded, several thousands taken prisoners, many of whom were French, who had taken service with the allies after the defeats of Hochstet and Ramillies, and who, returning to their standards, replaced those who had fallen in the battle. The marquis de las Minas was dangerously wounded, and his mistress, in the garb of an amazon, killed by his side. The earl of Galway had two cuts cross the face, which, though not dangerous, hindered him from seeing, or giving orders. One hundred and twenty standards, with all the artillery and baggage, were taken. The duke of Orleans, b tho' he did not arrive time enough to have a share in the battle, came very opportunely to improve its consequences, and, in that respect, did all that could be desired^c.

THE town of Requena was the first that surrendered to the duke of Orleans; this was followed by the capital, and most other places in Valentia, except Xativa, Denia, and Alicant. The duke then entered the kingdom of Arragon, where Saragossa opened its gates on the 25th. The duke of Noailles recovered Cerdagna, and the marquis de Baye retook Castel Rodrigo from the Portuguese. Thus the kingdoms of Valentia and Arragon were once more obliged to their own Don Philip, who made them pay very severely for embracing the cause of his competitor; and for some affronts which they had offered to his government, the city of Saragossa was obliged to pay forty-five thousand pistoles, and the rest of the kingdom ninety-thousand^d. In Valentia, the town and castle of Xativa being reduced, the whole place was burnt down, except the church, and one hundred and thirty houses belonging to those who had been disarmed, and made prisoners, for not concurring with the rest, and a column of infamy erected; but these were slight things in comparison of depriving both the kingdoms of their constitution, and subjecting them for the future to the laws of Castile. This was done by a decree dated the 29th of June, which was softened by another dated the 29th of July, by which the nobility of Arragon and Valentia were rendered capable of all offices and honours throughout the king's dominions, and leave was given to rebuild the town of Xativa, under the name of St. Philip^e.

- ON the 25th of August the queen was delivered of a prince, who was baptized by the name of Lewis, and immediately acknowledged presumptive heir apparent of the crown of Castile and its dependencies. Cardinal Portocarrero, upon this occasion, made a present of five thousand pistoles to the king's treasury; his example was followed by most of the grandees, and all the cities and great towns. Some of the nobility, who had withdrawn themselves, took this opportunity of making their peace; king Philip accepted their presents, and, to shew how much he was of their mind, ordered the duke of Infantado to be released, and recalled the conde de Lemos, the marquis del Carpio, and the rest of the exiles. He dispatched the first courier, with the news to the queen dowager at Bayonne, who made public rejoicings^f for three days, sent two of her gentlemen to compliment their majesties, with very rich presents for the queen and prince. On the 13th of October, Lerida surrendered to the duke of Orleans, as the castle did a month after, on the very day that, through the intrigues of the princess of Ursins, he received the king's orders to raise the siege; and the beginning of the month following he set out for Paris^g. About this time Charles III. espoused the princess of Wolfenbuttle, and, by his return from the army to Barcelona, stifled a dangerous sedition, occasioned by the people's apprehensions that they were abandoned, and that Catalonia would be exposed to the same chastisements the people of Arragon and Valentia had endured. This year also the kingdom of Naples revolted; and the duke of Escalona, being taken in Gaeta by count Daun, was, after being threatened with hanging, exposed on horseback, through the streets of Naples, to the insults of the populace, and then thrust into a prison, though he was a nobleman of the most unspotted character, and one who had never enriched himself at their expence. This revolution, though it cost Spain dear, saved Toulon, which was perhaps of equal consequence, even to king Philip^h.

AT the opening of this year the court of Madrid was very sensibly chagrined by the loss of the fortrefs of Oran, which for so many years had been defended against the Moors. This was owing to the desertion of the count of Santa Cruz, who carried the small squadron, and little body of troops with which he was intrusted for its relief, to Charles III. at *Barcelona*ⁱ. The duke of Orleans obtained at Paris a supply of five millions, that is, about two hundred and forty

The duke, when he came to the army, found things in a condition very different from what he expected, and was farther disappointed by the loss of a great convoy of provisions and ammunition, the greatest part of which was taken by the English fleet^a. The same fleet landed at Barcelona count Starembergh, an officer of great abilities and great reputation, who immediately took the command of the troops in Catalonia, and disposed things in such a manner, as to give the duke of Orleans all the trouble he could. This did not, however, hinder that prince from besieging Tortosa, a large place, well fortified, and exceedingly strong by situation. The siege was carried on slowly and cautiously; for, on one side, his royal highness was extremely sparing of men's lives, and, on the other, he respected the neighbourhood of count Starembergh, which obliged him to be constantly on his guard. On the 11th of July the place was taken, notwithstanding the duke received scarce any assistance from Madrid, where the princess of Ursins had insinuated to king Philip, that he had as much to fear from the duke of Orleans as from Charles III.; and tho' it is said the king was afterwards disabused upon this head, yet, on the duke's return from the campaign, he met with so dry a reception, that he quickly set out for Paris^b. The chevalier de Arsfeldt took Denia by storm, and put all the garrison and a great part of the people to the sword. After this he besieged Alicant, which was surrendered upon honourable terms; but being informed that the Spanish troops in Minorca had been put under arrest, on account of what he had done at Xativa, he sent a detachment of horse after the garrison of Alicant, and seized them in like manner. At Barcelona, Charles III. received his new queen in a very pompous manner; soon after which the duke de Moles was declared his prime minister, in the room of the count de Oropesa, who died suddenly^c. The intrigues of his party, but more especially the monks, caused an insurrection in Sardinia; so that the marquis of Jamaica, the governor of it, finding himself abandoned, embraced the offer of an English admiral to carry him to Spain on board his fleet. He was first brought to Barcelona, where king Charles would willingly have detained him, but, insisting on his capitulation, he was allowed to go to Madrid, where, to the amazement of Philip's court, he was very well received^d. General Stanbope, without any great difficulty, made himself master of the island of Minorca; and no endeavours were spared to bring about a revolution in Sicily; upon which count Mahoni was sent thither with a considerable force. Count Starembergh, who knew his army too weak to prevent the duke of Orleans's taking Tortosa, thought it strong enough to attempt the recovery of that important place; which he did on the 4th of December, and was near succeeding, but, thro' the care and courage of the governor, was at length repulsed, though it cost that brave man his life. There was no action this year on the side of Portugal; but, to console king Philip for the losses he had sustained, the galleons arrived safe, by which he acquired twelve hundred thousand pieces of eight, exclusive of nine hundred thousand sent as a present to the young prince of Asturias, whose birth had already brought him many other advantages, and of whom the Spaniards were so fond, that he was forced to be shewn to them from the balcony of the palace when he was scarce a week old^e.

King Philip, by the advice of cardinal Portocarrero, puts himself on the affections of his own people. 1709.

It had been the misfortune of king Philip to be distressed, from the very beginning of his reign, in point of revenues; and this distress had gone on increasing, notwithstanding all the methods that could be devised to prevent it, till, at the beginning of this year, things were found in such a situation, that it was equally difficult to find recruits for the army or subsistence for those regiments that wanted recruits. In all other respects the king's affairs were equally embarrassed; so that cardinal Portocarrero, and the grandees most sincerely attached to this interest, could testify it no other way than by giving him, as they did, the strongest assurances that they would perish with him. Out of this distress his enemies delivered him; his grandfather consented to treat of a peace; and the terms prescribed to him were, to treat of it on the foot of abandoning his grandson. He was compelled to submit, and, exclusive of the negotiation, his necessities were such, that he could no longer yield him any supplies, and was constrained to withdraw part of his forces. Cardinal Portocarrero hinted to king Philip, that he should seize this opportunity of putting his affairs intirely on a Spanish bottom. The king took his advice; the duke de Medina Celi was declared prime minister; the marquis de Bedmar secretary at war; the French ambassador was excluded from council, and sent home; some domestics of the duke of Orleans were arrested, imprisoned, and treated with great severity. To complete all, as soon as the preliminaries were made public, and dispersed by the allies, king a Philip addressed a circular letter to his subjects, penned with great plainness, and in terms the most pathetic. In this he exaggerated the hardships put upon his grandfather, not only to abandon him absolutely, but to assist in dethroning him; yet, in this, he said, the allies did him honour, since it shewed their opinion that he would defend himself to the last extremity; which he assured them was his intention, and that he was resolved to die at the head of the last Spanish squadron, and to tinge the dear earth of Castile with his blood. This had its effect; for the enthusiasm of this declaration diffused itself through the whole nation. The general assembly of the clergy not only granted a free gift, but the prelates, and those who were able, paid it upon the spot. The nobility sent their plate to be coined; the middle and the common sort of people acted with the like spirit, for the king had told them in his letter, that the allies had promised the duke of Savoy and the king of Portugal handsome rewards out of the Spanish dominions; that the emperor would take what he pleased; and that the archduke was to be content with the rest, upon such terms as those who conquered it for them should be inclined to dictate. The putting things into this form was the last service rendered by cardinal Portocarrero, who died in the month of September, at the age of seventy-four, and was succeeded in the see of Toledo by Don Antonio Ibamiez, archbishop of Saragossa, and inquisitor-general ^f. In respect to military affairs, there happened nothing material. Marshal Berzons commanded the army of the two crowns, and he had instructions from Lewis XIV. not to act offensively. Count Staremborg, with his army, passed two rivers in his sight; upon which king Philip wrote the marshal a very smart letter, and went in person to the army, where, tho' he was able to do nothing, yet this stroke of vivacity pleased the Spaniards highly. However, the castle of Alicant, after a blockade of several months, surrendered to the chevalier d'Arfeldt; and the marquis de Baye beat the earl of Galway and the Portuguese army in the plain of Gudina, and made fifteen hundred prisoners, which prevented their besieging Badajoz. Vast levies were made, and all possible precautions taken, in the winter, to act with the greatest vigour in the spring, more especially in Catalonia, where king Charles was master only of Barcelona, Gironne, and Tarragona, covered by the small army of count Staremborg, who very wisely waited for supplies ^g.

At the opening of the year, Monsieur d'Iberville arrived at Madrid, with the title of The prime minister ^h envoy extraordinary from his most Christian majesty; the king received him in public but very coldly, and, upon his demanding a private audience, referred him to the duke of Medina Cæli. The business of this minister was to qualify the offer that his master had made, of depositing cautionary towns in the hands of the states, till his grandson was driven out of Spain, and to furnish the expences of the war. His stay was but short; king Philip withdrew his countenance from the French; and the queen, giving way to her repentment, went somewhat farther, and treated them so ill; that some returned home ⁱ. Philip did not think fit to publish another circular letter; but in a short edict for raising recruits, he declared that his sole resources were the unshaken fidelity and heroic courage of the Spanish nation ^j. There wanted not some, however, who insinuated, that he used this language only in compliance with his circumstances; but it fell out luckily, that the flotilla arrived on the 2d of March at Cadiz, with about ten millions on board. Two of these ships were French, and were very desirous of sailing home with their cargoes, which however the king obliged them to debark, and insisted upon an extraordinary indulto, which the captains refusing to pay, they were put in prison. These proceedings gratified the Spaniards extremely; and the king drew out of the money about two millions, which were of inexpressible service at that juncture ^k. It was resolved that the marquis de Baye should command in Estremadura against the Portuguese; and the marquis de Villedarias the grand army in Catalonia, which consisted of twenty-three thousand men, under the king, who resolved to make the campaign in person. The marquis set out from Madrid on the 15th. of April, in the evening of which day there happened a very extraordinary event. About eight at night the king sent for the duke of Medina Cæli into his cabinet, and, after having conferred with him for some time, directed him to go to the secretary of state's office about certain dispatches. The duke no sooner came thither, than he was arrested, and conducted in a coach and six out of town, to a castle on the road to Segovia. When the officer parted from him, he furnished him with a night-gown, a box of chocolate, a purse with a hundred pistoles, and some other necessaries; for which civility, when the duke testified great acknowledgements, the officer told him they belonged to the king, who had taken care to provide them for him. As this nobleman was prime minister, and governor to the prince of Asturias, this affair made a very great noise, and it was said that he had undertaken to betray the king or the prince into the hands of their ene-mies¹. It is certain that his misfortune arose from a letter delivered to the king by the confessor of the marquis of Astorga, who died that morning, and whose sister the duke had married. The junto appointed to examine his papers condemned him four months after to suffer death, for giving intelligence to the king's enemies, particularly with respect to the real intentions of his most Christian majesty; but the king changed this sentence into imprisonment, and, being transferred from Segovia to Pampeluna, and thence to Fontarabia, he there ended his days^m.

King Philip's
army totally defeated near Saragossa by
rembergh.

THIS strange affair prevented the king from going so soon to the army as otherwise he would have done; and, when he came thither, he found the weather so bad, that he was able to make but little use of his superiority over count Starembergh. However he took Cervera, where he found a magazine of cloaths and linen for four thousand men; but he was not able to make the siege of Balaguer. After count Starembergh had received the supplies he expected, the face of affairs quickly changed, and he began to act offensively; and a part of Philip's forces received a severe check at Almanara, by the vigour and good conduct of general Stanhope; which gave the king so indifferent an opinion of the marquis of Villadarias, that he sent for the marquis de Baye, and gave him the command of the army, which, for want of subsistence, was obliged to march to Saragossa. Near that city, on the 20th of August, they were defeated by count *Starembergh*ⁿ. The armies were nearly equal, and neither of the kings were in the action; for Philip was ill of a fever, and the generals of Charles III. would not suffer him to expose his person. The marquis de Baye made the best retreat he could to Lerida, where, after some days, he assembled about nine thousand men; but the king immediately set out for Madrid, where, notwithstanding his misfortune, he was received with great joy. Upon the news, however, that the allies were in full march for that capital, he found it necessary to quit it with his queen and family, followed by all the grandees and councils, on the 9th of September^o. The marquis de Baye, as soon as his troops were in a condition to move, prosecuted his march to Tudela, on the side of Navarre, where, by the activity of the count d'Aguilar, the army was recruited in a surprising short space of time; and the duke of Vendosme, being arrived from France, began to advance towards Valladolid with an escorte of about three thousand horse, which king Philip withdrew from the army in Andalusia (C).

(C) The affairs of a prince could scarce be in a worse condition than those of king Philip after the battle of Saragossa. It will contribute to the reader's information, as well as amusement, to have some particulars relating to this subject set in a true light. The shock at Almanara affected the spirits of the Spanish troops very much, as they relied chiefly upon their cavalry, who had been fairly beat by the English and Dutch (1). It was this induced them to encamp almost at the gates of Saragossa, where such precautions were used in posting the troops, that, from the prudence of count Starembergh, it was concluded, that he would not attack them; and, this being publicly discoursed in the army, they were half-beaten when attacked. The Walloon regiments, upon which they most depended, finding their communication with the army cut off, threw down their arms and surrendered prisoners of war. This was another terrible misfortune, as they were looked upon to be the best infantry in the army (2). Saragossa revolted behind them while they were yet engaged, and, as soon as they were broke, they found it the same thing as if they had been in an enemy's country, the peasants doing them all the mischief that was in their power. The marquis de Baye, with the shattered remains of the army, could not have defended Navarre, if the allies had followed him. King Philip went in a manner alone to Madrid, a place of no strength, and without troops: he was still indisposed, could hope for little assistance from France, found several great lords inclined to make terms with the conqueror; and, in fine, was without money, without an army, and without resource. The princess of Ursins, a woman of a high spirit, is said to have exerted herself to a degree of indecorum in speaking to the king. She told him, that a crown was never to be resigned but with life; that, as things promised fair at the beginning of the campaign, fortune might come about again before the end of it; and that his own firmness and diligence, operating upon the despair of his subjects, might recover all. The queen abhorred the thoughts of being otherwise; and perhaps abhorred still more the thoughts of living as a suppliant in the court of France, subject to the humours of her sister; which transported her so far, that, when she went out of Madrid, she held out her son to the people, and said, "When the kingdom is lost, I will die, with my infant in my arms, in his own hereditary mountains of Aspasia". (3). Before they got to Burgos, they had the consolation of knowing that their own condition was hardly worse than that of king Charles, a letter of his own being intercepted, written to his queen at Barcelona, importing, that he was carried to Madrid against his will; that the soldiers had been without bread for two days; and that his victorious army was mouldering away with sickness, famine, and fatigue (4). After all, when Spain had been lost by a numerous, regular, well-disciplined army, it was recovered the same campaign by raw and fresh-raised troops, conducted by excellent officers, who made the utmost advantage of every error the enemy committed, and of every inconvenience to which they were exposed (5).

a It is impossible for human wisdom to foresee the consequences of great events, and, whatever politicians might afterwards pretend, it was impossible they should so much as suspect that the battle of Saragossa would prove the ruin of his competitor's affairs, and become the means of fixing Philip V. upon the throne; and yet this was actually the case. General Charles the Stanhope vehemently pressed marching directly to Madrid, to which it is said neither king third takes Charles nor count Starembergh were inclined, as having no magazines, and being to march possession of through a country so disaffected, that the people burnt their corn, and starved themselves, to Madrid and prevent the allies from having any thing to eat. General Stanhope prevailed, and the march Toledo, but was resolved. He took it for granted that the Portuguese army would advance and join is not able to them, and that this might have opened a free communication with Portugal. But, after some keep them.
 b deliberation, the court of Lisbon absolutely rejected this measure, though general Stanhope had advanced with a strong detachment to favour this junction. He then demanded a thousand horse and three thousand foot from that army, which was refused. Lastly, he asked the troops of the maritime powers, and their ministers at Lisbon offered to defray the expence; but this was likewise denied. King Charles remained about six weeks at Madrid, where his necessities obliged him to tax the inhabitants at forty-two thousand pieces of eight per month.
 At length it was found requisite to retire, and to quit both that city and Toledo. On the 11th of November king Charles, under an escorte of a thousand horse, set out for Barcelona, upon intelligence that the duke of Noailles was on the point of entering Catalonia with an army ^p. Soon after the king was withdrawn, the army of the allies marched to Gua- c dalaxara.

KING Philip and the duke of Vendosme marched with numerous forces from Valladolid, and, King Philip knowing the great distress of the people, sent a vast convoy of provisions before them to Ma- drid. The people received him with frantic demonstrations of joy, and, crowding about the takes gen coach of the duke of Vendosme, saluted him prophetically the deliverer of Spain ^{Stanhope as}. King Philip Brihuega, and lost no time in passing the Tagus, and surrounding general Stanhope with eight battalions and beats count four regiments of horse and dragoons, on the 9th of December, in the little town of Brihuega. Starembergh,
 They made a great and glorious defence, disputing every inch of ground in the streets. At at Villavi- length the people of the place barricaded their doors, and, beating up the tops of their houses, ciosa.
 threw the tiles and stones upon their heads, which obliged them to surrender prisoners of war; but they were allowed to keep their baggage. Count Staremberg, upon hearing that they were invested, marched back to their relief; upon which the duke of Vendosme ordered the cavalry to march, and form themselves before Villaviciosa, whither the infantry followed as fast as it was d possible. King Philip commanded the right in person, having under him the marquis de Val- decanas, captain-general; the duke of Vendosme was on the left, with the count de Aguilar; the conde de la Torres and the marquis de Thouy, both captain-generals, were in the centre. This action, which happened on the 10th of December, began about three in the afternoon. The king quickly forced the left wing of the allies, defeated them intirely, took the generals Belcastle and St. Amand prisoners; but the right and the centre made a gallant defence, and, night coming on, count Staremberg made a slow and well-conducted retreat. He sent such a relation of this action to Barcelona, that they sung Te Deum, and made rejoicings for the victory, which certainly was not on their side, all their cannon and most part of their baggage being taken, with a great num-e thousand men. This action closed the campaign, and secured to king Philip all Arragon, which had again revolted after his defeat, very near the same place where this important victory was gained ^r.

THE duke of Noailles, who had opened his trenches before Gironne on the 23d of December, Both courts found himself in a very critical situation; obstinately opposed by a strong garrison, under the busy in prepa- command of general Tattonbach, within the place; in frequent danger of having his own com- ration, but munication with the country behind him cut off by the Miquelets; and at last himself and neither for- his army in the utmost perils from the inundations. His firmness and prudence overcame ward in action.
 with much ado all these obstacles; so that at length he made himself master of the lower town on the 23d, and of the upper, by capitulation, on the 25th, of January. The news of this f was very acceptable to king Philip, who kept his court at Saragossa, and who had sent for his queen thither ^s. The duke of Vendosme retired to that city, in order to confer with him about the operations of the campaign, and to determine whether Tarragona or Barcelona should be first besieged. The princess of Ursins, who was a declared enemy to this prince, pretended sickness, that she might avoid coming to Saragossa, before he took the field. The arrival of a A. D. 1711 flotilla at Cadiz put it in the power of king Philip to give a real proof of his gratitude to the duke; and he did it at a review, by putting into his hands an order for 50,000 pieces of eight for his equipage. The duke was somewhat surpris'd, but, turning suddenly to the line, "These," said he, "are those brave men that fixed the fortune of Spain at Villaviciosa; and these only are worthy of the king's favour;" which he caused to be distributed in necessities amongst the private men^c. After all this, the campaign was spent in little more than preparations, which was chiefly owing to the death of the emperor Joseph, on the 17th of April, soon after which there were secret negotiations for a peace^a. Charles III. quitted Barcelona, in order to return into his hereditary dominions, but left his queen there, and declared count Staremburg his viceroy. A little before his departure he fell into suspicion of some of the Spaniards about him, and carried this so far, as to cause the duke of Moles, his secretary, to be arrested. On the other hand, the duke of Uzeda, who had been king Philip's ambassador at Rome, and had quitted that city to retire to Genoa, upon the pope's being obliged to acknowledge Charles III. to the surprize of all the world, quitted that city, to come and acknowledge the same prince himself^b. The queen being much indisposed, the king passed a great part of the summer with her and the prince of Asturias at Corella, for the benefit of the waters. From thence, in October, they proceeded to Aranjuez, and returned from thence to Madrid. About this time marshal Staremburg formed a scheme for recovering Tortosa, and burning all the Spanish magazines; which he had certainly effected, if the duke of Vendosme's steward, who had obtained a passport for going into the camp of the allies, in order to procure fresh fish for his master, had not overheard something of it, which he communicated to the duke by the trumpet that was sent with him, who gave timely notice to the governor, which prevented the surprize, and cost the allies the lives of some hundred men^c. At the close of the year king Philip had upwards of thirty, and king Charles upwards of twenty, thousand regular troops in Catalonia, where the latter possessed only Barcelona, Tarragona, and Montalban.

Negotiations for a peace, upon which king Charles
the third quits Catalonia.
A. D. 1712.

AT the very beginning of the year, that is, in the month of January, the congress for a general peace, the preliminaries of which were already settled, was opened, with the accustomed ceremonies, at Utrecht^d. King Philip had named the marquis of Monteleon, and other plenipotentiaries; but they did not repair thither, as being apprised, that, till the king's title was acknowledged, they could not have been received. The difficulties of raising money were to the full as great as they had ever been; and perhaps it would have been a point too hard for all their politicians to accomplish, if, in the month of March, the galleons had not arrived at Cadiz, under the escort of Monsieur de Casse^e. The king's necessities forced him to take a high indulto, which, though not very willingly, was paid, and enabled the duke of Vendosme to resume the military preparations, which had been suspended in a manner for some time for want of money. About this time the king disgraced the conde d'Aguilar, lieutenant-general and captain of his guards, knight of the Golden Fleece, and generally esteemed the best officer in Spain. This occasioned a great noise, and no small discontent, for his fidelity, his courage, and his conduct, were without reproach; his only fault lay in his temper; the king had supported him against the duke of Orleans and marshal Bezons, but he would not support him against the duke of Vendosme. He submitted with great duty; and, when he resigned his command, said, "As it is your majesty's pleasure, I am content; if it proves for your service, I shall rejoice." He retired to his own house, and spent the remainder of his days as a philosopher, and died as much beloved as he had always been esteemed^f. The king's affairs in Catalonia went but indifferently: count Staremburg had an army of 24,000 men, with which he formed the siege, or rather the blockade, of Gironne, defended by the marquis de Blancas, now marshal of France, for eight months, under the utmost extremity of famine, till at length the siege was raised^g. As for the army of Spain, it was scarce ever in a condition to take the field, more especially after the death of the duke of Vendosme, which happened suddenly at Vignaros, on the 11th of June, of an apoplexy, as some say, or, as others report, of an indigestion, arising from his eating too heartily of fresh fish. The king ordered him to be interred in the Escorial, with the same honours that had been paid to Don Juan of Austria^h. One great cause of the inactivity of this campaign was, the desire the king had to see the English and Portuguese separated from count Staremburg's army; which at a length happened; and then it was hoped that the Catalans would have submitted, but in that they were deceived.

On the 18th of October lord Lexington arrived at Madrid ^d, and, on the 5th of November, ^e the king, in the presence of his council, signed the act of renunciation ^{nunciatio} in the Cortes, or general assembly of the states. By this act he renounced, for himself, his heirs and successors, all pretensions to, and all power of inheriting, the crown of France, in favour of his brother the duke of Berry, his uncle the duke of Orleans, his cousin the duke of Bourbon, and the rest of the princes of the blood. On the 7th that renunciation was ratified and approved by the assembly of the states, and declared to be a fundamental law for regulating the succession to the dominions of Spain in all times to come. They likewise approved the entail made by that act on the house of Savoy, in case the royal family should become extinct, and the perpetual exclusion of the house of Austria. They farther took this opportunity of altering the rule of succession in another respect, and settled the crown on the next heir male; whereas hitherto females, if nearest in blood, had been capable of succeeding ^f. By this solemn ratification of the king's act, the great obstacle was taken away that retarded the peace, the prospect of which, and the queen's safe delivery of Don Philip, afforded the court and the nation great satisfaction; though they were still at a loss about Catalonia, where they were very unwilling to employ arms, if the possession of that country could have been recovered any other way; as well to avoid provoking the allies, as to take from the Catalans any colour of being obliged to form themselves into a republic for their own security; and it was chiefly with a view to this that the king published a general amnesty, without any reservation or exceptions ^g. The princess of Ursins still maintained herself in the favour of their catholic majesties, though she did not meddle so much or so openly in public business. The king, however, promised, and procured for her, a principality in the Low Countries ^h; notwithstanding that, in the beginning of the year, he had by a solemn act ⁱ transferred the sovereignty of all the Spanish provinces to his electoral highness of Bavaria, in compensation for the great losses he had sustained by his steady attachment to his interests; and the great object of the court was, to get these points settled by the peace.

In order to answer all the great ends of government, there is nothing so requisite as to have the finances in good order. King Philip was sensible of this from the very moment he assumed the royal title to this time; and being also persuaded that nothing could contribute so much to the preservation of peace at home, or procuring respect abroad, as having this point once for all settled, he sent for Mr. Orry a third time out of France, and gave him full powers to regulate the whole revenue of the Spanish monarchy; which he did so effectually, and in so short a time, that he fixed it at forty millions for this year. He likewise framed the military establishment upon the foot of one hundred and twenty battalions and one hundred and thirty squadrons, exclusive of the household troops. He bought, repaired, and equipped, twenty-one men of war and frigates; he provided three hundred pieces of cannon, forty mortars, and prodigious quantities of powder, bullets, and bombs. These regulations were indeed attended with murmurs and complaints, against which the court shut their ears; and indeed the Spanish ministers and grandees were so much surprised, and so well pleased to see the monarchy in such a situation, after so long and so expensive a war, that they confessed it better for some individuals to suffer by the loss of old debts, and the introduction of new methods, than that Spain should continue in that distressed and dejected condition in which they had seen her for a long series of years ^k. The arrival of the galleons was another favourable incident, which, by fixing the indulto so high as eight per cent. produced a very considerable supply; and the duke of Albuquerque, who was just returned from his viceroyalty in the Indies, was obliged to lay down a round sum in gold, to prevent an inquiry into his administration. These circumstances, together with the regularity observed by the generality of the towns in paying their free gifts, when they saw that things were put in order, and that a like regularity was observed in all public payments, spread a spirit of firmness and tranquillity which was visible enough in the language and in the conduct of the ministers, during the negotiation and conclusion of the several treaties of peace by which this long and ruinous war had been ended, on terms much superior to what were expected but the very summer before. This brings us to

of the treaty between the crowns of
Great Britain.

By this treaty their majesties reciprocally acknowledged each other's titles; the catholic king recognized the protestant succession, as settled in the illustrious house of Hanover; revived and restored all the privileges the English nation had enjoyed in the reign of his uncle and predecessor; yielded to the crown of Great Britain, in full dominion and sovereignty, the town and fortrefs of Gibraltar, the island of Minorca, and the harbour and fortrefs of Port-Mahon, on condition that neither Jews nor Moors should be permitted to inhabit in either; that the Roman catholic religion should be permitted and protected in the latter; and that if either or both should be at any time sold or alienated by the crown of Great Britain, the crown of Spain should have a right of pre-emption. His catholic majesty farther granted to the subjects of Great Britain the Affiento de Negros for the space of thirty years, upon the terms, and according to the conditions, mentioned in a certain instrument, which was to have the like force and virtue as if verbally recited in the said treaty. The inhabitants of Catalonia, of all ranks whatsoever, were to have a general amnesty, with the intire and full possession of their honours and estates, with all the privileges then enjoyed, or that might be thereafter granted to the inhabitants of the two Castiles, his majesty's most faithful and best beloved subjects. The treaties of commerce between the two powers were renewed. The island of Sicily, at the special instance and request of her Britannic majesty, was yielded to his royal highness the duke of Savoy, but without a power of alienation, and upon condition that, in case the male line of the house of Savoy failed, it should return to the catholic king. This treaty was signed at Utrecht, by the duke of Osuna and the marquis of Monteleon on one side; and by the bishop of Bristol, lord privy-seal, and the earl of Strafford, her Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries, on the other.

By the treaty with Victor Amadeus the second, duke of Savoy, which was signed the same day, at the same place, his catholic majesty declares, confirms, and renews, his several renunciations in respect to the crown of France, and those made by the princes of the blood in that kingdom, as also the new rule of succession, by which that prince and his family were called to the throne of Spain. He likewise yields and transfers, purely, simply, and irrevocably, to the said duke, to the princes his sons, their heirs male, and all the heirs male of the house of Savoy, the kingdom of Sicily, and all the islands adjacent, and dependent thereon; and promises to withdraw the marquis de los Balbases, then viceroy, and to give his

(D) As soon as the preliminaries with Great Britain were signed, the kings Levis and Philip looked upon the peace as made, and not without reason, for they were very sensible that the war in Spain had been made for some campaigns at the expence of Great Britain; and they were also morally certain, that, if it was carried on any longer, it must be carried on in the same way (6). For these reasons Philip was very forward to give that satisfaction which had been demanded on the part of queen Anne, which was the solemn renunciation, for himself and his family, of all rights to the crown of France; he published, therefore, a declaration and decree, both dated on the 18th of July. In the former he gives his subjects to understand, that he had at length hopes of a peace; that these hopes proceeded intirely from the favour of Great Britain; and were attended with the demand of a renunciation either of his rights to the crown of Spain, or to that of France. He affirms, that his grandfather had dissuaded the latter; but that, from the moment it came under his consideration, he determined to prefer Spain, and not barely Spain, but a part of it, to France, and to all the crowns upon earth; that therefore, with the greatest cheerfulness, and without the smallest mixture either of regret or complaint, he had subscribed the decree of renunciation which followed. In the decree he promises, that securing Europe from the danger that must result from the too great power of a monarch having the crowns of France and Spain on his head, was the source of this long war; and it was natural, therefore, to provide in the fullest manner against it, previous to the conclusion of a peace; that, being sensible of the obligations he was under to the Spaniards both for giving him a crown and for sacrificing their lives and fortunes to keep it upon his head, when, through two signal reverses of fortune it was upon the point of falling, he thought himself obliged, as well in point of honour and out of gratitude, as from principles of affection, to comply with the instances made by the queen of Great Britain, in making, with the utmost cheerfulness and sincerity, an authentic renunciation of his own rights, and those of his posterity, to the crown of France, in favour of his brother the duke of Berry, and his uncle the duke of Orleans (7). The like renunciations were made by those princes with respect to their rights to the crown of Spain; and those renunciations were fortified in the strongest manner possible, by the approbation and recognition of the Cortes in Spain, and by their registering the renunciations in France by the king's authority, and with his consent, in all the parliaments of that kingdom (8). It appears, however, clearly, that the British ministers did not so much rely upon the renunciation, as upon their being inserted in the treaty of peace, under the guaranty of the allies, who thereby acquired a right of making them good at all times by force of arms (9).

- a royal highness's possession, immediately after the ratification of the treaty, as also to maintain that possession, and to remit into his royal highness's power all the titles, papers, and documents, that concern the kingdom. On the other hand, his royal highness stipulates not to sell, yield, mortgage, exchange, or otherwise part with, the said kingdom, but to preserve the possession of it, till such time as it devolved to the crown of Spain for want of heirs male, or to a king of Spain of the house of Savoy. His catholic majesty likewise confirms all the cessions made to his royal highness by the emperor Leopold in Italy. To this treaty there is annexed an instrument of cession, subscribed by his catholic majesty on the 10th of June. There are likewise annexed two separate articles, by which his royal highness consents that this treaty shall be void, in case he opposes, directly or indirectly, the intentions of the king of Spain, before the conclusion of the general treaty of peace, as also in case he shall enter into any alliances contrary or prejudicial to the interests of his catholic majesty. We shall hereafter see what consequences these secret articles produced.

Thus Philip, after a tedious war, and many cruel reverses of fortune, became at last master of Spain and the Indies, by the consent of those who had most vigorously opposed him; as, on the other hand, the two crowns were constrained to dismember the Spanish monarchy, and make in effect a new treaty of partition. This, as it restored them to tranquility, was extremely grateful to the bulk of the Spanish nation; tho' there wanted not some who complained of the dear rate at which they had purchased peace, and regretted that diminution of honour which the crown had sustained, notwithstanding they must have been sensible that the loss was inevitable, and that there was great reason to wonder that peace was obtained even upon these terms. Those, however, who did not carry their discontent so high, were not a little troubled at the consideration that many things remained yet unsettled; that, notwithstanding the emperor had the equivalent that was intended him in his hands, he still kept up his claim to the whole monarchy; that as yet the peace was not concluded with Portugal; and that the restitution of a great part of Catalonia was still in a state of uncertainty; so that, after all, the fire was only raked up in its ashes, and its flame might be easily rekindled by any accident that furnished it with fresh fuel. The court was also thoroughly satisfied of this, and very desirous of extinguishing it; but, however, judged very prudently, that great caution was necessary; and that though no time was to be lost, yet nothing ought to be precipitated, more especially as they were persuaded that their new friends were full as desirous as themselves to see this completed, and yet judged, as they did, that a matter of so great consequence ought not to be hurried.

The first, and indeed principal, point was, the bringing about the evacuation of Catalonia by the German troops; and it proved more easy than could have been expected, on account of those circumstances which determined both parties to concur in that measure, who could agree in nothing else. His imperial majesty was desirous of withdrawing his consort, and found it necessary likewise at that juncture to withdraw his troops. A little before the empress embarked, she communicated to the Catalans the emperor's resolution to continue the war, and not to depart from his claim to the Spanish monarchy. To which they returned a very zealous answer, demanding, with the greatest warmth, his coming back to his faithful subjects, and promising to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in his service^a. This was kept very secret at that time, and was in reality one great source of the misfortunes of the Catalans; for, within the compass of the same month, the emperor consented to a convention for evacuating Catalonia, and for the neutrality of Italy, in which it was stipulated, that the imperial troops should embark at such times, and in such manner, on board the English fleet, as should be most convenient to count Staremborg: that a general amnesty should be granted to all the Catalans without exception, and also to the inhabitants of Majorca: that count Staremborg should quit either Barcelona or Tarragona first, as he thought convenient, of which he should give notice to the Spaniards, that they might take possession of the place he quitted, immediately on the withdrawing of his troops; and that he should leave behind him whatever cannon or ammunition belonged to France or Spain. This convention^o was of a very singular nature, since none of the parties took any title therein, but, when spoken of together, are called the powers at war; when separately, the power occupying, or the power retiring; and the due observance of all stipulated therein is guarantied by his most Christian majesty and her Britannic majesty. However, when the imperialists quitted Tarragona, they suffered the Miquelets, as count Staremborg's relation says, to make themselves masters of the place; which indeed they attempted, and in which they were very near succeeding; but the archbishop and the magistrates, foreseeing what the consequences would be, and thinking they had made sacrifices enough already, dispatched an express to the marquis Grimaldi, lieutenant-general of his catholic majesty's forces, who ordered the marquis de Lede to march with six battalions and seven squadrons to secure that city, as he did, and was received by the inhabitants with all the marks of joy imaginable ^a. It was with this marquis of Grimaldi that count Starembergb had signed a convention^c, dated the 22d of June, relative to the evacuation, in which it was stipulated, that the Catalans should be at free liberty to send a deputation to the duke de Popoli, whom the king had appointed their viceroy; but it does not appear that they made any use of it, but, on the contrary, count Starembergb's relation expressly says, that he left the emperor's flags flying on Montjuic, and in the principal posts of Barcelona ^d.

The commons of Barcelona seize that city, and refuse to acknowledge the new government.

In the mean time those who were invested with the government of this province employed their agent, the count de Ferran to solicit Great Britain and Holland for assistance, representing in very strong terms the promises of support that had been made them from time to time by the maritime powers; and, according to the prayer of his memorials, both the queen and the states general did interpose on their behalf. The states, however gave out commissions for 20,000 men; took the Spanish troops of king Charles, that were left behind, into their pay, as they likewise did some Palatines, and their officers; appointed generals of horse and foot, and took all other measures possible for a vigorous defence ^e. It is not easy to discover what their intentions were; the general notion throughout Europe was, that they had a mind to render themselves an independent republic, after the example of Holland, which had been more than once in their heads before; but of this there is no kind of proof: on the contrary, from the language of their public acts, it is manifest they would be understood to mean, that they still considered the emperor as king of Spain, and themselves as his subjects; and therefore their conduct ought to be referred, if not to secret assurances, yet at least to expectations and hopes of succour and support from him; which is so much the more likely, as his imperial majesty procured, or, as the Spaniards say, extorted, the cardinal's hat for the bishop of Barcelona, who was the principal author of those martial resolutions ^f. The nobility and the clergy were of another mind, and were desirous of submitting, not only as it seemed to be the sole measure they had left, but also in point of prudence, that they might reap the benefit of the good offices of the maritime powers. In this, however, they were not able to carry their point.

Declare war against the crowns of France and Spain and are treated as rebels by the latter.

As soon as the court of Madrid had taken their measures for reducing the place, in case of resistance, the duke de Popoli, in quality of general of the army in the principality of Catalonia, summoned the city of Barcelona to open her gates on the 29th of July, on pain of being considered as obstinate rebels; to which the deputation answered, that their city, and the whole principality, persisted in their resolution of continuing the war, in virtue of that fidelity which they had always born to their sovereign ^a. This certainly was very explicit. However, they explained themselves farther, by making an attempt upon Tarragona, in which they miscarried; and at last, upon the 21st of September, they publicly declared war by sound of trumpet against both France and Spain; from which time hostilities were committed on both sides, and the Spaniards took all the precautions possible to block up Barcelona, as far as it was in their power ^b. Lord Lexington, who was still at Madrid with the character of the queen of Great Britain's ambassador extraordinary, renewed his solicitations in favour of the Catalans; and says in his memorial, that it was not consistent with the honour or conscience of his mistress to leave a nation, whom the course of the war had brought into her interests, in a worse condition than she found it; and therefore pressed the king, in consideration of that friendship which God had been pleased to restore between their majesties, to grant those unhappy people their pardon and their privileges. In answer to this memorial, the Spanish ministers insisted upon the treaty, and the offers that had been made them of a general amnesty which they had refused. After this, when lord Lexington was upon the point of his departure, he wrote, with the consent of the court of Spain (though the contrary seems to be insinuated in the letter itself) to the Catalans, in order to persuade them to accept the amnesty, that it might be in his power to intercede for them farther, which he assures them he was inclined to do, though their answer should not reach his hands till he had quitted Madrid, and was come to Lisbon ^c; but it does not appear what effect this letter had, or whether it had any; but about this time his catholic majesty solicited the queen, or at least her ministers, very strongly, to permit some of her ships of war, that were in the Mediterranean, to assist in shutting up the port of Barcelona, and this under pretence that it was a point of no great consequence to the commerce of Great Britain, inasmuch as the Catalans, in their desperate circumstances, had solicited the Moors, and particularly the Algerines, for assistance ^d.

Reasons for concluding here

SUCH was the situation of things at the close of this year, which brings us to a conclusion of the general history of Spain, since, though the treaties with the United Provinces and Por-

^a tugal were not concluded and signed within the compass of it, yet the principal points were settled, and the king was acknowledged; and the reader will find a full account of both in their proper places. He was also so happy as to have another son born this year, viz. the infant Don Ferdinand, on the 23d of September, who afterwards succeeded to the crown of Spain^z, and his affairs in much better condition than, after so tedious and consuming a war, he could well have expected; at the same time that he saw himself courted by his neighbours; and found that the war, in which the emperor persisted against France, delivered him from all apprehensions of seeing himself attacked in his own dominions by so powerful a competitor. He saw the duke of Savoy in possession of the kingdom of Sicily, and from that circumstance attached to his interests; in favour of which likewise other Italian powers had pretty clearly explained themselves; and, which was a circumstance perhaps more satisfactory than all the rest, he found himself the first complete monarch of Spain in a strict and proper sense, since under all his predecessors it was not so much a monarchy as a conjunction of several kingdoms under one chief; and though the difference may not seem great to strangers, yet it was without question a matter of prodigious importance in itself, as the removing the difficulties with which it was attended could scarcely have proved practicable at any other juncture than that in which it was done, and by which alone the king endeared himself so much to his subjects of Castile, that, though the first prince of his house, and a stranger by birth, he found them not only more tractable and complaisant, but really more obedient, and more zealous for his service, than for any of those who had reigned before him, as will manifestly appear when we come to resume this history in the conclusion.

C H A P. II.

The History of Portugal, from its becoming a distinct sovereignty, down to the present times, from their own authors, compared with those of other nations.

S E C T. I.

The history of Portugal, from its being bestowed by Don Alonso VI. king of Leon and Castile, on Henry of Burgundy, with the title only of a county, to the proclamation of Don Alonzo Enriquez, in the plains of Ourique.

^d THE history of Portugal naturally follows that of Spain, of which, with Galicia, it makes the whole western coast; and is consequently very happily seated in a mild and temperate climate, well watered by rivulets and springs, as well as several navigable rivers; in a word, rich, fruitful, and pleasant, in itself, and rendered famous throughout the world by the virtue and valour of its inhabitants.

^e WE find this country constantly stiled in Latin, at least by modern authors, Lusitania, which is not at all amiss, provided we annexed to this word a right idea, and are not led by the sound to conceive, that the modern kingdom of Portugal answered with any degree of accuracy to that province of Spain which was antiently stiled Lusitania; because if we do, instead of giving us a right apprehension of the ancient and modern geography, it will lead us into error and confusion^a. Even in ancient authors Lusitania does not always signify the same part of Spain. In those before the time of Augustus Cæsar, Lusitania seems to be bounded by the ocean on the north, and by the river Tagus on the south; considered in which light it comprehended all Galicia, and excluded two of the six provinces of Portugal^b. But in the stricter and more restrained sense of the word, as we find it used particularly by Pliny, it was bounded on the north by the Durius, now the Douro, and on the south by the river Anas, now the Guadiana^c, in which sense it was not quite so long as Portugal; but to compensate this it was broader, comprehending within the line of its eastern frontiers Norba Cæsarea, Pax Augusta, and Emerita Au- gusta, now stiled Alcantara, Badajos, and Merida ^a. We must also observe, that though a great part of Portugal was comprehended within the dominions of the Suevi, yet these sovereignties were far from being exactly the same, since the Suevi were certainly masters of the best part of Galicia, but do not seem to have taken in the southern part of Portugal; that is, the two provinces beyond the Tagus, as we may collect from their having constantly the ancient city of Bracara, Augusta, or Braga, for their capital ^c.

The true etymology and meaning of the modern appellation.

IN respect to the modern name of Portugal, the etymology and sense of it are very far from being certain or determined. As to the common received opinion, it seems to be founded rather in fancy than in any kind of proof. It is said, that a great number of Gauls landed at Porto, from whence it received the name of Portus Gallorum, or the port of the Gauls, and in process of time, that name gradually extended itself over the country, being softened, or rather shortened, into Portugal ^f. But when this event happened, why these Gauls came thither, and what became of them afterwards, lie all buried in oblivion. It is alleged, however, that upon an eminence which overlooks the mouth of the river Douro, there stood an ancient town called Cale, strong and well peopled, but very ill seated for trade, and this occasioned the construction of a lower town or hamlet, which was called Portus Cale, that is, the haven of Cale, and in process of time Portucalia ^g. At length becoming so considerable as to merit an episcopal chair, these bishops subscribed themselves, as the records of ancient councils testify, Portucalenses, and the name of the city was transferred to the diocese, which was stiled Portucalia ^h. It is true, that after this these bishops changed their stile, and wrote themselves Portuenses, that is, bishops of Porto. But the before-mentioned facts are actually set down in ancient and authentic histories; and as the diocese of Portucalia comprehended in a great measure that little country in which the sovereignty originally began, the name extended itself, together with their acquisitions, and has remained to the kingdom, though, in process of time, a new name has prevailed with respect to the diocese, and perhaps this distinction arose from thence.

Great difference between the country originally so called, and that which now bears that name.

PORTUGAL, even in its present condition, and with the addition of Algarve, is but a small kingdom, though certainly the most considerable of any honoured with that title in Spain: but small as it is, we shall in the course of this history demonstrate, that it is incomparably greater than that in which the sovereignty began, and which, to say the truth, was nearly the same with the province between the Minio and the Douro, small in extent, but happy in situation; and so pleasant and fertile, that it has been sometimes stiled Medulla Hispanica, or the Marrow of Spain ⁱ. We shall shortly have occasion to describe it more particularly in a manner that will fully justify this appellation; neither ought it to be considered as any diminution of the credit of this monarchy, that it rose from so small and so weak an origin; but quite the contrary, since the same thing happened to the kingdoms of Oviedo, Leon, Arragon, Navarre, and Castile, as we have already shewn, and all from the same cause, as they were gradually increased and enlarged at the expence of the Moors, by the prevalence of Christian arms, and by the courage and conduct of a long series of wise and warlike princes, who, by an indefatigable pursuit of honour, aggrandized themselves and their subjects, till by degrees, from inferior titles and small principalities, they rose into the rank of great kings, and extended their own authority and the influence of their subjects into all the quarters of the known world ^k.

From hence it appears the same country has not been both a county and a kingdom.

THE reader will discern from hence into how great an impropriety those writers fall who tell us, that Portugal was first a county, then a duchy, and at length a kingdom ^l. For this is not at all true of the same country, that is, the territory of which Henry of Burgundy gained the possession, in right of his wife and by the gift of her father, with the title of count, never became either duchy or kingdom: neither do we read in any author of antiquity, that Henry or his son Don Alonso were stiled dukes, and if they were stiled so in Latin, we must consider, that the word Dux is differently used, as expressing sometimes a dignity, and at others only a command. The truth is, that Don Alonso having extended his territories, augmented his power, and established his reputation by gaining a glorious and complete victory over the Moors, was saluted king by his soldiers in the field, which title was confirmed to him afterwards with great solemnity by his people, as will appear in its proper place ^m. But even at this time his dominions were much larger than those left him by his father, and his views incomparably more extensive, many of which he lived to accomplish, and left the rest to be achieved by his successors, to whom he transmitted the regal title and power, and with them that plan of conquest, which was executed in its utmost extent ⁿ. To some, perhaps these particulars may appear very minute, and yet it is for want of descending to these, that, generally a speaking, the histories of nations are so indistinctly and confusedly understood, and errors being taken up either through the mistake of facts, or by supplying from conjecture such necessary circumstances, as, through a desire of brevity, were omitted, continue afterwards to infect the mind, and to produce a series of misapprehensions, that never can be corrected or purged out.

b THE Spanish and Portuguese historians agree, that Don Alonso, king of Leon and Castile, and son to Don Ferdinand the Great, bestowed his daughter Donna Theresa in marriage upon an illustrious stranger Don Henry, and gave him with her the frontier province, which he had conquered from the Moors, lying south of the river Minbo or Minio, with the title of count. But notwithstanding their unanimity in this particular, they differ extremely about all the circumstances that relate to it. They cannot agree who this Don Henry was, or at what time he came into Spain ° (A). The Spanish historians are clear, that Donna Theresa was the king's natural daughter by Donna Ximena Guzman; while the Portuguese are as clear, that she was his legitimate daughter, and that Donna Ximena was his wife, though divorced from him afterwards by the Pope † (B). There is as little harmony amongst them in respect to the time

(A) In this note we shall endeavour to give the reader a tolerable account who this Henry of Burgundy was, and at what time he left France to go to the court of the king of Leon and Castile. As to his family, the bishops Don Roderic Sanchez and Don Alonso de Cartagena (1) assert, he was of the house of Lorrain, but do not mention who were his parents. Duardi Galvan, the ancient chronologist of Portugal, affirms he was second son to a king of Hungary; which opinion the famous poet Camoens, in his Lusiads, follows. Damianus de Goes, in the life of king Emanuel, says, he was son to William, baron of Joinville, and duke of Lorrain, and Abida of Champagne. James de Valera, and Antonio Beuter, bring him from Constantinople, grounding their opinion upon the history of Spain, writ by king Alonso, mistaking a quotation from the archbishop Don Roderic (2), who writes, that he was of the Bisantine province, meaning Besancon, the capital of Burgundy, which they take for Bisantium, or Constantinople. Wolfgangus Laxius inclines to think he was of Limburgh (3). Duarte Nunez de Leon, endeavours to prove that he was grandson to Reginald, earl of Burgundy, by his son Guido, earl of Vernerville in Normandy. Lewis Gollut, in his history of that earldom, says, he was brother to Raymond, both sons to earl William. All these doubts are cleared by the chronicle of Fleury (4), which being a fragment of French history, was writ in the time of this count Henry, for the author speaks as an eye witness of the three suns that were seen at the town of Scyrs, on the banks of the river Garrone, in the year 1108. It was wrote by a famous Benedictine monk, of that convent, and reaches from the year 897, till the year 1110. By this ancient manuscript it appears, that Robert, the first duke of Burgundy, younger brother to king Henry I. of France, had, by his wife Hermengarda, one only son, called Henry, who died before his father, leaving five sons by his wife Sibila, daughter to Reginald, or Rainald, count of Burgundy. These were Hugo, heir to his grandfather, who became a monk of Cluni, and died in the year 1092; Eudo, or Otho, who succeeded his elder brother; Robert, bishop of Langres; Henry, of whom we are speaking; and Reginald, an abbot. As truth is ever clear and consistent, so this genealogy agrees perfectly with the French and Spanish, as well as the Portuguese history, which it is not possible it should do if it was not truth: it is however strange, that when the Portuguese historians had gained so much light as this, with respect to the founder of their sovereignty, they should not be better able to adjust the time of his coming into Spain; but contrive to embarrass themselves with a notion of his passing into Spain in the reign of king Ferdinand, and attending Don Alonso, in his exile at Toledo, without any shadow of probability, and wholly inconsistent with all the dates mentioned in the history of Burgundy (5). To give only one instance, Donna Constantia was the daughter of Robert duke of Burgundy, the sister of Henry, father to this count, and she was very young when she married Don Alonso VI. in 1080, how then should her nephew have been almost twenty years in Spain before that time? (6) Besides, the time of his coming into Spain is so well fixed to the year 1087, that those who adopt the old dates are forced to send him back again out of Spain into France, in order to conduct those succours (7), which are on all hands allowed to have been sent by Philip the first; and the best historians, in fixing the time of sending them to 1087 or 1088, have removed all difficulty; so that if we suppose him born about the year 1060, the series of his life will go on regularly (8).

(B) Some Portuguese historians affirm, that the mother of their queen, Donna Theresa, was Donna Ximena Nunez de Guzman, the daughter of Don Garcia, the third king of Navarre. That this prince had a daughter whose name was Ximena is true; but she was certainly younger than the mistress of Don Alonso, who, according to the Spanish historians, brought him this daughter in his youth, it may be before he was married (1). As to the divorce, that is clearly a mistake. He was indeed divorced, and divorced by Pope Gregory the seventh, not from Donna Ximena, but from Donna Agnes, daughter to the duke of Guienne, to whom they suppose that Donna Ximena was related; whereas, in truth, Donna Agnes was divorced under pretence of her being related to the princess Aguda or Ela, daughter to our William the Conqueror, who died soon after Don Alonso had married her by proxy, as appears from the bull of divorce (2). This was in anno domini 1080, and made way for Don Alonso's marriage with Donna Constantia, as this did with the the king's correspondence with Burgundy and France, she being daughter of duke Robert, and niece to king Henry, and consequently the cousin german of king Philip. But besides Donna Theresa, the king had another daughter by Donna Ximena Nunez, whose name was Donna Elvira, whom he likewise bestowed in marriage upon count Raymond of Thoulouse; time of this marriage, or of the age of the parties who contracted it (C). To come at an absolute certainty in all, or indeed in any of these points, is a task of insuperable difficulty, as the ablest and most accurate authors have ingenuously confessed; but as the reader will see we have taken some pains in this matter, and have from thence been enabled to give at least a probable account of them all, which, if not exactly agreeable to truth, must of necessity come very near it; and having done this we will now proceed to the thread of our history, without any farther introduction.

Genuine account of the manner in which it was established.

THE king Don Alonso, apprehensive that his success in taking the city of Toledo would bring upon him the whole force of the Moors, as well out of Barbary as in Spain, sent to demand assistance from Philip the first of France, and the duke of Burgundy, whose aunt he had married. Both these princes listened to his request; and, according to the enterprising temper of the nobility in that age, and the nature of the military tenures then subsisting, Don Alonso's desire was no sooner known, than a numerous body of troops was speedily collected for his service, and at their head went Raymond count of Burgundy, Henry younger brother of Hugh duke of Burgundy, Raymond count of Tboulouse, and many others^a. On their arrival at the court of Don Alonso, they were received and treated with all possible marks of esteem and respect; and having shewed, in the course of some years, very high proofs of their courage and conduct, the king resolved to bestow his only daughter the princess Urraca, then a perfect child, being at most in her ninth year, upon Raymond, count of Burgundy, and assigned them the province of Galicia for the support of their dignity^b. This was very probably done at the motion of the queen Donna Constantia, who survived only two years. She preferred upon this occasion Don Raymond to Don Henry, because of the alliance in blood between them, which would have rendered their marriage illicit: but it is highly likely, that at the time Galicia was bestowed upon Don Raymond, the government of the frontiers and of the countries to the south of Galicia were given to Henry of Burgundy, with commission to further their improvement, by repairing old, and building new towns, and by such other methods as he should devise; to defend the province against the infidels, and to enlarge the boundaries of his jurisdiction at their expence, as occasion should offer, by the king's being in the field with an army. Then a diversion might be expedient or necessary, without any apprehension of the Moors entering into confederacies, or suspending those feuds that almost continually raged amongst themselves in order to overwhelm this new establishment, which, in the space of a few years, through the care of this great man, became much more rich and populous than before. Numbers of Christians, who had taken shelter in the adjacent mountains, and had lived there in a desolate and miserable condition, came down to settle in the plains, under his protection: so that by degrees he brought into perfect order the two provinces of Entre Minho e Douro and Tra los Montes, with a part of that of Beira, beyond the Dauro, at least so much as was held by the Moorish king of Lamego (D), whom he constrained to pay tribute^c.

and who accompanied her husband into the Holy Land (3); and both these daughters must have been older than Donna Urraca, the heiress of her father's dominions.

(C) The little regard some writers have shewn to chronology, has introduced prodigious confusion, and a variety of irreconcilable dates into this part of our history. As for instance, some have placed this marriage of Donna Theresa, with count Henry of Burgundy, before the year 1072, that is, as early as we can possibly suppose this lady to be born, and immediately on the return of Don Alonso from Toledo (4): but there are many, who, with Mariana, placed the birth of the infant Don Alonso, afterwards king of Portugal, in the very year where they ought to have placed his mother's marriage (5). If there had been any truth in the first date, and in those to which the same writers extend the life of this lady, she must have been at the time of her death about one hundred (6). It is also owing to these false dates, that the count Don Henry is made so much an older man than this princess; and that her son, the infant Don Alonso, is considered as disputing the government with his mother, upon his coming out of his minority; when, according to these calculations, he was really thirty-four years of age (7). Where we have no positive proofs, we must be content with conjectures; and if we suppose this lady to be born during her father's misfortunes, and before his first marriage, which is highly probable, she might be twenty-four when she espoused the count Don Henry, somewhat turned of forty when she became his widow, and about sixty at the time of her death (8). This computation will make her ten years younger than her husband, and will perfectly agree with all the dates that are very judiciously assigned by Ferreras, from the ancient historians, such as the archbishop Don Roderic, the bishop of Tuy, and the old chronicle of Alcobaza, in which are contained the most authentic monuments of the Portuguese history (9), injudiciously altered and augmented by others.

(D) The design of this note is to give the reader some idea of the sovereignty possessed by the count Don Henry, by a succinct description of the three provinces

mentioned

- a ABOUT two years after the queen's death, Don Alonso being very desirous to express his affection and esteem for Henry of Burgundy, gave him in marriage a natural daughter of his, born while he remained in exile at Toledo, whose name was Donna Theresa; and upon this marriage he gave up in full property, as the Portuguese writers assert, all the country of which Henry had hitherto held the superintendence, with the title of count, and with permission to conquer what he could from the Moors, as far as the river Anas, or as the Spaniards call it *Guadiana*¹. There may possibly be some reason to doubt the first part of this assertion, because it does not seem consonant to what is styled reason of state, that a monarch should bestow absolutely, and without reserving homage, part of his dominions upon a stranger. But with regard to the latter part of the concession, one may take it upon less evidence, since the permitting count Henry to keep what he could get by his sword at the expence of the Moors, the reduction of whose strength was of great consequence to the king's subjects, was a grace that cost the king nothing, and seems to have added very little to the right that count Henry would otherwise have had to what he acquired^a.

What the country was given to Henry of Burgundy with Donna Theresa of Leon.
A. D. 1074.

- THE count Don Henry and his consort Donna Theresa fixed their residence in the town of Guimaraez, supposed by some to have been built out of the remains of the ancient city of Araduca; but certainly very pleasantly situated, in the midst of a small but fertile plain, on the banks of the river Ave. The remains of an ancient palace, belonging to some of their successors, are yet visible there; and on account of its having been the ancient capital, the king Don Denis granted its inhabitants an exemption from taxes, which they still enjoy^w. The Portuguese, encouraged by being thus rendered independent, and the presence of a prince of their own, did much upon the borders of the province betwixt the rivers Douro and Minho, till then not entirely subdued, of which we have no particular account. Hecha, king of Lamego, being tributary to count Henry, rebelled, and drawing together a powerful army,

He compels the Moorish king of Lamego to submit, and receive a colony of Christians.

mentioned in the text, which will be in other respects very useful. The province between the rivers, or, as the Portuguese call it, Entre Minho e Douro, though small, is very fruitful and pleasant. It extends in length about eighteen leagues, and in breadth about twelve: within this space, at the beginning of the current century, there was the archiepiscopal see of Braga, the episcopal see of Porto, three collegiate, one thousand four hundred and sixty parish churches, one hundred and thirty religious houses, richly endowed, six sea ports, and two hundred stone bridges. It is divided into four commarcas or counties, and the regular militia is fixed at about sixteen thousand men. The province of Tra los Montes, or on the other side the mountain, has Beira on the south, Estremadura, and the kingdom of Leon, on the east, Galicia on the north, and the province of Entre Minho e Douro on the west, very irregular in its form, but well watered, and tolerably fruitful. It is about thirty leagues in length, and twenty in breadth: it is divided into four commarcas; and in this province is seated the duchy of Braganza, which was the patrimony of the royal family before their accession to the throne. The settled militia amounts to ten or twelve thousand men. The province of Beira, as it lies between the two great rivers Douro and Tago, is very happily seated, having the ocean on the west, the Portuguese Estremadura on the south, the Spanish province of the same name on the south-east, the province of Tra los Montes on the east, and the river Douro on the north. It extends in length thirty-four leagues, and thirty in breadth, and is divided into six commarcas: within this province lies Lamego, where the first assembly of the states was held; the episcopal city of Coimbra or Coimbra, which is likewise an university; and Viseo, which is likewise a bishoprick, and was formerly the capital of a dukedom. The country is equally agreeable and fertile, producing corn, wines, and fruits in abundance, and the hills affording excellent pasture to cattle and sheep; the settled militia consists of about ten thousand men (1). The reader will observe, that only part of this last-mentioned province was conquered from the Moors at this time, and that those conquests were very precarious. We must also observe, that tho' there must have been a very wide difference between the condition of those provinces then and now, yet in respect to their natural advantages arising from the wholesomeness of the air, the fertility of the soil, the great excellency of the rivers and rivulets, they must have been much the same; and this will serve to remove many doubts, under which the reader would otherwise labour, when he finds mention made of such numerous armies in so small a country. It must be also remembered, that during the troubles of Galicia, multitudes of people took shelter under the protection of count Henry; and that many thousands of Christians, who had lived either independently in the mountains, or in subjection to the Moors, took the opportunity of transporting themselves hither, and of occupying those lands of which the Infidels were dispossessed. On the other hand, multitudes of Moors chose rather to submit, and to remain in their native country under a gentle tribute, than be exposed to the severities that were exercised by the alcaides in the Moorish governments; and to those seditions and revolutions which were the continual effects of their feuds and ambition, as well as the principal sources of their misfortunes. These people, as they were very diligent and industrious, cultivated and improved their lands, and furnished those commodities and manufactures which even in these times maintained a considerable trade, as is apparent from the naval force which it appears from the text they were able to oppose to the joint fleets of Barbary and Andaluzia; and in the same proportion that the government became stronger and more secure, all the advantages derived from it must have been augmented; and that they really were so, will be evident from the numerous foundations and endowments made by this prince in the course of his reign, as in their proper place will be hereafter mentioned.

did a great deal of mischief in his territories ^x. The count, with Egas Moniz, or Nugnez, a gentleman then famous for his valour and wisdom, afterwards governor to count Alonso, marched to recover the booty he had taken, and overtook him in a valley near the monastery of Arouca. The Moorish monarch, for greater security in case of misfortune, placed his queen Axa Anzures, and all the plunder his forces had taken, on the top of a mountain called Sierra Seca, and which he judged inaccessible. The Christian army encamped along the river Alarda; and Egas, seeing the enemy advantageously posted, undertook with a strong detachment in the night to go about the bottom, and so ascending the mountain at break of day, to be ready to fall upon them, whilst the Christian army charged the enemy below. This was accordingly put in execution; and, after an obstinate and bloody fight, the queen was taken upon the mountain, and the king in the plain ^y. Afterwards becoming Christians, the count bestowed the city of

A. D. 1102. Lamego upon them, paying tribute for the same. Upon this the Moors rebelling against their king for changing his religion, he fled to Guimaraez to desire assistance of count Henry, who, raising forces, marched directly to Lamego, which, having taken, he restored to that prince, who, fearing in the count's absence his subjects would again revolt, desired him to leave some Portuguese to secure the country, which was done accordingly; and the place peopled with inhabitants brought from the province betwixt the rivers Douro and Minho; that is, old Galician Christians, upon whose valour, as well as fidelity, the count Don Henry might absolutely depend ^z.

Donna Theresa after her father's death assumes the title of queen, but not of Castile or Leon.

THERE are some writers who assert that count Henry being chosen general of the forces that went from Spain, made a voyage to the Holy Land; and, after performing many glorious actions there, of which, however, there are no authentic testimonies, returned again into his own dominions. We know with greater certainty, that he was actually in Portugal at the time of the demise of his father-in-law, the king Don Alonso; and that soon after this Aben Joseph, king of Morocco, having attempted, but in vain, the reduction of Toledo and Madrid, fell into the territories of Portugal, and after defeating such forces as those who commanded on the frontiers could draw together, made himself master of Santaren, and several other places in the neighbourhood ^a. The reason that count Henry did not act in person against the Moors was, his being wholly taken up with the disputes in Galicia, about the tuition of the young prince Alonso Raymond, whom the people of that country had proclaimed their king, and the civil war that was broke out betwixt Donna Urraca, queen of Castile and Leon, and her husband Don Alonso, king of Navarre: the Portuguese writers give us very indistinct and improbable accounts of his conduct ^b. Some of them say, that his consort took the title of queen of Castile and Leon, as being the eldest daughter of the deceased king, and born in lawful wedlock. She might possibly take the title of queen, because, through the courtesy of those times, the daughters of kings were commonly so stiled after their father's decease; but for her entering into any competition with her sister, it seems to be mere fable, or rather calumny, without any foundation, and as to which the most ancient writers are entirely silent ^c.

ON the other hand it is very certain, that her husband, who never took any higher title than that of count of Portugal, assisted queen Urraca with all his forces, and this at a very critical conjuncture, when she was on the very point of being despoiled of her dominions by the king her husband, whom Don Henry forced to raise the siege of Astorga, in the kingdom of Leon; and entering into this city, after he had thus happily relieved it, he was seized with a grievous distemper, of which he soon after died ^d. His son Don Alonso, who was with him in the army, as some writers say, though that is certainly false, caused his body to be removed from Astorga to the cathedral church of Braga, in his own territories, where it was with great solemnity interred. Diego de Souza, who was archbishop in 1513, caused his corpse to be transferred from the place where it was first buried into a chapel, where he had erected a splendid tomb to his memory, with an inscription full of mistakes as to his country, his family, and his actions ^e. The Portuguese writers, who made him, some sixty-seven, some seventy-seven years of age, are certainly mistaken, for the reasons we have assigned in their proper places. He was a generous, wise, and gallant prince; defeated the Moors in seventeen engagements, governed his dominions with equal prudence and justice, and is said to have recommended three things to his successor in his last moments, or rather to have couched these instructions in his testament; first, that he should be zealous in promoting and protecting the Christian faith; secondly, that he should treat his subjects as if they were his children, and be very careful in enacting equal and good laws; lastly, that he

a should attend himself to their execution, and be more especially vigilant to prevent the powerful and the rich from oppressing their weak and indigent neighbours, since the strength of a government consisted in securing and preserving to its subjects the means of subsisting their families comfortably, and in preventing any from becoming so great as to despise, or so poor as to violate, the laws through mere necessity^f. At the very time we are writing this, his most faithful majesty of Portugal is soliciting at Rome the canonization of this prince, of whom we have been speaking, which shews how grateful a sense the people of Portugal still retain of the benefits resulting from his administration.

According to the best memoirs, rectified by the comparison and concurrence of events, which are the only certain guides in history, Don Alonso, the apparent heir of Portugal, was at the time of his father's decease barely entered into the third year of his age: his dominions therefore were governed by his mother queen Theresa, and this by a kind of mixed and undistinguished right of dowager of the deceased count, mother of the young prince, and proprietary, as she conceived herself, of this sovereignty as the gift of her father^g. In the administration of public affairs she was assisted by Don Ferdinand Perez de Traba, the son of that famous Don Pedro, who was governor and protector of the young Don Alonso Raymond, king of Galicia, son to queen Urraca, and nephew to queen Theresa, both these princes, Alonso Raymond, and Alonso Enriquez, being the grandsons of Don Alonso, king of Leon and Castile. The great capacities and moderate dispositions of these two able ministers; Don Pedro and Don Ferdinand, preserved both countries from feeling, at least in an extreme degree, those inconveniencies that usually attend long minorities and the reign of women^h. In Portugal more especially this calm continued for nine years, during which there happened nothing so remarkable as to deserve a place in history, except that the queen, by the advice of her minister, took great care of the frontier, and caused the strong fortrefs of Souria to be erected, in order to cover the city of Coimbra from the incursions of the Moors; which precaution had so happy an effect, that in all this space of time we hear of no attempt made by this busy and martial nation to disturb the peace of the Portuguese; though at the same time it must be allowed, that this might be in some measure owing to their being divided into a multitude of little principalities, none of them equal in point of extent or power to that of Portugal: so that they were not able to make a war on that side with any probability of success, but by the help of a confederacy; and their chiefs were so seldom upon good terms with each other, that, unless insulted by the power of the Christians, this was not easily formedⁱ.

The tranquillity which both nations enjoyed was disturbed by animosities between the two sisters. Queen Theresa insisted, that some part of Galicia belonged to her in virtue of her father's grants, or of his last will; and thereupon seized Tuy, an episcopal see and a place of some consequence. Queen Urraca, when her affairs were brought into some order, determined to recover what she thought was usurped from her, and having assembled a numerous army, went in person into Galicia: upon which queen Theresa quitted Tuy, and being much inferior to her sister in forces, passed the river Minho, took shelter in one of her own fortresses, and caused her army to be encamped round it^k. The archbishop of Compostella, who had vigorously assisted queen Urraca, and without whose assistance she could do nothing, believing she had now done enough, and that her troops might be much better employed than against her sister, demanded leave to retire with his vassals whom he had brought to her assistance. Urraca, provoked at this, and recollecting that he had formerly opposed her will, resolved to secure his person; of which queen Theresa gaining intelligence, gave that prelate timely notice; but he, either suspecting the intelligence, or being willing rather to suffer than to desert his prince, accompanied queen Urraca in her retreat; who, as soon as she had him in her power, seized and put him in prison; which act of violence having excited a general insurrection, delivered the Portuguese from their apprehensions^l. The queen Donna Theresa, either suspecting the inclinations of Don Pelagio, archbishop of Braga or offended at his not having espoused her cause so warmly as she expected against her sister, seized and threw him into prison; from which however he was quickly delivered by the Pope's bull, threatening her and her subjects with an interdict, in case he was not discharged: and this seems to have been the first signal cause of offence which the queen gave to her subjects. The death of her sister Urraca seemed favourable in some respects to her interest, or at least it appeared so, more especially when her nephew Don Alonso Raymond seemed to court her friendship; and in order thereto had an interview with her, in which all differences between their sovereignties were amicably determined^m. But not long after this, that young prince, finding himself obliged to march the whole strength of his dominions against his father-in-law the king of Navarre and Arragon, queen Theresa took this opportunity to cause a body of her forces to repass the Minho and to re-possess themselves of Tuy; which, however, did not long remain in her hands, Don Alonso king of Leon, returning with a superior army into Galicia, upon which the Portuguese thought proper to quit their new conquest, and to secure themselves by a timely retreat ^a.

Theresa.*

DON Alonso Enriquez, whom his father count Henry had intrusted to the care of Egas Munitz, received from him an excellent education; and that he might discover to the people that he meant to follow the footsteps of his father, he went, according to the custom of those times, to the church of Zamora; and, after going through the usual ceremonies, received there the honour of knighthood ^o. Five years were almost elapsed since that time, and some of the Portuguese nobility, who either envied Don Ferdinand Perez, stiled by some writers count of Trastemara, or were really offended with the reports that were spread of his familiarity with the queen, and intention to marry her, and take the title of count of Portugal, persuaded Don Alonso, who was now near eighteen, to vindicate his own rights, and to let the people see that he would not tamely submit to such a violation of them. There needed not many arguments to persuade a young prince that he has either a claim or capacity to govern, more especially one whose title was so well founded in both respects as that of Don Alonso. He closed therefore immediately with the proposition that was made, assumed the sovereign authority, and was, generally speaking, cheerfully obeyed ^p. The queen his mother, however, had not governed so long without having a considerable party in her interests, who were ready to espouse them with their swords. Some, indeed most, writers say, that the queen advancing with her army towards Guimaraez, the king, without waiting till his governor joined him, engaged them, and was routed; but that afterwards the remains of his army being joined by the troops under the command of Egas Munitz, engaged the army of the queen a second time, and gained a complete victory. They farther assert, that the queen being made prisoner by her son, secretly implored the assistance and protection of her nephew Don Alonso, king of Leon; who, marching to her assistance, Don Alonso Enriquez gave him battle in the plain of Valdiviez, and after an obstinate engagement, in which the king himself received two wounds, and seven counts were made prisoners, totally defeated his army: from which the flat country where this battle was fought received the name of Matanca, that is, the Butchery. They then proceed to tell us, that the king of Leon, in revenge of this affront, having raised a more potent army than before, came and besieged Don Alonso in his capital city of Guimaraez, where he must certainly have been taken prisoner, if his tutor Egas Munitz had not gone privately to the king of Leon, and in his master's name concluded a treaty, by which he promised to do him homage; and upon this the king of Leon retired. Lastly they say, that Don Alonso Enriquez disavowing this treaty, and refusing to do homage when summoned, Egas Munitz presented himself before the king of Leon with a halter about his neck, to shew he was ready to suffer the penalty of having deluded that monarch by an engagement it was not in his power to perform. The king, however, admiring his loyalty and fidelity, dismissed him, not only unhurt, but with many commendations. All this is very pleasant and entertaining, but we see no sufficient reason to affirm, that there is one syllable of it true; but, on the contrary, the decision of this quarrel between the mother and the son happened in quite a different manner. The nobility about Don Alonso persuaded him to give battle to the queen's forces, which he did, and gained a signal and complete victory ^q. Queen Theresa, after her defeat, retired into the castle of Legonaso, and as for Don Ferdinand Perez, he retired with his brother, whom the scandal of those times had reported to have been the queen's first favourite, into Galicia. Instead of pursuing them, Don Alonso invested the fortrefs in which his mother had taken refuge, and having obliged her to surrender, caused her to be kept in prison during the remainder of her life, with chains upon her legs ^r; which some say she bore very impatiently, and uttered grievous execrations against her son, on account of this ill usage. We are farther told, that she procured the Pope to interpose in her favour, so far as to send a cardinal legate into Portugal, who put the count Don Alonso and his dominions under an interdict; but with such privacy, that he was in hopes it would not have reached that prince's ears till he was out of his territories. In this he was mistaken; Don Alonso had timely intelligence, followed him, and clapping a sword to his breast, compelled the cardinal to absolve him, and to take off the interdict; and then bid him assure the Pope, that he should find him always an obedient son of the church, while he acted towards him with the affection of a spiritual father. It happens unluckily, that, for the sake of accuracy, the name of this Pope is mentioned, and said to be Eugenius III. instead of Innocent II. who then occupied the chair of St. Peter, and whose circumstances were such, that, if he had been ever so well inclined, he durst not have taken a step of this nature. Upon the whole it is most probable, that Don Alonso, a being well acquainted with the queen's violent temper, judged it expedient to keep her under a gentle restraint, to prevent fresh troubles, till the time of her demise, which happened in somewhat less than two years, upon the first of *November*¹, in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and thirty.

Don Alonso, count of Portugal, having now the full and free possession of his dominions, repulsed with great loss a Moorish prince, who, thinking to take advantage of their domestic troubles, had made an inroad, and taken the town of Francofa, which, though not without difficulty, Don Alonso recovered, and having again defeated the infidels, who attacked him in his return to his capital, he entered Guimaraez in triumph, and caused the trophies of his victories to be placed in the principal church. He was very desirous of recovering the places

b the queen his mother had formerly possessed in Galicia, and, under pretence of prosecuting his quarrel against Don Ferdinand Perez, he made more than one irruption into that country; but with no great success. At length an opportunity offered that seemed to flatter his hopes. Don Garcia, king of Navarre, being jealous of the great power of Don Alonso king of Leon and Castile, who assumed the title of emperor of the Spains, proposed a league to Don Alonso Enriquez, for their mutual advantage. This tempted him to invade Galicia a third time with better success than before, since he defeated those who opposed him, and took and fortified several places; but the return of the emperor with a superior army constrained him to abandon his enterprize, together with his new conquests, in order to retire into his own dominions².

A. D. 1132.

c THESE disappointments, together with the news of an irruption of the Moors into his own country, engaged this young prince to drop his animosity against the emperor, which proceeded chiefly from his considering him in quality of count of Portugal as his vassal, and turn his arms entirely on that side where a Moorish king had actually besieged Coimbra. His force was so much superior to that of Don Alonso, as afforded him little hopes of raising the siege; but the plague, breaking out in the Moorish army, destroyed such numbers as enabled him to constrain them to retire: after which he took Leyria, which he gave to the monks of the Holy Cross of Coimbra, from whom the Moors quickly took it: but the king not only returned and recovered it, but likewise added Torres Novas, Beja, Serpa, Moura, and *Evora*³. In all probability he would have pushed his conquests still farther, if the emperor

He makes peace with the emperor Don Alonso, and renders his dominions tributary to the pope.

d Don Alonso had not entered his country with a numerous army, and begun to lay it waste with fire and sword. Don Alonso Enriquez marched against him with all the forces he could raise, and understanding that the count Don Ramiro, with a great body of troops, moved at some distance from the emperor, he, by a forced march, surprised and routed him with great slaughter. This, however, did not hinder the emperor from marching directly towards him; but the count being persuaded by some of the nobility about him to offer a treaty, on account of the Moors having invaded his territory, the peace was easily made, all places and prisoners taken on both sides being restored. The Pope's legate being very instrumental in this, the count Don Alonso, in a high fit of gratitude or piety, declared himself tributary for all his dominions to the holy see, and promised to pay annually in that quality four ounces of gold, as appears from his own letter on this subject to Pope Lucius the second⁴.

e THE progress of the Christians in Portugal being reported to Abu-Ali-Texefin, the miramolin, or chief monarch of the Moors in Barbary, he directed Ismar, whom some authors call Ismael, his lieutenant in Spain, to assemble all the forces of the southern provinces, and with them to oblige the Christians to repass the Douro. In consequence of these orders, he directed the alcaides of Badajoz, Elvas, Evora, and Beja, to assemble the troops of their respective governments; and having joined these with the forces he brought from Barbary, the whole army were very numerous. He was scarce in readiness to march, before he had intelligence that Don Alonso Enriquez had passed the river Tayo, and was in the neighbourhood of a place called Castro Verda. This appeared very favourable to the Moorish general, as it gave him an opportunity of drawing up his cavalry, in which his strength principally consisted, with all possible advantage, in the plains of Ourique; and therefore he took all possible precautions to prevent the Christians from repassing the river, and gaining thereby an opportunity of fighting upon more equal terms. However, Don Alonso had so early intelligence that he might have retired, to which he was advised by most of his generals, if he had been so disposed; but it seems he declared himself of a contrary opinion. He judged that such a retreat would discredit his arms; and that such a multitude of Moors breaking into his dominions might render it impracticable for him to reinforce his fatigued army, so as to be in a better condition to fight than he was at this time, and his soldiers shewing great alacrity, his generals came over to his opinion, and it was determined to wait and receive the Infidels where they were. This resolution being taken, they chose their ground, so as to gain all that could be gained in point of situation; and having thrown up some intrenchments to cover their infantry, divided their horse into four corps, and in this position waited the attack *.

ISMAR divided the Moorish cavalry into twelve corps; and making sure of the victory, was chiefly intent upon disposing them in such a manner as to cut off all possibility of retreat, and hinder, if it might be done, so much as a single man from making his escape. By thus enlarging his front, he lost, in a great measure, the weight which his superiority might have given him. The Portuguese infantry, being attacked in their intrenchments, made so gallant a defence, that the enemy could not force them; and their flanks being covered with morasses, the Moorish cavalry, destined to prevent their escape, were of no use. At length the Moors, fatigued by repeated and ineffectual assaults, began to fall into confusion, which as soon as the Portuguese infantry perceived, they sallied from their intrenchments, and attacked them in their turn with great fury. Don Alonso seconded them with his cavalry, and after a bloody and obstinate dispute, which lasted six hours, the Moors were totally routed with prodigious slaughter, the nephew of Ismar, who had commanded the attack, and the four alcaides already mentioned, being killed upon the spot †. Amongst the almost innumerable prisoners that were taken, were upwards of a thousand Christians, of those stiled Mozarabians, whom, at the request of Theotonus, prior of the Holy Cross, Don Alonso set at liberty, with their wives and children, and procured them establishments in his territories. This glorious victory, which was indubitably the foundation of the Portuguese monarchy, was gained upon the twenty-fifth of July; and the anniversary thereof has ever since been celebrated to preserve the memory of so signal a favour vouchsafed to the Christian arms by the blessing of Divine Providence ‡.

Many fabulous
and absurd accounts of the victory in the plains of Ourique.

THIS is as clear and as concise an account, as, from the comparison of different authors, we were able to get; but at the same time we must confess, that we have omitted numberless extraordinary circumstances, related with great confidence by the Portuguese writers. Ismael, they say, was king of Badajoz, and brought with him into the field twenty princes, his vassals, of whom four were in great consideration, in comparison of the other sixteen; who, notwithstanding, had each his corps of troops, so that the whole army amounted to three hundred thousand, according to the most moderate computation; others say, to four hundred and eighty thousand; and some swell them to six hundred thousand: whereas the army of Don Alonso is agreed on all sides, not to have exceeded thirteen thousand. They tell us likewise, that, two days before the battle, their prince, being in no small perplexity, sat down to comfort and compose his mind, by the perusal of the Holy Scriptures; and that having read the story of Gideon, he sunk presently into a deep sleep, in which he saw a very old man, in a very remarkable dress, come into his tent and assure him of victory. His chamberlain waking him, told him there was an old man who was very importunate to speak with him. Don Alonso ordered him to be brought in, and no sooner saw him, than he knew him to be the old man of whom he had been dreaming. This person acquainted him that he was a fisherman, and had led a life of penance for sixty years on an adjacent rock, where it had been revealed to him, that if the count marched his army the next morning, as soon as he heard a certain bell ring, he should receive the strongest assurances of victory. Accordingly, at the ringing of the bell the count put his army in motion, and suddenly beheld in the east quarter of the sky the figure of the Cross, and Christ upon it, who promised him a complete victory, and commanded him to accept the title of king if it was offered him by the army. Soon after, his forces, being disposed in order of battle, suddenly shouted for joy, and cried out, Long live Don Alonso Enriquez, king of Portugal: they add, that, as a standing memorial of this miraculous event, Don Alonso changed the arms which his father had given of a cross azure in a field argent, for five escutcheons, each charged with five bezants, in memory of the wounds of Christ; while others allege, that he gave in a field argent five escutcheons azure, in the form of a cross, each charged with five bezants argent, placed salterwise, with a point sable, in memory of five wounds himself received, and of the five Moorish kings slain upon the spot, the name of the place also being changed into Cabeças de Reies, i. e. the Heads of the Kings, in order to add a new testimony to the truth of this event. The most irrefragable evidence however of all these wonders, is a charter of the king Don Alonso, the first dated in 1142, in which the story of the vision is related upon oath. The Spanish critics, notwithstanding, have discovered many inconsistencies in this piece; they find the language intermixed with phrases not then in use: it bears the date of the year of our Lord when that æra had not been heard of in Spain; and John, bishop of Coimbra, signs as a witness before John, a metropolitan of Braja, which is against the rules ^a. Upon the whole, all these wonderful circumstances may, without any great fear of violating the regard due to veracity, be considered as so many inventions, by which, instead of adding to the honour of their prince, and of their country, they have really obscured it in a very high degree: nor should we have taken so much pains upon this occasion, if it had not been to have furnished the judicious reader with a sufficient apology for dropping such romantic particulars upon many other occasions.

THERE is, however, under this mass of fable and superstition, a very important matter of fact concealed, which is incontestably true; and that is, the proclaiming Don Alonso king in the plains of Ourique, immediately after this victory ^b; and it is to heighten and adorn this fact, so as to cut off all pretensions of homage to the crown of Spain, that so many wonders have been fabricated upon his assuming it. It must, notwithstanding, be owned, that it is much more probable that the regal title was given him after the battle than before, though the point is not in itself of any great consequence. We shall see hereafter, that even in these rough times, when things are fairly and truly represented, mankind were not so ignorant and barbarous as to suffer a change in government to be made without any further ceremony than a tumultuous huzza: for though it be true that Don Alonso was stiled king, from the very day in which this victory was gained; yet the essentials of the regal dignity, together with the form and constitution of the monarchy, were not settled till some years after; and then in such a manner as will plainly shew, that Don Alonso Enriquez was a very wise and judicious prince, who knew very well what he was doing, and how to conciliate, what it is so difficult to bring into a state of true harmony, the vigour of monarchical authority, with a just claim to liberty in the subject. There was therefore the less need to bestow so much false colouring, and disagreeable daubing, to set off a character so bright in itself, and which will appear so to every critical enquirer, in spite of these officious attempts to magnify, which prove in the end rather endeavours to lessen the reputation of him who founded this kingdom; with which remarkable point of fact we are to conclude this section, and in the next to resume the history of the monarchy, under the long reign of this prudent and victorious prince and his immediate successors.

S E C T. II.

The history of Portugal, under the reigns of Don Alonso I. Don Sancho I. Don Alonso II. and Don Sancho II.

d THE defeat which the king of Portugal had given the Moors, opened him a free passage for his return into what might be properly stiled his own territories. This battle was fought on the frontiers of Algarve, and the rivulets are said to have carried their waters deeply stained with blood into the Guadiana, where Don Alonso was not as yet the peaceable possessor of all the countries north of the Tago. He judged it therefore convenient to repass that river as soon as he could do it with safety, disposed his army into quarters about Coimbra, and dispersed the captives he had made through the interior places in his dominions ^a. Don Raymond, count of Barcelona, and regent and possessor in right of his wife, of the kingdom of Arragon, having proposed a league to Don Alonso against the emperor, his jealousy of that potent prince induced him to accept this offer. In pursuance of his engagements, though he had always hitherto been unsuccessful in that country, he entered Galicia with a great force, while Don Raymond fell upon the emperor's dominions on the other. The scheme of these two princes was well laid, yet neither of them succeeded; as for Don Alonso he met with a severe check in his expedition into Galicia, where, in a smart engagement, he received a dangerous wound in the loins from the son of count Ferdinand Gomez, governor of that province for the emperor, and at the same time some of the nobility who attended him were taken prisoners. This misfortune, together with the news that the Moors had invaded his territories, induced him to retire; and though he did this without loss of time, yet he did not arrive early enough to prevent the infidels from taking the fortress of Leyria, the gar-

In order to repair this mischief, the king took the field with a good army, and while his troops were employed in slight excursions, he caused the fortress of Leyria to be rebuilt, and rendered stronger than it was before, into which he put a numerous garrison: but it does not appear he undertook any thing farther this campaign ^c. The next year the Moors invaded his dominions with a very great army, defeated his generals, and carried a considerable number of his subjects into slavery. We have no account where the king was at this time; but it is very certain that he did not renew the war against the emperor, as being perhaps convinced that it served only to give advantage to their common enemy, and to waste his own forces, who fought unwillingly against their neighbours ^d. It seems also, that he was embarked in a negotiation at Rome, where he was very desirous of getting his new title confirmed, having already meditated another step of importance, as soon as the bulls should be received. In the mean time coming to Coimbra, and having a good number of his nobility and forces about him, he formed a project for attacking Santaren, which is about twelve miles from Lisbon, a large place, well fortified, according to the manner of those times, and provided with a numerous garrison. Upon close examination, he saw there was little hopes of succeeding by a regular siege, as the Moors would have time enough before he could take the place to assemble an army for its relief. He determined therefore to attempt it by surprise, and was lucky enough to succeed in that undertaking, at which he assisted in person. This was a conquest of very great consequence, inasmuch as it procured him a considerable tract of country, covered his frontier, and at the same time restored to their liberty a multitude of his subjects, who were prisoners in the place ^e.

THIS glorious success encouraged him to execute without delay a project he had very much at heart. He called an assembly of the states of his dominions at Lamego, which consisted of the prelates, nobility, and commons. At the opening of this assembly he appeared seated on the throne, but without any marks of his regal dignity: then Laurence de Viegas demanded of the assembly, whether, in consequence of the election in the plains of Ourique, and the briefs of pope Eugenius the third, they were content to have Don Alonso Enriquez for their king? To which they answered they were content. He then demanded, if they desired he should continue king only during his life, or that his dignity should remain to his family? ^d They declared their intention to be, that the crown should descend to his heirs male. "This being your intention, added Laurence de Viegas, is it your pleasure that he be invested with the ensigns of royalty?" The people having answered in the affirmative, the archbishop of Braga placed the crown upon his head, the king having his sword drawn in his hand. Then turning to the assembly, he said, "Blessed be God, who has always assisted me, and has enabled me to deliver you from the hands of all your enemies with this sword, which I shall ever wear for your defence. You have made me a king, and it is but just that you should share with me in taking care of the state. I am your king, and as such let us make laws proper to secure the tranquility of this kingdom." The people having assented, the king consulted with the prelates and nobility, and having framed eighteen short statutes, they were assented to by the people. At length Laurence de Viegas proposed the great question, whether it was their pleasure the king should go to Leon, do homage, and pay tribute to that prince, or to any other? Upon which every man drawing his sword, cried with a loud voice, We are free, and our king is free, and we owe our liberty to our courage, and if he shall at any time submit to such an act, he deserves death, and shall not reign either over us, or amongst us. King Alonso rising up, approved this declaration, and declared, that if any of his descendants consented to such a submission, he was unworthy to succeed him, and should be reputed incapable of wearing the crown. The people in their turn having approved the king's declaration, the assembly was dissolved ^f (A).

(A) It will be of considerable use in the reading the remaining part of this history, and it cannot but afford satisfaction to the reader, to be acquainted with some of the principal points established by these constitutional laws. By the third it is provided, that if the king died without heirs male, his brother shall succeed him, but shall only reign for his life, unless the hereditary right be fixed in his family by a new election. By the fifth, the infantas of Portugal are called to the succession, in case the male line of the Royal Family fail; but upon condition, that the heiress of the crown marry a nobleman of Portugal, who is not to bear the title of king, till after the queen is delivered of an heir male. In all public places he is to walk on the left

- a THE next year the king, very probably by the advice of the nobility and clergy of his realm, judged it expedient to marry, and made choice of the princess Mafalda, or Matbilda, daughter to Amadeus count of Maurienne and Savoy, which marriage was celebrated with suitable magnificence, and to the general joy and satisfaction of his subjects^s. When this solemnity was over, he spent some time in visiting the several provinces of his dominions, giving directions for rebuilding such places as, either through time or the rage of war, had been brought to decay, and resettling episcopal sees in such places as were known to have enjoyed that honour in the time of the Goths; and at this season, in all probability, he made a vow of building a noble monastery for monks of the Cistercian order, in case Providence blessed him with success in the great enterprize then in his mind. This was the recovery of Lisbon out of the hands of the Moors, and it is said, that he invested it with a powerful army: but it is probable the reader will scarce credit this, when he hears the place was defended by a garrison of two hundred thousand men. It is a strange thing that men of parts and learning will disfigure their histories, not only with improbabilities but impossibilities, and put it thereby out of the power of those who came after them to do that justice to the courage and conduct of their ancestors, to which they are sincerely inclined. All we can collect from their relations, amounts to no more than this; that the king undertook this siege with a small army, and that he was able to make but little progress in it, partly from the strength of the place, and partly from the numerous garrison that was in it. At length, very fortunately for Don Alonso, a fleet of adventurers, French, English, Germans, and Flemings, that were going to the Holy Land, anchored at the mouth of the river Tagus, whose assistance he demanded, as not altogether foreign to their purpose of making war upon the infidels, and his request was readily granted. Here again we are oppressed with absurdities and impossibilities; for, exclusive of a king of Denmark, a duke of Burgundy, and other princes whom we cannot find out, we are assured that the fleet and army was commanded by William Longsword, duke of Normandy, who flourished only two hundred years before this event happened. But whoever these adventurers were, or whoever commanded them, it was by their help that king Alonso took the place, and having gratified them out of the plunder, they departed well satisfied^b. This conquest so raised this monarch's reputation, and brought such numbers to recruit his victorious army, that before he quitted the field he added Mafra, Almada, Palmela, Cintra, Obidos, Trancofo, Alenquez, Serpa, Beja, Elvas, Coruche, and Cezimbra, to his dominions^c (B).
- b By the assistance of the Crosses he reduces the city and haven of Lisbon.

est hand of the queen, and is not permitted to set the crown upon his head. The sixth runs in the king's name, and in these words. "This last law shall be always observed, and the eldest daughter of the king shall never espouse any other than a Portuguese nobleman, that foreign princes may never become masters of this kingdom. If the daughter of the king espouse a prince, or a lord, who is a foreigner by birth, she shall never be acknowledged for queen, because we will not that our people should be obliged to obey a king who is not born a Portuguese, because they are our countrymen as well as our subjects, who, without the assistance of strangers, and who, by their own valour, and at the expence of their own blood, have made us their king." By the ninth it is declared, that all of the blood royal, and their descendents, shall be considered as princes. The Portuguese, who have fought for the person of the king, for his son, for his son-in-law, or in defence of the standard-royal, shall be reputed noble; but the descendents of Moors, the sons of Jews, or the children of Infidels, shall not aspire to nobility. If a Portuguese is made prisoner of war by the Infidels, and dies without changing his religion in captivity, his children shall be noble; he who has killed the king of an enemy, his son, or who gains a royal-standard, shall ipso facto, become noble: the ancient nobility shall be always esteemed as such; and all who bore arms in the glorious battle of Ourique shall be reputed noble, and the ancient vassals of the crown. In the tenth are set down the causes for which nobility shall be forfeited;

such as, cowardice, treason, striking a woman, perjury, deceiving or concealing truth from the king, blasphemy, robbery, deserting to the Moors. Theft was to be punished the first time by sitting in the pillory, the second by being marked in the forehead, for the third offence the thief might be condemn'd to death, but not executed without the king's special command. In case of adultery, the law is very singular, for upon due proof both the guilty persons are to be burnt; but if the husband will forgive his wife he may, and in that case the law pardons the man also. Murder is to be punished with death; as also the rape of a woman noble by birth, who is also to be entitled to the estate of the ravisher. The ravisher of a woman who is not noble, is by the law obliged to marry her, let the difference in point of rank or riches be what they will.

(B) The conquest of Lisbon was the most remarkable event of this reign, and it would require some sheets to discuss all the particulars that relate to it, more especially who those strangers were that so seasonably assisted Don Alonso Enriquez in the reduction of it. All historians agree, that the English made up a great part of them. The town of Villa-Franta was peopled by them, and they called it Cornualla, either in honour of the country from whence they came, or, which seems to be more probable, from the rich meadows in its neighbourhood, where prodigious herds of cattle are kept, as in the English Cornwall. Almada, on the other side the Tagus over against Lisbon, was also peopled by them; and the king also gave them a great part of the country in property (1). THE king, knowing that the glory of a monarch arises no less from the glory of knowing ^a how to keep, than how to acquire, very wisely applied himself to put all the places he had lately conquered into repair, and to provide as far as possible for their protection and preservation. Amongst other cares of this sort, he restored the episcopal see of Lisbon, and appointed Don Gilbert, an English divine, whom he had prevailed upon to stay with him instead of going to the Holy Land, the first bishop of that see ^k. He also founded in the pleasant town of Alcobaco, so called from its standing between the two rivers Alcoa and Baca, in pursuance of his vow, a royal convent, which was amply endowed, and which he intended for the burial place of the kings of Portugal. He prosecuted the war against the infidels without relaxation; and sent an ambassador to Rome to support his cause against the emperor, as well as that of the archbishop of Braga, with whom the archbishop of Toledo had a long suit about the primacy ^l. ^b Many years after, that we may put an end to this subject, Don Alonso procured a bull from Pope Alexander the third for the confirmation of his regal dignity: all steps of this kind being directed to the same end, which was freeing his country from all vassalage to the crown of Leon, on account of part of it being formerly annexed to the government of Galicia. If the reader is desirous of knowing how the Popes came by a power of bestowing kingdoms, all we can say is, that from the time of Pope Gregory the seventh, they assumed a power of bestowing all countries in the hands of infidels; asserting that, when they were recovered, they belonged of right to the holy see. It is, however, highly probable, that so wise a prince as Don Alonso was not at all the dupe of this strange notion; but very prudently made use of the Pope's authority against the claim of the kings of Leon, as believing that their ^c bulls was a cheaper and more effectual way of supporting this claim to independency than armies: for it does not appear, that the tribute stipulated to the pontiffs was ever regularly paid them; and, in process of time, the kings of Portugal, as well as other princes, distinguished between the spiritual and temporal power, allowing the former to be in the Pope, but asserting the latter to belong to themselves, without account to any, save God and their subjects ^m.

It would be of little consequence to the reader, supposing it was practicable, as indeed it is not, to have an exact detail of all the expeditions made by the king Don Alonso into the territories of the Moors; and on the other side, the history of their excursions into the dominions of Portugal, in which the same places were taken and retaken almost every year, ^d with singular and extraordinary circumstances. We will content ourselves then with saying, that having with great courage and indefatigable diligence cleared the province of Estremadura and Beira from infidels, he became entirely master of four of the six provinces that compose the kingdom of Portugal, and raised the reputation of his arms to a very high degree, in an age when courage was most respected, and in a country where the most authentic proofs of it were given by as brave and gallant commanders as any history have recorded. In saying this, we by no means intend to exclude the Moors, who certainly defended their country with great spirit and resolution, as appears by the length of time it required to drive them out of those conquests which they originally obtained almost within the compass of a single year. We must also assert, though the Portuguese historians furnish us with but slender proofs upon ^e this head, that he was no less provident in peopling and improving, than enterprizing in the Lisbon, it was the most considerable conquest he could have made, as it put into his hands a most noble port, and secured to him the possession of the whole province of Estremadura; of which we will first give a succinct account, and then add a few remarkable heads in respect to this city. This country is divided into two unequal parts by the river Tagus: it is bounded on the north by the province of Beira, on the east by that of Alentjo, on the south by the same province, and by the ocean, which likewise bounds it on the west. It is computed to be thirty-five leagues in length, and eighteen in breadth, and is divided into six commarcas. The soil of this province is excellent, and the climate admirable, so that pasturage, arable land, and vineyards, are equally fruitful, the prospect finely diversified, and all the towns and villages seated therein equally wholesome and pleasant (2). The city of Lisbon is at present distinguished in almost all the means by which a place can be rendered famous. It is not only the capital of a province, and of the kingdom of Portugal, and the royal residence, but is also the seat of a patriarch, and of the first parliament in the kingdom; besides, it has one of the finest ports in Europe, and is, and has been always a place of very great trade. In point of situation, it is pretty irregular, as it is generally said to be built upon seven hills; but notwithstanding this, the streets are many of them very regular, and the houses very well built. It contains forty parish churches, twenty convents, and eighteen nunneries. It is fortified by an old Moorish wall, flanked by seventy seven towers; comprehends between thirty and forty thousand houses, and is about six miles in length, and fourteen in circumference. The air is wonderfully healthy, and the season so temperate, that people live there to a great age; and roses and other odoriferous flowers blow there all the year long (3).

- a acquisition of territories : and on this head it may not be amiss to observe, that it was certainly one maxim of his policy to invite and allure strangers, who either came into his country on the account of trade, or, during the long progress of the holy war, put into his ports for refreshment, to remain and settle amongst his subjects ; of which, though we have but a few, and those dark and perplexed, hints in their histories, yet we have a clear and satisfactory proof in the language of the Portuguese, which consists of a mixture of Spanish, Latin, and French, with some sprinklings of other languages, which sufficiently denote their being a mixt people. Neither is this any imputation upon them, but quite the contrary ; since in those days it was not the low and vulgar, but the bravest and the best men that quitted their own countries, to signalize themselves in other climates ; and very probable the most moderate and prudent made it their choice to stay in so fine a country, and to carve out their fortunes under the protection of so generous a prince, who piqued himself upon being equally the protector of letters and armsⁿ.

He was seconded in all his great and good designs by his queen Mathilda, a princess ^{Is very unfortunate in his} equally famous for her exquisite beauty and singular piety. She was also conspicuous ^{war against} for her great capacity, which she discovered in the management of civil affairs, when the ^{his son-in-law} protection of his subjects called the king her husband into the field. By her he had a numerous offspring, which enabled him to strengthen his interests by great alliances. His eldest ^{Don Ferdinand king of} daughter Donna Mafalda, or Mathilda, he married to Don Alonso king of Arragon ; his second, Donna Urraca, to Don Ferdinand king of Leon, the son of his old antagonist the emperor Don Alonso ; and the third, Donna Theresa, to Philip earl of Flanders^o. The marriage of his second daughter did not prevent him from having disputes with his son-in-law Don Ferdinand, who, as we have shewn in another place, had the good fortune once to make him prisoner, and the generosity and good sense to remember that he was his father-in-law, and to forget that he had been his enemy. We have also shewn, that when this misfortune befel him, he met also with another, that of breaking his leg, which, through his impatience, rendered him ever after so lame that he was unable to mount on horseback ; which the superstitions in those days ascribe to the curses of his mother, but some writers, who were perhaps better informed, give us another account of the matter. They say, that his impatience to recover his liberty, induced him to submit to the hard condition which Don Ferdinand imposed, of coming in person to Leon, there to do homage for his dominions as soon as he should be able to mount on horseback ; and that for this reason he ever afterwards affected to drive in a calash, and would never get on horseback more^p. This did not at all abate his military ardour ; for notwithstanding this inconvenience, joined to the weight of years and infirmities, his courage transported him into the field, wherever the safety or the interest of his people called him ; so that there was no relaxation in the whole course of his reign, but the same activity distinguished the latter, that had done honour to the earlier, part of his administration. It is true, that the infant Don Sancho was a great stay and relief to his father, whom he very much resembled in the impetuosity of his valour, and his early affection for a military life ; but as this heat perhaps made him unfortunate in his first enterprizes, so repeated checks made him more cautious, and taught him that, to be a great captain, conduct was at least as necessary as courage ; and as he derived the former from nature, so by degrees time and experience taught him the latter^q.

TOWARDS the latter end of the king's reign, an opportunity seemed to present itself, of ^{Embarked at} obtaining once for all an entire release from the disagreeable pretensions of the king of Leon, ^{the close of his} and this was the quarrel between that monarch and his nephew Don Alonso of Castile. The ^{reign in wars} latter sought the friendship of Portugal, and Don Alonso Enriquez closed too readily with ^{with the} Christians and the proposal. Don Ferdinand of Leon having intelligence of the measures they had concerted, ^{with the} and that the infant Don Sancho was advancing towards Ciudad Rodrigo, assembled his ^{Moors.} troops on the frontier with such diligence, that he was enabled to attack the infant very unexpectedly, and, after a very warm dispute, defeated him^r. The Portuguese writers are silent ^{A. D. 1178.} upon this head, though in its consequences this untoward event proved very beneficial to their country : for Don Ferdinand understanding that the infant, piqued at his disgrace, was recruiting his forces with great diligence, he gave him to understand, that they might be much better employed against the infidels, who, expecting the issue of this war, remained careless and unprepared. Don Sancho made proper use of this salutary advice ; and, after making some motions purely for amusement, made a sudden irruption into Andalusia, and penetrated as far as Triana, which is one of the suburbs of Seville. The Moorish alcaides assembled as great a force as they were able, in order to attack him on his retreat. The infant Don Sancho having first fatigued them by the celerity of his march, at length chose a strong camp, and having given his troops some time to repose, drew them out, and offered the enemy battle; in which being victorious, he returned into Portugal with spoils to an immense value. The next year Aben Jacob, lieutenant for the miramamolin, to revenge this affront, made an irruption into Portugal, and besieged Abrantes, on the bank of the Tayo; but upon the infant Don Sancho's advancing towards him with the troops of Portugal they retired. The year following the miramamolin sent both a fleet and an army out of Barbary, and expressly directed they should be employed in a joint expedition against Portugal. Don Fuas Raupino, who commanded on the frontier, and who had a stronger corps of troops than the Moors expected, posted them behind the rocks adjacent to a little castle, which Gama, alcaide of Merida, who commanded the infidels by land, must of necessity attack, and while he was busy in this service Don Fuas fell upon him behind, routed his forces, and sent him and his brother prisoners to the old king at Coimbra. After this the same gallant officer took the command of the fleet, and having routed one of the enemy's squadrons, sent nine of their gallies to Lisbon, and then proceeded with twenty-one sail to engage the Moorish fleet composed of fifty-four large gallies. This act of temerity cost them dear; for the Moors, having drawn his small squadron towards the center, surrounded and destroyed them, so that the sea, which had so lately furnished him with trophies, now supplied him with a tomb.

THE war was continued without any very remarkable events for the next three years; during which Joseph king of Morocco, and emperor of the Almohades, having transported at several times both men and military stores into Andalusia, at length followed in person, and having collected a prodigious army under the command of thirteen alcaides, swept all before him as far as the Tayo. He presented himself before Santaren, into which, not able to keep the field, the infant Don Alonso had retired, with a choice body of troops. There he sustained for the space of a week several assaults; and, notwithstanding the great superiority of the infidels, repulsed them with loss, till, as the Spanish writers say, he was relieved by Don Ferdinand king of Leon, and the archbishop of Compostella; but, as the Portuguese writers affirm, by his father Don Alonso, by whom the Moors being totally defeated, the miramamolin having received a wound from the hand of the infant Don Sancho, perished in repassing the river. There are indeed very strange variations in the different recitals we meet with even in ancient authors concerning this battle, and the princes who were present therein; for some will have the Moorish monarch to have perished by a fall from his horse, and others will not allow that there was any fight at all; but that the Moorish army, fatigued with the siege of Santaren, and much diminished by the losses received in their several assaults, abandoned their baggage and their camp on the approach of the Christians, and in the confusion of their precipitate retreat their miramamolin came by his death, concerning which there were various reports. This decisive stroke was given upon Midsummer-day; and the consternation of the infidels was so great, that they left the Portuguese at liberty to improve the interior part of their country, and to fortify their frontiers all the next year.

Dies with universal regret of his subjects, after a long and prosperous reign.

THIS repose was very seasonable to the good old king, who passed the time at Coimbra, surrounded by his nobility and prelates, with whom he concerted the properest means for preserving the territories he had gained by his arms, and the title bestowed upon him by his people, without impeachment of any kind, till, being quite worn out with cares and fatigue, he departed this life, to the great sorrow of his subjects, on the sixth of December, one thousand one hundred and eighty-five; having governed Portugal, from the time he assumed the sovereign authority, fifty-seven years, and as a king, in the forty-seventh year of his reign. Some Portuguese historians make him ninety-one, others ninety-three years of age; but according to our computation, which likewise agrees with the most accurate accounts, he was in the seventy-sixth year of his age at the time of his demise (C). His body was interred with

This shews that these customs were derived from a more ancient people, who, by conquest or transmigration, became possessors of all these countries.

Don Sancho succeeded his father in the flower of his age, being then in his thirty-first year. Don Sancho I. With him was seated on the throne Dulcia, the daughter of Raymond count of Barcelona, succeeds with and the sister of the king of Arragon (D). It must appear strange, that this prince, who before his accession was so extremely restless and unquiet that he was almost continually in the much reputation, and governs very wisely. b field, from the moment he was seated on the throne became a lover of peace, and began to apply himself with great vigour, to repair the cities that had suffered most by the war, collected from hence, that even from his birth there was something amiss about his legs; so that there is no need of introducing a judgment, or any thing stupendous or miraculous, to account for his weakness and infirmity in his old age. According to the pictures that are preserved of him, he was of a gigantic size, not less than seven feet high; his visage long, his eyes large, black, and full of fire, his mouth wide, his complexion good, and his hair somewhat redder than his father's (1). He instituted two orders of knighthood: the first was that of the wing, because in the battle of Santaren, against the Moors, he saw a winged arm fighting near him, which he took to be that of St. Michael. He instituted it at the monastery of Alcobaza, upon his going thither for a month, after he had obtained that victory (2). The badge of this order was a scarlet wing in a field of gold, its patron St. Michael: the prelate of the order was the prior of Alcobaza, who administered the oath to the knights companions; these were the king and the principal nobility: and the principal duty was to guard and cover the king's standard whenever it was carried into the field. As the king gave no lands for the support of this foundation, though the first knights were persons of the greatest distinction in his dominions, they proved notwithstanding the last (3). In Portugal, as well as in Spain, honours, if unwatered by royal bounty, have the misfortune to be unsought. The other order was that of Avis; of which we shall speak more largely in another place, as it still flourishes in that kingdom with honour. It is also reported, that he received the order of St. James of Compostella, in a full assembly of the states, and by their consent (4). He was very generous to the knights templars, and to the knights of St. John at Jerusalem, and was extremely respected in quality of an accomplished knight throughout all Europe, which may be one probable cause of the many absurd and incredible stories that we are told of his military exploits (5). These obscure and throw into shade other parts of his character, that we have reason to wish had been better explained. The constitutions of Lamego, if they be, as they are generally held, authentic, do not speak his times so barbarous as we find them commonly represented; and in this respect they are particularly remarkable, that through the whole record the king proposes, the prelate and peers deliberate, and the commons approve. He took care to have these laws, as well as his own election, sanctified by bulls from Rome. He knew they could do him no hurt; and it appears plainly that through the course of his reign he lived not only in a good but close correspondence with the holy see.

(D) Don Sancho having married, in the lifetime of his father, Donna Dulcia, daughter of Raymond Berenger, count of Barcelona, had by her Don Alonso, his successor; and Ferdinand, who by the marriage of Johanna, the daughter of Baldwin, emperor of Constantinople, became earl of Flanders. The French monarch, Philip Augustus, is said to have been very instrumental in making this match; but he made him pay dear for it, by the cession of Air and St. Omer's. This occasioned a quarrel between them, in which, tho' Ferdinand was the aggressor, Philip had the advantage, and took from him great part of his country. He was taken prisoner by him in the battle of Bouvines, and remained long in captivity. He was afterwards set at liberty and restored to his dominions by queen Blanch (6). Don Pedro, the third son of king Sancho, was born in 1187, and made a great figure in the world, both in prosperity and adversity. He married the countess of Urgel, and, as we have shewn elsewhere, held for a time the kingdom of Majorca. Don Henry, the fourth son, died young. Donna Theresa, became queen of Leon; but her marriage being annulled by the pope, she retired to the monastery of Lorvum, where she died with the reputation of a saint. Donna Mafalda, or Mathilda, married Henry the first, king of Castile; but her marriage had the same fate with that of her sister. She founded the monastery of Arouca, where she died in 1290. Donna Sancha was abbess of Lorvum; she founded at Alenquer, the first monastery of Franciscans, in the life-time of St. Francis, as he is called. Donna Blanca, styled the lady of Guadalajara, lived and died in Castile; from whence her body was brought into Portugal, and buried at Coimbra (7). Donna Berengara espoused Waldemar the second, king of Denmark; and accompanying that monarch into the field, was killed by an arrow in 1220 (8). By his mistress Donna Maria Anez de Fornellos, the king had Martin of Portugal, count of Trafemara, who commanded the armies of the king of Leon, against his brother Don Alonso and Donna Urraca of Portugal. By another mistress of his, Donna Maria Paes de Ribeira, the king had Martin Sanchez, who became afterwards count of Trafemara, and high steward of Leon; Gil or Giles Sanchez, who became an ecclesiastic; Ruy Sanchez, killed in the battle of Porto; Donna Urraca, married to Laurence Suarez; Donna Theresa, who married Alonso Tollez, from whom are descended the noble family of Monefes, counts of Marialva; and Donna Constantia, who founded the monastery of St. Francis at Coimbra, on the banks of the river Munda (9). It may not be amiss to observe, that the king had these children by Donna Maria Paes, before his marriage, and his son and daughter, by Donna Maria Anez, after the queen's demise.

and to repeople the country round them. He was also very solicitous in respect to their a government, appointing magistrates every where, granting charters and marking out, with great exactness, the several districts that were to depend upon every great town in his dominions. His delight in, and steady attention to, things of this nature, by which in the space of a few years he entirely altered the appearance of his territories, and out of ruined hamlets, and a country frequently ravaged by barbarous enemies, brought well-built towns and innumerable villages to the spectator's eye, procured him the glorious title of restorer of cities, and the father of his country. He was likewise very solicitous in providing proper alliances for his family; and with this view very willingly bestowed his daughter Donna Theresa on the king of Leon, without considering the misfortunes that had arisen from the marriage of his own sister Donna Urraca with the father of this young prince, by which b Donna Theresa stood in so near a relation to him, as brought the like difficulties and distresses upon them. A. D. 1189.

A fleet composed for the most part of English vessels, but having on board a great body of adventurers of all sorts, bound to the Holy Land, entering into the river of Lisbon, was very kindly received and supplied with all sorts of refreshments by the king Don Sancho, who took this opportunity of soliciting them to assist him in a design he had formed for attacking the city of Silves, in Algarve: to which they readily yielded. He joined a squadron of his own galleys, and marched a body of troops by land; and though the place was well defended, it was at length taken, and the English, according to their agreement, rewarded with the c plunder, which was very rich z.

This so alarmed Jacob Aben Joseph, king of Morocco, that he passed the next year from Afric into Spain, with a great body of troops, and having joined the forces raised by his alcaides, passed the Guadiana, and laid siege to Silves; but an English ship being in the harbour, all that were on board joined the garrison, and by their assistance the place was preserved. The king of Morocco then marched to Santaren, the harbour of Lisbon, the king, by their help, and with the assistance of his son-in-law Don Ferdinand of Leon, forced the Moors to retire a. The next year, however, the emperor of Morocco returned into the kingdom of Algarve, with such a superior army, that he not only recovered Silves, but all the places the Portuguese had taken in that kingdom; while d

Don Sancho was forced to act upon the defensive. The war that followed between the Moors, and the monarch of Castile, diverted their forces from the dominions of Portugal; but a body of troops that Don Sancho sent as auxiliaries to the prince before-mentioned, were cut to pieces in the fatal defeat at Alarcos b. The kingdom of Portugal having been put under an interdict by the Pope, on account of the marriage of the king of Leon with the infanta Donna Theresa, obliged the two monarchs to submit to the sentence of divorce; upon which, that innocent and unhappy princess returned to her father's court c. The arrival of a fleet of German and Flemish ships, furnished the means of recovering Silves once again out of the hands of the Moors; but Don Sancho, being sensible of the difficulties that would attend keeping it, caused it to be demolished. He then set himself to form a regular e frontier for the protection of his subjects; and while he was thus employed, the queen Donna Dulcia died, to the great grief of the king, and of the whole nation d.

In the course of this king's reign, there happened, as all the ancient writers agree, a long train of grievous calamities, which were considered as so many judgments from heaven; such as famines, pestilences, earthquakes, feuds amongst the nobility, and great quarrels and disputes amongst the clergy. These the monks took care to attribute to the obstinacy with which the king had opposed the marriage of his daughter, and to some other differences with the court of Rome; but these calumnies made no impression except upon the vulgar. The king Don Sancho was in truth so far from being at all instrumental in bringing evils upon his people, that it was entirely owing to the vigilance and prudence of his conduct, that they f did not suffer much more by these calamities, which were of such a nature, as, in conjunction with the incursions of the infidels, must have ruined the kingdom, under an administration less frugal or less attentive to the welfare of the subject. Don Sancho was in reality the author of their domestic œconomy; he settled the limits of dioceses, and obliged their prelates to be content with them; he brought all the grants made to monasteries into exact order;

a he settled commanderies for all the knights of different kinds that were established in his dominions; he abolished many bad customs that had been long in use, and others that had been lately borrowed from the Moors, from strangers, and from those who resorted to Portugal on many accounts; he connived, in some measure, at the sanguinary contentions amongst his nobility, that, by weakening their forces, his authority might at length take place, without any shew of tyranny, and with the general approbation of the wiser and better part of his subjects ^e.

His last enterprize was the reduction of Elvas, which the miramamolin, during the time of his superiority, had recovered, and with the conquest of which the king was extremely pleased ^f. He caused the churches to be purified, the fortifications to be repaired, and, by granting many privileges and immunities, invited thither a multitude of new inhabitants. He is reputed to have been the best œconomist that ever sat upon the throne of Portugal; for, without oppressing his subjects with taxes, and being esteemed rather liberal than avaritious, he left behind him a treasure of upwards of seven hundred thousand crowns in ready money, besides fourteen hundred marks of silver, and one hundred of gold plate, which he disposed of some time before his death, by his last will and testament; for the due performance of which he took the infant Don Alonso's oath. Authors are not perfectly agreed as to the time of his death; those who are most accurate in other things fix it to the month of March, in the year one thousand two hundred and twelve, when he had reigned twenty-six, and lived fifty-seven years. He was interred, by his own command, with much less pomp than his father, on the left side of the altar of the Holy Cross, in Coimbra, Don Alonso lying on the right. His body being taken up four hundred years after, by order of the king Don Emanuel, that it might be placed in a new tomb, erected to his memory, was found uncorrupt ^g. A circumstance singular and worth recording, independent of any superstitious prejudices.

Don Alonso succeeded his father at the age of twenty-seven, or thereabouts, and is distinguished in the Portuguese history by the surname of the Fat. At the very entrance of his reign he did two very popular acts; he sent a body of infantry to the assistance of the king of Castile, who behaved with great reputation in the famous battle of Navas de Tolosa; and he gave the castle of Avis to the knights of that order, since distinguished by this title, upon which Don Ferdinand Yanez, their grand-master, removed thither from Evora ^h. But notwithstanding this, the lustre of his reign was eclipsed in the very dawn. His father had observed, that he had no great tenderness for his brethren and sisters, which induced him to put the former as much out of his power as possible, by making provision for them in money and jewels; and to the latter he gave some of the best places in the kingdom, with their revenues. To Donna Theresa, queen dowager of Leon, he left Monte-major and Esquerrã; and to Donna Sancha, Alanquer. The king laboured to persuade them, that it was not in his father's power to dismember his dominions; and when he found his eloquence vain, he had recourse to arms. The two princesses, who were much favoured by the nobility, defended themselves vigorously; and at the same time applied themselves to the king of Leon, and to Pope Innocent the third, for their interposition, which they obtained. Don Ferdinand entering the dominions of Portugal, from Galicia, with an army, and the pontiff threatening an excommunication, Don Alonso endeavoured to defend himself against the one, and to excuse himself to the other. Authors differ about the success of the war with Leon; but they agree, that, by the mediation of the crown of Castile, these differences were at last appeased: but, however, the peace of the royal family was so far from being restored, that the infant Don Ferdinand retired to the court of Castile, and the infant Don Pedro, who had served in the army of the king of Leon, withdrew after the peace, and demanded the protection of the miramamolin ⁱ. These events created great jealousies and heart-burnings amongst the Portuguese (E), some being moved by the king's arguments, and believing that one government

(E) In his father's lifetime, the young infant Don Alonso married Donna Urraca, daughter of Alonso, the noble king of Castile, by whom he had issue four sons and one daughter (1). Don Sanko, the eldest, became afterwards his successor. Don Alonso, the second, became, in right of his wife, earl of Bologna, and was actually in France when the people of Portugal recalled him home, for reasons that will appear hereafter. Don

Ferdinand, from a lordship he had of that name, was stiled the Infant of Serpa. He distinguished himself at the head of a corps of troops sent to the assistance of Don Alonso of Castile against the Moors. He espoused Donna Sancha, the daughter of Ferdinand, count de Lara, by whom he had an only daughter, Donna Leonora. The infant Don Vincent, who was the youngest, died in his cradle. The infanta Donna Leonora became vernment only can subsist in one state ; while others, whom Don Sancho had sworn to see a his will obeyed, respected their oaths ; and others again doubted the kindness of a prince to his subjects who shewed so little to his own family.

Compelled by the pope to compromise matters with his family.

THE thunder of the Pope's excommunication had some effect in Portugal, where, though it might not terrify the king, yet it filled the minds of his subjects with such fears and uneasinesses, that Don Alonso could not help perceiving how much it was his interest to recover the good graces of Pope Innocent the third. He first sent his agents to represent, that his disputes with his sisters had no connection with ecclesiastical affairs ; that the places his father had bestowed upon them belonged to the crown, and therefore he had no right to separate them from the rest of his dominions ; that it was a dangerous precedent, and had a tendency to subvert a sovereignty, raised by the valour, and at the expence of the blood of the Portuguese, b to whom Don Sancho, or at least his father, stood indebted for the crown he wore, and could not therefore lessen its value, by impairing its territories ; and that lastly, the advantages gained by the king of Leon, and the party of the infantas, were no proofs of the justice of their cause, but were plainly beneficial to the infidels, by the losses they brought upon both kingdoms. All this was without effect, the Pope was as obstinate as the king of Portugal ; and at length Don Alonso found it expedient to be reconciled to his sisters, in order to have the excommunication recalled, which was accordingly done, and the king absolved with great solemnity^k. The calm that was thus restored had not subsisted long before it was disturbed by the incursions of the Moors, who from Alcaccer-do-Sal, where they had an impregnable fortress seated on a rock, came with such large corps of cavalry into the flat country, along the c banks of the Tagus, that the king found it equally difficult to repel them, or to make himself master of a place, the neighbourhood of which occasioned him so much disturbance. However, a favourable accident, or, to speak with greater propriety, the unexpected interposition of Providence, enabled him to accomplish his wishes. The Germans and Flemings had equipped a numerous fleet, which authors of established reputation assert consisted of three hundred sail, with a great army on board, destined for the Holy Land. In their passage, being dismally beaten by tempests, they were constrained to put into the harbour of Lisbon to refit, at the time Don Alonso was forming an army that might block up at least, if not besiege, Alcaccer.

By the assistance of the crosses takes Alcaccer-do-Sal, and beats the Moorish army.

The king instantly deputed some of the principal persons among his clergy to solicit the crosses for their assistance, alleging, that as they might employ their arms against the Moors in d Portugal, it would answer the ends of their vows as effectually as if they proceeded to the Holy Land. William earl of Holland, and most of the generals, came readily into this proposition ; but about a third part of the fleet, with those on board it, quitted them, out of a scruple of conscience, and, as soon as they were able to put to sea, endeavoured to prosecute their voyage ; in which, however, they were frustrated, and obliged to retire into a port of Italy, where they wintered. The earl of Holland, with most of the nobility and gentry landed, and very frankly offered the king of Portugal their services. On this it was agreed, that they should proceed by sea and block up Alcaccer-do-Sal, while the Portuguese army, reinforced by the knights of all the military orders, marched and invested it by land. The Moors, knowing the importance of the place, and foreseeing the consequences that must follow from the loss of it, e resolved to make their utmost efforts for its preservation. Accordingly the alcaides of Seville, Jaen, Cordova, and Badajoz, marched an army of fifty thousand men to its relief : the Christians thereupon raised the siege, gave them battle, and defeated them, the alcaides of Cordova and Jaen being in the number of the slain^l. The Portuguese writers unanimously affirm, that the banner of the cross was displayed by angels : and that they were sensible of supernatural assistance in the battle. On the 21st of October the fortress surrendered, and was bestowed on the order of St. James ; but notwithstanding the strongest applications that were made to Pope Honorius, he would not be prevailed upon to permit the crosses to remain in the wife of Waldemar, prince of Dinmark. Besides these, the king had one natural son, Juan Alonso, who lies buried in the church of Alcobaza (2). As Don Alonso was in the twenty-seventh year of his age at the time of his accession, and had served with great courage and reputation against the infidels, and was withal married to a princess of very high spirit, he was the less able to bear any restraint ; and having had no share in the difficulties and dangers by which his ancestors had raised this sovereignty to the rank in which he found it, he had nothing to temper that haughtiness of spirit which the sense of his own greatness inspired (3).

a Portugal another year, which gave great discontent to all the Christians in Spain^m. It seems the Pope was desirous of having these troops, and their commanders, at a greater distance.

THE progress of the war being thus interrupted, civil dissensions broke out afresh; the people complained of the severity of the laws; the archbishop of Braga took it amiss, that the king expected the clergy should contribute in troops and money to defend the kingdom against the infidels, and excommunicated those who attempted to levy such taxes by the royal authority: upon which the king seized his revenues, and obliged him to quit his dominionsⁿ. In the midst of these troubles died queen Urraca, on the 3d of November^o. The next year the Pope, by his commissioners, excommunicated the king, and put his dominions under an interdict, which of consequence threw things into the utmost confusion: to put an end to which the king, though a prince of great spirit, entered into a kind of negotiation with his subjects; but while this was depending, Providence removed him out of this life on the 25th of March 1223, in the twelfth year of his reign^p, and before any thorough reconciliation had taken place between him and his sisters. He was interred with little ceremony, under a plain tomb, in the conventual church of Alcobaca (F). His kingdom was left in great confusion, as having been for many months under an interdict, which, depriving the people of all exterior offices of religion, threw them first into amaze, and next into a dissolute course of life, and a contempt of all religion, from whence they were not easily recovered. But at Rome this was little considered, because they knew that the nobility, and better sort of people, feeling the bad effects of such a degeneracy in manners, would be more assiduous to bring their monarch and his ministers, right or wrong, to a compliance with the pontiff's pleasure. A strain of policy that had dismal consequences, and first let in those streams of Judaism and Mohammedism that have been so fatal since.

Differs with his clergy, and dies under ecclesiastical censures, and his dominions under an interdict.

A. D. 1220.

Don Sancho the second, surnamed Sancho with the Hood, succeeded his father when about twenty years of age; a prince of a gentle spirit, and much more indebted to nature than to education. He no sooner ascended the throne, than he found himself oppressed by the mischiefs that had sunk his father into his grave in the flower of his age; that is, the quarrel with the clergy and the princesses his aunts^q. In regard to these two difficult points, he took very different measures. He intimated to the archbishop of Braga, that men had no right to be judges in their own causes; that if he would leave the disputes between the crown and the church, to the arbitration of ecclesiastics of established characters, he was disposed to give them whatever satisfaction they should judge reasonable; and the prelate having condescended to this, satisfaction was accordingly given, and the interdict removed^r. This young prince was not so complaisant to the infantas as he had been submis-

(F) This king was in his person above the common size, and very fat, though his height hindered it from being disagreeable to the eye; his forehead large and open; his eyes full of vivacity; the rest of his features regular; his complexion delicate, and his hair of a bright red, which he wore long flowing upon his shoulders. He was brave, as well as uncommonly strong, which induced him to expose himself so much in the field, that after having been once buried under the slain, and with great difficulty drawn out alive, his subjects took care to restrain him in the field. His reign was full of trouble and disturbance, and yet he was far from being an ill man, or a bad king (4). He was a great promoter of justice; but it was not the name he loved, but the thing, which rendered his conduct liable to misrepresentation. The laws of Lamego had appointed judges in every town: the king did not think this enough; and therefore he caused a general body of laws to be framed, by which they were to render justice, which most of those magistrates considered as curtailing their authority. They were still less pleased with a particular law, by which he gave damages against a plaintiff who brought his action without any just cause of suit. He directed a stay of execution for twenty days, in all capital cases, because in them justice might be at any time carried into act, but injustice could never be redressed. But the regulation which created those troubles he could never appease, was giving redress to the laity, in the king's courts, whenever they were injured by ecclesiastical judges (5). It was for this the archbishop of Braga excommunicated Gonzalo Mendez, his chancellor; for the king's resenting which, the pope excommunicated him. Honorius took another step, which was to the full as strong; he wrote a very abusive letter, in which he told him over and over he was a tyrant. He might be indeed a tyrant; but if it consisted only in hindering the priests from being tyrants over his own subjects, he was a tyrant of a very singular kind; but he was never esteemed so by the bulk of his people, in whose favour he made a law, to hinder the price of necessaries from being raised for the sake of private profit, and to exempt them from taxes, that all who would work might eat (6). This preserved their affection to his person, and their veneration for his memory, in spite of papal censures, which served only to raise confusion in his dominions, and to hinder the progress of his arms against the infidels, who, notwithstanding, through their own intestine divisions, were hindered from doing him much hurt.

five to the priests ; he insisted upon the surrender of the fortresses they held, and threatened ^a to reduce them by force. His aunts upon this had recourse to the king of Leon, who entered Portugal with an army, and either took or had some places surrendered to him. Don Sancho sent him word, that he had no inclination to kindle a war between the two nations ; that he meant no injury or injustice to his aunts, but that one king in one realm was sufficient : upon these grounds the dispute was referred to arbitration ; and the decision was, that the infantas should do homage to the king ; that the inhabitants of their towns should acknowledge his authority, but that they should enjoy all the rents and revenues to their own use. Security being given on both sides for the due performance of articles, the places taken were restored, and Don Sancho left in the free possession of his kingdom ^b ; which however was sadly rent into factions through the too great power of the nobility.

Visits most parts of his territories ; does vast charities, and many acts of justice.

A. D. 1228.

As soon as peace was restored, the king thought proper to visit his territories, to receive homage from his subjects, and to regulate whatever might have fallen into confusion during the disturbance of his father's government. In this progress he did justice, and left marks of compassion and mercy wherever he came. After this, he turned his arms against the Moors, in conjunction with the king of Leon, and obtained several advantages against them, uniting, amongst other places, the town of Serpa to his dominions ^c. Pope Innocent the fourth sent the cardinal bishop of Sebina to hold a council in Portugal, in order to reform the corruption of manners, which, through the interdict cast upon that kingdom by his predecessor, had been chiefly introduced. Where he held that council does not appear, or what was done in it : all we know is, that the legate obliged the king to engage, that whatever canons were made therein should be strictly executed. The king shewed great justice in the quarrel between St. Ferdinand, king of Castile and Leon, and his sisters, which he might easily have improved to his own advantage. That monarch was so sensible of this, that having had an interview with Don Sancho at Sabugal, he restored to him the fortress of Chaves, of which his father had been dispossessed ^d. Some stirrs still continued amongst the clergy in Portugal, where it is on all hands agreed, that their discipline was very much relaxed. The king himself was very intent on carrying on the wars amongst the Moors, and advanced once more into the kingdom of Algarve ; where he might probably have done great things, if he had not been perplexed with perpetual complaints against him to the court of Rome. As it was, he reduced several small places, and kept his own dominions entirely free from those unwelcome

A sudden and strange turn in his subjects' dispositions to his monarch's ruin.

HITHERTO Don Sancho had maintained his credit with his subjects tolerably well ; and they were content to allow, that a prince, very affable in his manners, brave in his person, who did good to many, and injury to none, was a blessing. But now, by a strange turn of fortune, many of the nobility forgetting their duty to the king, committed great exorbitancies ; and because he did not punish these, when in truth it was out of his power, the people began to clamour against him. The infant Don Ferdinand, having violated the immunities of the church, the prelates, notwithstanding the mischief done by the last, had recourse to another interdict ; and the king, though he had no share in the offence, was obliged to make a deep submission, while the infant made a tour to Rome, and underwent a severe penance before he could be again received into the church. It was from these troubles, which had their source in the too great lenity of the king towards a lazy and luxurious nobility, that those terrible disorders arose, which afterwards threw the kingdom into confusion, and drove him out of his dominions. But to set this matter in a clear light, and to shew how this monarch, who is not charged with any glaring vice, such as cruelty, oppression, drunkenness, or debauchery, came to be dethroned, at the instance of his people, by the Pope, will require some compass, though we shall endeavour to confine ourselves within as narrow bounds as truth and perspicuity will allow. ^e

The causes, pretended and real, of this great defection of the people in Portugal.

THE bulk of the Portuguese writers agree, that their king Don Sancho espoused, not long after his accession, Donna Mencia, the daughter of Don Lopes dias de Haro, lord of Biscay ^f by Donna Urraca, the natural daughter of Alonso the ninth, king of Castile, a lady of exquisite beauty ^{*} ; who held Don Sancho in such close captivity, and governed his thoughts and actions with an influence so arbitrary, that, according to the superstitious notions of those times, she was believed to have disturbed his senses by a draught, as if such effects were not every day wrought without any other charms than those which the sex derive from nature. Those who were about the king, who loved his person, and supported his authority, were stigmatized, to render them odious in the sight of the people, by the name of favourites, and said to hold their employments, not through merit, or even the king's choice, but by the a recommendation of the queen. The clergy, who had not so great power at court as they desired, concurred in and conducted this clamour, which, as we observed before, had its first rise from the youthful errors of the infant Don Ferdinand. Don Pedro of Portugal, an older man, and who had seen more of the world, was in the secret of the malecontents, and fomented those confusions, which he hoped might at least place regal power in his hands, if not the regal title; which ambitious scheme did the king great mischief, though it did himself no good; a fate common enough to such disturbers of the public peace.

The king Don Sancho, seeing his nobility rent into factions, and finding it impossible to carry on the war against the Moors in person, and in a manner suitable to his dignity, committed the care of it to Don Pelayo Correa, of the order of St. James; who, with the help of the knights of that and other orders, performed great things in Algarve; the king himself, before he quitted the army, having taken Elvas, and thereby effectually secured the province of Alentejo. Don Pelayo was a nobleman, who, with the most intrepid courage, had a large proportion of coolness and prudence, which enabled him to take every advantage offered by the disputes amongst the Moors, who at this time had thrown off the yoke of the miramolin, and by forming various small principalities, while they thought in their own imagination to strengthen their respective sovereignties, were in reality compassing their common destruction. Don Pelayo, who saw this clearly, took sometimes a town from one, and sometimes a town from another; and at length understanding, while he was employed in one of these sieges, that Aben-Afan, governor of Silves, was in full march, with the greatest part of his garrison, for the relief of Paderna, before which he lay, raised the siege in the night, and by another road arrived unexpectedly before Silves, and invested it. The Moorish general, to repair one mistake committed another; he drew out the forces that were in the last-mentioned place, and returned with all possible expedition to Silves. He attacked the Christians in their camp, with forces harrassed by their great fatigue; and after a brisk assault was repulsed. Those in the town making an effort at the same time, were likewise driven back, the Christians entering with them into the city, which, by this means, was suddenly and unexpectedly taken; and the castle, which was very strong, soon after surrendered upon terms. The reputation of this conquest brought great reinforcements to Don Pelayo, who returned by a quick march to Paderna, and having given the necessary orders, before the troops were in motion, began a general assault as soon as he came before the place, which was presently taken by storm, and most of the inhabitants put to the sword. These great exploits, however, deprived Don Sancho of this able officer; for Don Rodrigo Yunquez, grand master of St. James, dying at this juncture, the commanders elected Don Pelayo, upon which he went to take possession of his new dignity in Castile.

Conquests gained notwithstanding by their forces under the king's auspices against the Moors.

A. D. 1242.

It was not long before the loss of this able and fortunate general was severely felt, from the incursions made by the infidels into the territories of Portugal; and this, though without cause, the malecontents placed to the account of the king, and made it one of their principal motives for applying to the pope, in order to his being deprived of the administration, as a prince who was either negligent or incapable of government. Some historians very honestly confess, that they had come much nearer the truth, if they had owned themselves incapable of being governed; for after all they could fix nothing upon the king, and not much upon those whom they stiled his favourites. There was a spirit of faction and anarchy abroad; and the king and his friends were forced to exert what little strength they had, in order to compel obedience to the king's commands, in points of the greatest consequence to the public safety. Pope Innocent the fourth had called a general council at Lyons in France, where he and his prelates deposed the emperor Frederic; thither the Portuguese commissioners, who were the archbishop of Braga, the bishops of Porto and Coimbra, and two noblemen, repaired; and having set forth their business, the pope very roundly, on the 24th of July, deprived Don Sancho of the administration of his dominions, and declared his brother Don Alonso regent; and he being at Paris, the commissioners repaired thither, and upon the 6th of September administered an oath to him, that he should execute the office of regent faithfully. The infant Don Alonso went immediately to Bologne, where he settled the government of that county in the hands of his consort, to whom it of right belonged, and then prepared for his voyage to Portugal. In the mean time, as most writers say, Raymond Portocarrero seized upon the person of the queen Donna Mencia, and carried her away prisoner, so that she was never heard of more. This affected the king in such a manner, that he resolved to provide for his own safety, and accordingly withdrew into the territories of St. Ferdinand.

The regency of Portugal conferred, by Innocent IV. on the infant Don Alonso.

king of Castile, where he was very kindly received by the infant Don Alonso, who wrote to a the Pope in his behalf; and after insinuating how dangerous a precedent he had made, suggested many reasons to prove, that the regent Don Alonso was in reality the author of those miseries which were falsely ascribed to the king. How much soever this act of friendship, and the high honours that were paid him, might console Don Sancho under his misfortunes, they did not in the least relieve them: however, the prince Don Alonso promised, and did all that was in his power to keep his word^f, and would have kept it effectually, provided the pontiff had not interposed.

Attempt made by the king to recover his territories, by the assistance of St. Ferdinand. As general as the defection seemed to be in Portugal, some of the most considerable among the nobility adhered steadily to their duty, and garrisoned several places of strength for the king: amongst these, Ovedos, Celerico, and Coimbra, were the chief. The regent Don Alonso left nothing unattempted, in order to shake the fidelity of their governors, but without effect. At length he caused Ovedos to be besieged, and reduced by force. This example he

A. D. 1246. judged would have frightened the rest, but he was mistaken. Don Ferdinand Rodriguez Pacheco defended Celerico with such obstinacy, that the regent was compelled to raise the siege^g. Don Ferdinand of Castile besieged Seville the next year, then in the hands of the Moors; but the prince Don Alonso prevailed upon him to spare a part of his army for the service of his unfortunate friend, with whom he entered Portugal, and bore down all before him, till the regent sent some priests into his army, who by scattering the Pope's bulls in favour of the new government, and threatening excommunication to all who opposed it, struck such terror into the army of Castile, that the king, the prince, and Don Lopez de Haro,^c thought it expedient to retire. But the lords of the king's party were proof against the bulls, and every thing else, and took the advantage of this invasion to recruit their garrisons, and re-victual their fortresses; so that the regent found himself obliged to besiege Coimbra in form^h.

Being disappointed in this expedition, he retires to Toledo, and dies. THE unfortunate Don Sancho returned again to Toledo, where he spent the short remainder of his days in acts of penitence and piety, and dyingⁱ in the month of January 1248, was interred with great magnificence in the cathedral of that city, no less deplored by the Castilian than by the few Portuguese noblemen, who were the companions of his disgrace. Such was the melancholy end of this reign, in its twenty-fifth year (G). Here it ought naturally to conclude; but as the Portuguese historians add another event, the reader will probably excuse us for following their example. Martin Freitas, who defended Coimbra, gave the regent Don Alonso so much trouble, that as soon as he had the news of his brother's death, he sent him notice of it; but the governor would not believe him, upon which he offered him a pass and an escorte to go to Toledo, which he accepted. When he came thither, he demanded to see his master's body; when the tomb being opened for that purpose, he deposited the keys of Coimbra by his side: after they had lain a little time, he desired his leave to

(G) This unfortunate monarch was of so weak and tender a constitution in his youth, that his mother, queen Urraca, dedicated him to St. Augustine; and he was actually educated and brought up amongst the canons regular (1). In process of time, however, he outgrew this weakness: his countenance was beautiful; his forehead high and open; his eyes had somewhat of a greenish colour; his complexion pale; and his hair long and light (2). In some of the royal palaces he is represented in scarlet robes, with the crown upon his head, a book in one hand, and a scepter in the other, on the top of which is a dove, intimating the constancy and sweetness of his nature (3). The Spanish historians speak of him as a prince very brave in his person, prudent, mild, punctual in his administration of justice, and who by no means sought to oppress his subjects, or to injure his neighbours (4). There are great doubts about his marriage; for, notwithstanding the best part of the Portuguese historians relate it very positively, and even assert, that it was cancelled and declared null by the Pope, yet Brandan, who is one of the most accurate and judicious, positively asserts the king was never married to Donna Mencia, which he thinks is sufficiently proved, by there not remaining any charter, grant, or other record, amongst the archives of the kingdom in which she is mentioned, which could not have happened if she had been really queen (5). It may be she was never acknowledged by the states; and therefore, though the king's wife, was not considered as his queen. We know not how or when she died, but her corpse lies buried at Najara (6). Pope Innocent pretended to depose Don Sancho as his lord paramount, Portugal being a kingdom tributary to the holy see, yet not from his title or dignity, but from his administration only; which he committed to Don Alonso, count of Bologna, on account of his brother's incapacity. The Portuguese writers however in general agree, that Don Sancho wanted only that boldness, or that cunning, which enables princes to deal with factions, to deceive those who would deceive them, or to destroy, while it is in their power, such as seek their destruction. His brother repaired his loss; he had many of his virtues and good qualities, and withal a spirit of intrigue, and other properties necessary in those times, which Don Sancho wanted (7).

a deliver them to his brother, and so taking them up, returned back to his garrison^k. An action which appeared heroic and extraordinary even to Spaniards.

Don Alonso the third ascended the throne in the thirty-eighth year of his age, and was certainly a prince of very great abilities, exclusive of his immeasurable ambition, to gratify which he had corrupted many of his brother's subjects, and bribed several governors to deliver up the places they held. But being once become the legal monarch of Portugal, he changed the scene, had little or no regard to such as had served him at the expence of their honour; but received all the lords who had been in his brother's interest to the last into his favour and councils; amongst these was Martin Freitas, governor of Coimbra, whom he not only continued in his office, but refused to accept either homage or an oath of fidelity, which favour he would have extended by patent to four generations; but Martin told him bluntly, that though it was a good compliment, it was a bad precedent; and that he would lay his curse upon any one of his posterity who should dare to command in the king's town without having first rendered homage, and sworn allegiance. The king more and more struck with this man's virtue, submitted, and let him take the government in his own way^l. In the second year of his reign, he made a great irruption into Algarve, having a good fleet upon the coast, as well as a numerous army, with which he besieged the city of Faro, then esteemed the capital of the Moorish territories; which after a long siege submitted, the Moors promising upon oath to be the king's obedient subjects. It fell out otherwise at Loule, a town of no great strength, lying to the north-west of Faro, but very populous; and though the king over and over offered them good terms, they obstinately persisted in their resolution to defend the place. The king, upon this, caused it to be attacked, and being carried by storm, every living creature in it was put to the sword, which rigorous severity frightened all the adjacent country into submission^m, and thereby added a considerable district to the dominions of Portugal.

THESE enterprizes, undertaken with spirit, and executed with prudence, raised his reputation at home and abroad, rendered him respected by his neighbours, and dreaded by his enemies. His conduct in civil affairs corresponded with this: while he stood upon so good terms with his subjects, he held an assembly of the states, in which he suggested several wise and just laws, which were readily enacted, and by which he was enabled to reform a multitude of abuses. His power and his popularity were by this means so much increased, that he did, without much difficulty, what his brother ought to have done, and would have done, if he had been able, that is, he punished the licentious and the factious; but he took them singly, and in the most distant parts of his dominions, taking care to efface immediately, by a successful expedition against the Moors, the memory of any punishments that became necessary at home. He took care likewise to remain upon good terms with Pope Innocent the fourth, who had many essential reasons for paying great attention to the king of Portugal, from whose dominions he drew a large revenue, and of whose maritime power he stood sometimes in great need: in a word, Don Alonso distinguished himself as a soldier in the field, and as a statesman in the cabinet, with no small reputation to himself, and with great advantage to his crown and subjects.

THE prosperity which had hitherto attended his councils and his arms, elevated the thoughts of Don Alonso so much, that having pushed his conquests southward within sight of the ocean, he began to think of extending his frontiers on the east, being equally tempted by the weakness of the Moors, and by the beauty and fertility of Andalusia. His next irruption, therefore, was on that side; and his design was to despoil Mohammed Aben-Afen, king of Niebla, of his small territories, which he might have easily accomplished. But Mohammed having put himself under the protection of Don Alonso the Wise, who had lately succeeded St. Ferdinand in the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, demanded succours of that monarch, who took the field with a powerful army, and making use of his superiority, over-run the kingdom of Algarve, and erected the town of Silves into a bishoprickⁿ. The king of Portugal was too wise a prince not to discern the danger he was in; and therefore had recourse to the interposition of the Pope, who readily interfered, and disposed Don Alonso the Wise to listen to an accommodation^o. Don Alonso of Portugal, understanding that this prince had a great affection for a natural daughter of his, Donna Beatrix, whom he had in his youth by Donna Maria de Guzman, discovered an inclination to marry her, to which the king of Castile very readily consented, notwithstanding there were many, and amongst them some very strong, obstacles to such a marriage. In the first place, the king had already a wife; but he found certain divines who judged her sterility a sufficient cause to dissolve that marriage. In the next place, the ties of consanguinity stood in the way; but by his interest with the Pope, it was hoped a dispensation might be obtained. Besides all this, there was a great disproportion in point of age; Don Alonso was in his forty-third year, and Donna Beatrix not ten. However, the marriage was concluded; and the monarch of Castile gave the kingdom of Algarve, reserving homage, and the town of Silves, in dowry with his daughter^p. The next year the king of Portugal held another assembly of the states at Leyria, where several useful regulations were made, and the interior concerns of the kingdom settled, to the general satisfaction of all his subjects, except the clergy (H).

This marriage disapproved by the Pope, and the kingdom put under an interdict.

A. D. 1254. THE marriage between Don Alonso and Donna Beatrix was celebrated as soon as that lady was turned of twelve years of age; and the rejoicings on that subject were hardly over, before Pope Alexander IV. who had succeeded Innocent, on the application of the countess Matilda, directed the archbishop of Compostella to separate the king and queen, till the merits of the cause could be heard, to which the king would not give ear. The countess herself made a tour to Compostella, to quicken the motions of the Pope's legate^q. Some Portuguese historians say, that she came to Cascaes in that kingdom by sea; but the fabulous circumstances they add destroy the credit of this relation. All that we know with certainty is, that the countess returned into France, and applied herself to St. Lewis; and that the Pope's legate, finding the king obstinate, put his kingdom under an interdict^r. The king remained, notwithstanding, inflexible, and having brought his nobility into subjection, proceeded in repairing, fortifying, and peopling his dominions, with so much the more spirit, as he had now a son and a daughter to inherit them. In the mean time Alexander being succeeded by Urban the fourth, Don Alonso resolved to try whether he might not be softened; and while he meditated this application, the countess Matilda died, and not only forgave him on her death-bed, but left him also a very considerable sum of money, as a testimony of her sincerity^s. These lucky incidents induced the king to call a general assembly of his clergy, upon whom he prevailed to address themselves unanimously to the Pope on the behalf of himself and his family, which they did: and Pope Urban at their request granted a dispensation, legitimated the children of Donna Beatrix, and removed the interdict, the rather because it had hardly ever been observed^t. In order to prevent all disputes in succeeding times with the crown of Castile, the two kings caused the boundaries between their respective dominions to be settled by commissioners, and recognized this settlement by a settlement dated the fifth of June. At the same time the homage of Algarve was reduced to the sending fifty lances to the assistance of the monarch of Castile, when demanded; and in all probability Silves was likewise restored, since we find it in the next year in the hands of the king of Portugal, who augmented the privileges of its inhabitants^u. The happy issue of his enterprizes, and the flourishing state of his territories, occasioned by his frequent progress from one part of them to another, induced the king to extend the authority of the crown, and to oblige the clergy, and even the prelates, to contribute to the welfare of the state, and to the discharge of those expences which he thought requisite for the safety and welfare of his people. This quickly revived the old disputes; and Martin archbishop of Braga pushed things so far as to put the kingdom again under an interdict: after which he made his escape to Rome.

(H) As we have given the reader a succinct account of the other five, we will also speak to this sixth and last province of the kingdom of Portugal, and which, though small, has been, and still is reputed a kingdom. It is unanimously agreed, that Algarve is taken from the Arabic word Algarbia: and it is almost as universally agreed, that this signifies a fertile country; but it may be, this etymology was derived rather from the nature of the province to which it refers, than from the genius of the language from which it is supposed to be deduced; for there is no doubt that in Arabic the genuine signification of the word is no more than the west point (8). It is the most southern of all the provinces of Portugal, being bounded, on that side, as well as on the west, by the ocean; on the east by Andalusia, from which it is separated by the Guadiana; on the north by a ridge of hills, called Sierras de Calderaon, which divides it from the province of Alentejo. It is in all respects perhaps the best fortified country by nature in the world, since the steep banks of the Guadiana, and the mountains behind them, may be considered as impenetrable intrenchments; and the same thing may be affirmed of the mountains of Calderaon (9). It extends about twenty-seven leagues in length, but is scarce any where so many miles broad, though there are commonly reckoned about thirty-five leagues of coast. But this narrow space produces great abundance of corn, that which grows about Cape St. Vincent being esteemed the best in Portugal. Besides this, there are numberless vineyards, and whole woods of fig trees, which with raisins, almonds, and a plentiful fishery upon its coasts, have justly gained it the reputation of a very rich country. In ancient times it had the title of a county, and Don Alonso was the first who assumed the title of monarch of Portugal and Algarve. The arms of this kingdom, given by Don Alonso, were sanguine semee of castles, or. Over them he placed the arms of Portugal; so that the castles of the former made an orb to the latter. He also made an alteration in the number of bezants in each escutcheon of the Portuguese arms, leaving but eleven in each, whereas before there were thirteen. (1) a It appeared, however, necessary to Don Alonso to give the Pope very strong assurances of his respect and obedience; and at the same time to inform him, that the prelates who had quitted his kingdom did it without any real necessity, and that they might return without any apprehensions. He then went with his queen and the infant Denis, heir apparent of his dominions, to Seville, to pay a visit to her father, who was so well pleased with his grandson, that for his sake he remitted all claims whatsoever upon the crown of Portugal, and declared its monarchs free from all kind of homage, which gave his subjects no small offence *. After he returned into Portugal, Don Alonso dispossessed the knights of several orders of the places they held, and annexed them to the crown, under various pretences; but in reality he thought fortresses in the hands of subjects a thing incompatible with the safety of the monarchy. These and some other steps taken, he began to think it time to perfect his reconciliation with the Pope, and after various altercations, called an assembly of the states at Santarem, to enquire into and redress the grievances of the clergy; but as this did not produce immediately all that was expected from it, the Pope talked in higher terms, and threatened to release his subjects from their obedience and their oaths of fidelity, which likewise had but little operation, though this threat was repeated more than once *. Obtains an exemption from all claims from Castile, by an act of address. A. D. 1277.

THE whole reign of Don Alonso was a scene of policy well conceived, and executed with very great address. The king rewarded and punished with equal justice (1). He was extremely active and vigilant in points of real concern to his government; and perceiving that it was no longer practicable to extend his dominions, very prudently bent his whole care to their improvement. In some places he founded new cities, in others he repaired old ones: he granted new privileges to a multitude of places, and was particularly solicitous for the relief of the common people. He caused many churches to be erected, and founded and endowed some convents. In his differences with the clergy, he acted as he thought fit; but never without plausible reasons, had his agents constantly at the court of Rome, and amused more than one pontiff during his whole reign, with a fruitless negotiation. He received the cardinals and legates that came into Portugal with all possible respect, treated them with the utmost magnificence, and left nothing unattempted to gain their friendship; but in point of action he was more sparing, till at length, finding himself sinking under the weight of a mortal disease, he took a resolution of being reconciled to the church: having made a full submission, done some things, and directed the infant Don Denis to perform the rest, he received the absolution from the hands of Stephen abbot of Alcobaza, and departed this life on the sixteenth of February, 1279, in the thirty-first year of his reign, and the sixty-ninth of his life *. He left the kingdom of Portugal complete to his successors, which had been gradually augmented by himself and his predecessors †; and therefore his reign naturally puts an end to this section. Reconciled on his death-bed to the church, Pope, and clergy.

(1) This prince was very remarkable in his person, being in stature much above the ordinary size of men, which appeared not only from his pictures, but from the view of his body, when at the command of king Sebastian, his tomb was opened: his countenance was open and pleasant; his eyes small, but sparkling; his hair black; his complexion ruddy; he was very adroit in all the exercises becoming a prince; very gallant in his person, and formed to attract the love and esteem of all about him. In times of peace, and when his revenue would permit, he affected magnificence; but when his affairs required it, he was extremely prudent and frugal. He loved to be called the friend of the poor, to which he had a good title, since he pawned his crown to furnish them with bread in a time of scarcity. His familiarity and interest with the people, made him respected by the nobles, and obeyed by the clergy, even against the wills of several Popes. It appears, by their epistles, that his horrid and grievous oppressions of the clergy were in reality nothing more than obliging them to do justice, and to live suitable to their characters, by punishing them as well as he did the rest of his subjects, if they were deficient in either. He is blamed by the Portuguese for his complaisance to Don Alonso the wife, of Castile; but the Spaniards say, that he made him pay so dear for it, that he had a better title to be stiled the wife than he; it may be, his claim may be better supported from these maxims to which he steadily adhered: he had many counsellors, but no favourites; he punished severely, and rewarded generously; his income was the rule of his living, and though he loved pleasure and expence; he chose to retrench rather than impose any new taxes upon his subjects; but he was exact in levying his revenue; and when he resumed the grants he had made while regent, he gave no other reason than that those to whom he made the grants did not deserve them (2). In a word, he acted the politician whenever it was necessary, and as far as it was necessary; but at other times he was as frank, as gentle, and as liberal as his brother, whom if he had used better, his reputation had been without stain.

THE king Don Denis, surnamed the Liberal and the Father of his Country, succeeded his father in the nineteenth year of his age, and began his reign in a manner that gave great offence to the Spaniards, and which is highly commended by the Portuguese historians. It seems the queen dowager, Donna Beatrix, thought herself entitled in that quality to take a large share in the government, which the king was by no means inclined to permit; upon which she retired in great displeasure to her father the king of Castile, who, at her request, made a journey to Badajoz, and solicited the king of Portugal to make him a visit there; but the young king, being determined not to depart from his point, and foreseeing that in this case such an interview might be attended with disagreeable consequences, contented himself with sending the princes and princesses of the royal family to pay their respects to the monarch of Castile; but could not be prevailed on by any intreaties to make him a visit, which was so ill taken by his mother, that she refused to return into Portugal, believing that she should be less considered there than in the dominions of the king her father^a. As for Denis, he consulted the principal nobility about his person on the important subject of his marriage: and by their advice was determined to send three of the principal lords of his court to demand Donna Isabella, the daughter of Don Pedro king of Arragon, who was very justly reputed the most amiable princess in Spain, as well for her virtue and prudence as for her exquisite beauty; which negotiation was speedily accomplished to the great joy and satisfaction of both kingdoms, though the marriage was not celebrated till two years after^b. The infant Don Sancho of Castile, having about this time formed a resolution of assuming very unjustly the administration during the life-time of his father, demanded the friendship of the kings of Arragon and Portugal, which, from motives of policy, they granted him, though not long after they had just reasons to repent^c. It was, however, in some measure owing to this alliance, that the new queen Donna Isabella, passing through Castile, in her way to Troncoso, where the marriage was to be solemnized, was received by queen Violante and part of the royal family, by whom she was treated with all possible marks of affection and respect. On her arrival on the frontiers of Portugal, she was received by some of the principal nobility, who conducted her to Troncoso, where the marriage was celebrated with all the splendor suitable to such a ceremony, and to the disposition of the king, who was the most magnificent prince of that age^d.

THE joy and satisfaction which diffused itself through the kingdom of Portugal upon this occasion, were quickly interrupted by the revival of the old disputes with the clergy, which very soon ran as high as ever: for the king, being very intent on correcting those disorders which the last interdict had brought into the kingdom, and in which the ecclesiastics had as great a share as the rest of his subjects, the prelates interposed, and the archbishop of Braga particularly insisted upon the king's giving the bishops satisfaction in several points; and, upon his refusal, had recourse to the old remedy, which the clergy had ever at their fingers ends, an interdict^e. The king bore this with great temper and patience, representing to the clergy, that the punishment was not only great, but of a nature perfectly different from the offence, since he neither favoured heresy nor heretics, and never intermeddled with ecclesiastical affairs, or offered any insult to the church, or its members. He then desired they would specify what their demands were; and having regulated every thing as well as he could, he desired their agreement might be sent to Rome, and have the sanction of the Pope's approbation. This was accordingly done; and Martin the fourth, one of the most haughty pontiffs ever seated in the chair of St. Peter, moderated some of the demands of the clergy, and approved the king's concessions^f. The five points of which the clergy complained most, were these, that the king insisted that his hereditary estates were free from tythe; that he would not suffer the clergy to purchase land estates; that he insisted upon a fourth part of the price when they did; that he would not permit them to carry money out of the kingdom when and in what proportions they pleased; and that when lands were left to the church, he insisted they were still liable to the taxes with which they were formerly charged.

- ^a THE king found himself at the same time in danger of a rupture with Don Sancho the His brother Brave, now become king of Castile, Don Nunez de Lara, his subject, having taken refuge Don Alonso in Portugal. However Don Denis believing they should understand one another better in a raises an insur- conference, proposed an interview to Don Sancho, which was readily accepted. There rection, and ad-
the two kings agreed, that it was highly expedient for both, for the king of Portugal to vance a claim take into his own hands those places on the frontiers which his father had given to the infant to the throne.
Don Alonso, and this produced a quarrel between the two brothers, insomuch that Don Alonso not only took up arms in his own defence, but insinuated also, that he had a better title to the crown, because Don Denis was born during the life-time of the countess of Bologne, and himself after her decease. The king coming with an army before Portalegre, where the A. D. 1287.
^b infant Don Alonso was, with what strength he could raise, he quickly found his affairs in so untoward a condition, that he was very well content to listen to any propositions the king would make; and upon his assurance, that he meant him no injustice, and that he was willing to give him a settled revenue of forty thousand pounds, he resigned the towns of Ourem and Cintra, which were the principal places in question^e. The war that followed between the crowns of Castile and Aragon, occasioned another interview between Don Denis and Don Sancho, at Sabugal, where they parted good friends^h. By this time the clergy were become restless again: upon which the king applied first to the Pope, now Nicholas the fourth, who heard the Portuguese prelates in person, and the king by his proctors; and decided, that if the king swore to maintain his agreement, the clergy should abide by it: and ^c accordingly an assembly of the states was called for this purpose, in which the king swore with all the solemnity the Pope had prescribed, and the clergy were constrained to be quiet for this timeⁱ. But they still retained a grudge against the ministers, on account of the advice given by them in these affairs.

As there were few princes so learned in this age, so it may be truly asserted, there was Wise provisions none more a friend to learning, or learned men, than the king of Portugal, who erected an made by the university at Lisbon, and ordered schools and other seminaries of learning to be set up in all king for the
the great towns throughout his dominions^k. This gained him the affection of the better safety and im- part of the clergy, notwithstanding he adhered steadily to his own maxims, and, by the advice provement of
of his brother Don Alonso, who was now thoroughly reconciled to him, procured a law to his dominions.
^d be enacted by the states, which forbid, under very severe penalties, the selling of any land to ecclesiastical communities, whether regulars or seculars; and upon these wise principles, that the church was but a trustee for the poor, and that therefore, in accumulating wealth, she laid up what was not her own: that it was an injury to suffer this money to be vested in land, for the maintenance of indolent and lazy people; and that it tended strongly to weaken and impoverish the nation to suffer those to purchase any thing who could part with nothing, and who, in process of time, must of necessity acquire all^l. Some things he had done in the beginning of his reign, he now thought it necessary to cancel and rescind, such as grants without proper motives, and a kind of asylums, or cities of refuge, to which such as had committed homicides, or other crimes, might repair and reside safely; but this was after they ^e had answered the ends for which he granted these privileges, that is, when from being empty they were become inhabited, and when those, who setting the laws at defiance, had maintained themselves by rapine in rocks and mountains, had again so far entered into obedience, as to fix their residence in the frontier towns, from whence he took care they should not be able to depart, and where that humour, so dangerous elsewhere, might be useful against the infidels.

We are assured by many of the Portuguese authors, that Don Sancho the Brave made The true sources inroads into the territories of king Denis, and laid them waste with fire and sword, without any of the dif- provocation; and that upon this the monarch of Portugal, being not immediately able to ferences: so long resist him, sent him a challenge. But it is infinitely more probable, that these hostilities subsisting with ^f were not committed till after the death of that prince, who, if the most accurate of the Spanish the crown of historians may be depended upon, had another interview with king Denis, in which a double marriage was concluded between their families, and some other points stipulated for the advantage of the king of Portugal, Don Sancho being then in a very declining state, his heir apparent a child, and his concerns in great confusion. It was to enforce these terms, and to recover the fortresses on the side of Castile, which his mother, Donna Beatrix, had all along held, that Denis began to arm immediately after Sancho's death, chiefly by the persuasion of his brother Don Alonso, who had for many years been carrying on intrigues with the male-content lords, and in conjunction with them, was now very desirous of drawing some advantage from the weakness inseparable from a minority under the direction of female councils. At least this is the most probable account of this rupture, which did not continue long, though a possibly there might be some great acts of violence committed on both sides; for the queen regent of Castile, perceiving plainly of what consequence the friendship of the king of Portugal might be, and the infant Don Henry, to whom she gave a share of the administration, pressing her to a speedy accommodation, it was agreed, that a negotiation should be set on foot, and in order to bring it the sooner to a conclusion, the management of it was left in the hands of the infant Don Henry, who, the Spaniards say, had a very great complaisance for the monarch of Portugal, but whom the Portuguese writers assert, managed this treaty with great skill and dexterity^m.

Compromised
at last by a double marriage in the royal families.

THE issue of all these conferences was an interview between Don Denis and the queen dowager of Castile, in which the former contracts were renewed, and the places, which the king of Portugal thought necessary for his safety, were abandoned to themⁿ. The pacification that was thus brought about lasted not long; for the troubles in Castile augmenting, and there being no less than two competitors set up against Don Ferdinand, viz. Don Alonso de la Cerda, who had claimed against his father, as we have shewn in another place, and the infant Don Juan, brother to the deceased Don Sancho, Don Denis was prevailed upon, from political motives, to put himself again in arms, in order, by the assistance of the kings of Arragon and Granada, to establish la Cerda on the throne of Castile, and the infant Don Juan in the kingdom of Leon. Yet after some skirmishes, in which there was but too much blood shed on both sides, a new negotiation was set on foot, which produced another interview with the queen dowager of Castile, when, through the interposition of the queen of Portugal, who was sincerely desirous of peace, things were brought somewhat nearer a conclusion than they had been before, by an exchange of the two princesses, Donna Constantia being left in Castile, where, as soon as she was of a proper age, she was to marry the king; and Donna Beatrix, that monarch's sister, who was to espouse Don Alonso, prince of Portugal, returned with them into their own dominions^o. In some short time after this, the king's brother, Don Alonso, pressed him to legitimate his children, not that they were bastards, but that the princess his wife was so nearly allied to him, that he had just reason to apprehend the validity of their marriage might be some time or other questioned. The king, who was naturally tender and humane, complied with this request; but refusing not long after to unravel, at his brother's sollicitation, all that had been concluded with the king of Castile and his brother, Don Alonso revived his old discontents, and at length broke out into open rebellion. However, the king had so great success in this dispute, that his brother found himself blocked up in the city of Portalegro, and in great danger of being reduced to extremities; if his mother the queen Donna Beatrix, and his sister-in-law the queen of Portugal, had not interposed in his behalf, and induced the king to grant him more honourable and advantageous terms than he had any reason to expect^p. This flame thus extinguished, king Denis resolved to proceed with all imaginable diligence to the celebration of those marriages upon which the peace of Spain and his own dominions so much depended, and in consideration of which a cession had been made him by the late treaty of a very considerable district in Galicia.

Advantages
accruing to the crown of Castile
by this close alliance with Portugal.

IN consequence of the joint application of the courts of Castile and Portugal at Rome, the necessary dispensations were obtained; but notwithstanding this, the new troubles that broke out in Castile occasioned a delay of the marriage; which, however, was at length solemnized at Valladolid, with all the solemnity the distracted state of affairs in that kingdom would permit. It was not long after that Don Ferdinand desired an interview with his father-in-law at Badajoz, to which he consented, and it was managed with great friendship and tenderness on both sides^q. But the king of Castile being very young, and at variance with his mother, to whose care and prudence he owed the preservation of his life, his crown, and dominions, he was prevailed upon by those about him frequently to vary his designs, and sometimes to pursue such as were not very consistent either with his interest or his duty; and because the king of Portugal did not supply him with such sums of money as he desired, some of the Spanish writers have treated his memory rudely; and on the other hand, the Portuguese historians, in resentment of this, have magnified exceedingly the obligations conferred upon him by his father-in-law. It is, however, on all hands agreed, that the king Don Denis assisted him in his wars against the Moors, made a new tour, at his request, into Castile, and after having spent some days with the king and his mother, went with them to Agreda, where they met the king of Arragon, and where, by the interposition and mediation of Don Denis, all points in dispute between those two monarchs were amicably determined, and a compensation settled, which was to be given to the family of la Cerda. We do not enter into the particulars of these important treaties here, because they have been already fairly and fully represented in the

- a history of Spain, and the only end for which they are mentioned here is to shew how much the monarchy of Castile, and indeed all Christendom, were indebted to the prudence and moderation of Don Denis, who, by temporizing with all parties, brought to an end those differences which had perplexed Spain for so many years, and prevented the infidels from taking those advantages that otherwise they certainly would have done of recovering a part at least of what had been taken from them. It may be, and indeed it is highly probable, that in the course of twenty years transactions, embarrassed with difficulties and confusions of all kinds, Don Denis might do many things rather excusable in a politician than commendable in a prince; yet upon the whole, and taking in the difficulties to which he was exposed by the continual perplexities of his brother, and the pressing suggestions of the king of Arragon, he had much less regard to his own interests, and was infinitely more careful of the affairs of his son-in-law than is usual amongst princes. If it be true, which the Spanish writers assert, that in most of these points he was influenced by his queen, yet this will not acquit them of any part of the obligation, since the great authority that princess gained over him was chiefly owing to the high opinion he entertained of her wisdom and prudence, and not at all from a weak or uxorious disposition, which might have led him to a blind compliance with whatever she desired.

- It was indeed in a great measure owing to the prudence of this great princess, and the great respect paid her, that the kings of Castile, Arragon, and Portugal, lived for so many years in so good intelligence; and that when Don Ferdinand at length complained, that his guardians had been over-reached in his nonage in those cessions that were made to the crown of Portugal, and threatened to recover them by arms, Don Denis was induced to leave the matter in dispute wholly to the decision of the king of Arragon, to whom both kings sent ambassadors, and who was on the point of pronouncing sentence when the king of Castile died. This entirely changed the face of affairs: Denis entered warmly into the interests of that crown, and neglected nothing that might support his grandson upon the throne, or the queen, his daughter, in the regency. He was the more able to do this, as every thing was entirely quiet in his own dominions; the death of his brother, the infant Don Alonso, having freed him from brother responsible, treating them, on the contrary, with the same kindness and courtesy as if the deceased infant had been the best subject in his dominions. The repose of princes, however, is seldom of long continuance, and the death of his daughter, the queen of Castile, which threw the regency of that kingdom again into the hands of the old queen dowager, was the first source of his chagrin, and it was quickly followed by a new and greater misfortune.

- THE prince Don Alonso, under various pretences, made several tours to the court of Castile, and the queen dowager burning with impatience to see her daughter Beatrice a queen, which gradually impaired that reverence due from him to the king his father, whose sentiments and whose actions he began to criticise, he in a little time found himself at the head of a strong party. At first Don Denis endeavoured to reclaim him by good advice, by shewing him the folly of such a proceeding, and by assuring him, that, when he came to the throne, he would find those persons who were now his favourites less fit to be trusted than any of his subjects. But these salutary representations, instead of producing any effects, only inspired the prince with stronger inclinations to increase his party, and to render himself formidable, by becoming the head of all the malecontents in the kingdom. Don Denis dissembled his resentment, and persisted in pursuing the wise designs he had formed for the benefit of his subjects. He regulated the proportion and manner of levying the taxes on the Moors settled in his dominions, and this in such a manner as proved equally satisfactory to them and to his successors. He treated the knights templars, persecuted by the Pope and all the princes of Europe, with equity and clemency: he improved one military order, and instituted another, under those regulations which have for the most part continued ever since, and which rendered both of them dependent upon the crown, and useful to the state.

- THE king, who saw with infinite concern the disturbances that continued in Castile, and apprehended the Moors would take advantage of them, as well as of those in his own dominions, thought it prudent to have a good fleet at sea, to prevent their drawing over reinforcements from Africa; and to defray the expence of this armament, he sent ambassadors to the Pope, then at Avignon, to desire his permission to levy a tax upon the clergy; to procure his approbation of the new order of knighthood, and his interposition with his son, to prevent the kingdom from being plunged in a civil war. His ambassadors, besides the instructions they carried on all the heads, were likewise intrusted with a very considerable present in ready gold, which, as the Pope's finances were in much disorder, was very kindly accepted, and procured them a speedy dismissal, with all that they could desire^w. On the other hand, the prince Don Alonso had again recourse to the queen dowager of Castile, who was his oracle, and, as the Portuguese authors^x assert, prompted him to that conduct he pursued. Ferreras expresses some resentment at this, and styles it^y a cruel attempt to blacken the memory of that great queen; but at the same time confesses, that the king of Portugal forbid his son to go into Castile: that notwithstanding this he went thither with the princess his consort; and that the queen dowager went to meet them, and had a long conference with them; soon after which the troubles in Portugal began. This shews that he was a better historian than an apologist; and though offended with the liberties taken with the queen Donna Maria's character, he would not attempt to defend it at the expence of truth.

breaks out, in which the king is victorious over prince Alonso.

THE prince Don Alonso committed his first hostilities in paper. He published a strong manifesto against his father, in which he charged him with applying to the Pope, to legitimate his natural son, Alonso Sanchez, with an intent to render him his successor. In answer to this, the king declared it never entered into his thoughts; the Pope asserted in the most solemn manner, that no such application had ever been made to him, and appeared extremely incensed at the report^z. The prince then varied his story, and charged his natural brother with an attempt to poison him, and affirmed he had in his hands the most convincing proofs^a. The king found means to come at these proofs, and published to the world when and where they were forged by the prince's orders. Alonso then employed some of those desperate persons who were about him to assassinate Don Alonso Sanchez: he failed in this too, and then broke out into open rebellion, prevailing upon the governor of Leyria to surrender to him that important place. The king presently marched that way with a body of troops: upon which the inhabitants took up arms, and compelled the garrison to open the gates, assuring the king that they had no share in the governor's treasons. Don Denis acted with more severity than he had ever shewn upon any other occasion; he put the governor and part of his garrison to death, and left the town to the custody of the people^b. While he was thus employed, the prince took Santarem, which, however, the king quickly recovered. The prince then amused him with a treaty, and attempted to surprize Lisbon, which by a quick march his father disappointed; he afterwards came up with him near Cintra, defeated his forces, and might have made him prisoner, but the king forbid his troops either to take or hurt him^c.

THIS was so far from having any effect on the prince, that when he was in a condition to take the field again, he kept no kind of measures, but burnt and destroyed without mercy the country wherever he came. What puts his behaviour out of dispute, and sufficient to mark a brand of infamy upon his memory, is the case of Girard, bishop of Evora, who having acquainted him, that if he continued to act in this manner, and did not return to his obedience, the Pope had given him full powers to proceed against him by spiritual censures; but that he was still desirous of respecting in him the blood of his prince; for which admonition the prelate was barbarously put to death^d. James, king of Aragon, sent his brother Don Sancho to compromise these matters, but he had no better success than the rest of the mediators: on the contrary, the prince's army having become very numerous, he was persuaded to lay siege to Guimaraez: there his brother, the infant Don Pedro, came to him, but authors are not very clear, whether it was to give him good advice, or to join with him in his evil practices. However, the place being strong, made a vigorous defence; and the king having now lost all patience, marched with a very complete army towards Coimbra, now in the prince's hands. This, as he expected, brought the prince to its relief, and consequently to hazard a battle; but the good queen Isabella interposed, and after passing several times between both armies, procured at length a cessation of arms. The king went then to Leyria, to which place the prince followed him of his own accord, threw himself at his feet, and desired his forgiveness, of which his father gave him the strongest assurances^e. He removed from thence to Lisbon, where he fell dangerously ill, made his testament, by which he founded an university at Coimbra, and gave very large sums to the poor. The prayers of his subjects saved his life; but he was no sooner recovered than he had the dissatisfaction of perceiving that his son was relapsed. He discovered his bad intentions by presenting a memorial, in which he demanded many things beyond what his father had promised him. The king received this memorial without heat, and laid it before his council, who unanimously advised the king to reject it. The prince, who was prompted to this by some about him, immediately drew his forces together, and attempted to seize Lisbon, upon which the king also assembled forces; but a before he marched against his son, he sent a gentleman of his bed-chamber, whose name was Azevedo, to tell him that he acted as much against his interest as his duty; that he was teaching those rebellion whom he was shortly to govern; that he was ruining a kingdom which would be his own; and that as his health was daily declining, if the prince consulted his credit, he would at least suffer him to die in peace. Alonso was little moved with this, and only answered, that his father used him harshly, and meant to use him worse. Azevedo replied, that the king had no such intentions, and that he was abused by such as told him these stories. The prince bid him be gone, if he had a mind to keep his head. "I do not value my head, sir, returned, Azevedo, in the king's service; the only pain I shall feel in losing it, is perceiving that he has begot a son capable of such an act." After all, the queen b reconciled them a second time, and the prince went again to kiss his father's hand, who received him with much affection, assured him of his forgiveness, and suggested to him a great deal of good advice^f. The prince behaved on his side with all exterior marks of submission, and sorrow for what had passed.

THIS reconciliation did not last so long as the former; for as the prince did not care to live with his father, he was continually surrounded with flatterers, who poisoned his mind with jealousies and suspicions; for he was not either disobedient or obstinate of himself, but rather of a contrary disposition. The point upon which they chiefly insisted was the kindness shewn by Don Denis to his natural son Alonso Sanchez, to whom he had given the first employment in the kingdom, and who acted as his prime minister. They persuaded the prince to demand of his father the divesting him of his employment, and removing him from his person. This mortified Don Denis to the last degree, more especially when he saw that some of his most faithful servants advised him to yield. Alonso Sanchez cut the matter short; and to justify the king's conduct, by shewing that he respected nothing in him but merit, resigned his office freely, and retired into Castile^g. The prince Don Alonso upon this came to the court, and brought with him his little son Don Pedro, with whom the king was exceedingly pleased. In a very little time the prince made a strange alteration in his conduct, and gradually expelled from his presence those who had been the authors of his revolts. The king going from Leyria to Santarem, spent some time there, as being very much pleased with the country. He went from thence to Lisbon, where finding himself again indisposed, he sent immediately to the prince, and after giving him a great deal of good advice, and pointed out to him the means of avoiding the bad consequences that might naturally attend his former faults, he breathed his last on the thirtieth of December, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and at the close of the forty-fifth year of his reign, to the universal grief of his subjects of all ranks, who not only revered him as their prince, but loved him as their parent^h (A). (A) This monarch was of a middle stature, broad shoulder'd, full faced, his hair black, and his eyes large. He applied himself diligently to his studies in his youth; and when he came to the possession of his throne, he considered reigning as a science, which it was his business to acquire; but he took a very singular way of learning it, and which nothing but the strength and excellency of his own genius could have rendered successful (1). We have observed, he differed with his mother, and declined an interview with his grandfather; and from the same motive he dismissed his father's ministers, being resolved to have no instructors. His first care was to visit his dominions, province by province, and wherever he came he took notice of what he thought right, and what wrong (2). He was particularly careful of agriculture, and favoured it so much through his whole reign, that the country people called him the husbandman. He had a most magnificent crown, and a large scepter, made of the gold washed out of the sands of the Tago. When it was suggested to him, that the labour in picking this gold was more than it was worth, he added calmly, but it is a fine exercise for those who have nothing to do (3). In the twenty-second year of his age, he corrected all that he had done amiss at the opening of his reign, and from that time would do nothing without good advice, which when some wondered at, he said pleasantly, that it was a dangerous thing for kings to take advice, before they know how to distinguish it, and imprudent to act without it afterwards. He understood all things, and he rewarded all men, provided they had merit; and this was such a spur to industry, that it raised his revenue exceedingly, without imposing taxes (4). He did not hoard money, but chose to empty his coffers in works of utility and magnificence, some of which are yet remaining, and appear to have been very costly. He excused this to those that wondered at it, by saying, if I do not give it them, they cannot give it me; meaning, that if wealth did not circulate, his revenues must sink. He was particularly careful in keeping up a naval force; so that he was master at sea, during his whole reign. He was very strict in the administration of justice; and one great cause of his disputes with his clergy, was his not suffering priests to violate the laws with impunity. He built a magnificent tomb for himself in the monastery of Odivellas, where he was interred (5). He possessed the hearts of his people so entirely, that there was not a family in his dominions but lamented his death as a misfortune to themselves. All the Portuguese authors concur in their commendations of Don Denis, and stile him the father of husbandmen, and the protector of commerce (6).

Some remarks upon the reign of Don Denis, and on the trade of Portugal. HE was, without all doubt, one of the wisest, most fortunate, and most magnificent monarchs of his time. He gave largely, but he gave with propriety; yet he did this so often, so freely, and with such an apparent pleasure, that his name became a proverb, and they say to this day, As generous as king Denis. His bounty, however, was not restrained to gifts: he founded two universities, and a military order; he completed many good designs that his predecessors had left unfinished; he fortified and raised magazines in most of his frontier towns, arsenals in his ports, and in other things was at a vast expence, and never without money; yet he did not either tax or oppress his subjects. His wealth was the wonder of his own times; for observing how thoroughly he performed whatever he undertook, the common people were wont to say, that Don Denis could do what he would. This is an argument that there must have been a vast trade then in Portugal; and another proof of this is, that, through his whole reign, the king kept a great naval force at sea, by which he awed the Moors, and protected his own coasts and those of Andalusia. There is yet another evidence of what has been before advanced: the king is highly commended by the Portuguese historians for not affecting any thing that was foreign in his dress, at his table, or in his furniture. This implies, that he was singular in this respect, and his motive certainly was to promote the commodities and manufactures of his own country, so as to raise their value in the sentiments of his own people and of strangers, which was one of the most effectual methods he could devise for bringing wealth into his country, which will always attend commerce, if luxury does not carry it away again. We speak of these matters doubtfully, and from conjecture, because the Portuguese historians are not very explicit upon this head; and yet from a comparison of circumstances, there can be nothing clearer than that a great commerce was carried on there at this time, which, in all probability, was the effects of the frequent visits made to the coasts of Portugal by those fleets of adventurers that from all parts of Europe sailed to the Holy Land, and the intercourse that resulted from thence with the islands of the Archipelago, and the ports of Greece, Syria, and Egypt, from whence, in process of time, they derived those lights that put them upon attempting discoveries, of which in this age they had not even the most glimmering prospect. But they had already the effects of trade and shipping, by which they were rendered rich and powerful in comparison with, and in the general estimation of their neighbours.

Don Alonso IV. succeeds, and is very indolent in the discharge of his duty. DON Alonso the fourth, surnamed the Brave, succeeded his father, and was crowned with great solemnity¹. His conduct, while he was heir apparent, had not given the most favourable opinion of him to his subjects; and more especially to such of the nobility as had been intrusted by the late king Don Denis, and who, by a long acquaintance with affairs, had acquired a very high authority, and a general influence over the whole nation. Don Alonso did not consider either their characters or his own in a proper point of view; but seemed to look on the possession of the crown as a sufficient title to act as he thought fit, to pursue his pleasures without disturbance, and to live in all respects above and without controul. But the council thought otherwise; and though they might easily have converted this temper of the new king to their own advantage, by engrossing all power into their own hands, and barely administering the government in his name, yet they acted another and a better part, and that too with all the success they could desire (B). The king, who at the bottom had good sense, as

(B) Though the ancient Portuguese historians, like those of other countries, are so inattentive in point of chronology, that it is impossible to discover from them where the extraordinary fact we are going to relate ought to be placed; yet with the modern historians of that country we are of opinion, it is most likely to have happened soon after Don Alonso's accession to the throne. He was in the vigour of his age; hunting was his favourite diversion; those who shared his confidence encouraged and allured him to this sport; so that he spent his time in the forests about Cintra, while all affairs of government were neglected, or, which was worse, executed under the direction of those who took pains to keep their master in ignorance (8). At length the king returned to Lisbon, and coming into his council, with all the brisk impetuosity of a sportsman, he gave them, with great frankness and spirit, the history of a whole month's hunting, fishing, and shooting. When he had done speaking, a person of great quality rose up, and said, courts and camps were designed for kings, and not woods and deserts. The affairs of private men suffer when recreation is preferred to business; but as they are public persons, a whole nation is consigned to ruin, whenever the whim of pleasure turns the head of a king. We sit here for other purposes than to hear exploits admirable to the eyes, and only intelligible to the ears of grooms and falconers. If your majesty will attend to the wants, and remove the grievances of your people, you will find them obedient subjects; if not—the king starting with passion at this said, if not, what?—If not, continued the nobleman, in the same tone of voice, they must look for another and a better king. Alonso at this lost all patience, and, after having expressed his resentment in very loud and strong terms, threw out of the room in the highest transport of rage. In a little time he returned quiet and composed. I perceive, said he, the truth of what you say; he cannot long have subjects who will not be a king. Remember, that from this day you have nothing more to do with Alonso the sportsman, but with Alonso king of Portugal (9). A fact so extraordinary that it could not be invented.

^a well as great spirit, entered by degrees into the knowlege and into the discharge of his duty; which he began by calling to an account some of his old creatures and favourites, not for the bad advice they had given him, and the disturbances which they had thereby created in the kingdom, but for those crimes and offences of which they had been personally guilty, and from the just punishment of which they were in hopes of screening themselves by the royal favour^k. He paid all possible respect to his father's memory, and promoted those who had opposed him with the greatest vehemence; not believing they were enemies to him, but considering them as the true friends of the crown. He shewed much duty to his mother the queen dowager, great affection for his consort queen Beatrix, and began to form designs for the firm establishment of his family, and the security of his dominions (C).

^b But with all his good qualities, and in spite of all his good conduct, the king could not overcome in his mind the aversion he had conceived against his natural brother Alonso Sanchez; ^{De Jares his brother Alonso Sanchez a professed traitor, and is afterwards reconciled.} and therefore in the first assembly of the states that he held, he ordered his process to be made, and affirming, that he was the sole author of all the differences that had happened between him and the deceased king his father, he directed all his great estate to be seized, and himself proclaimed a traitor^l. This was so much the more extraordinary, as he is commended for passing at this time an excellent law, by which he prohibited private persons from revenging their own injuries, and obliged them to have recourse to the law, as to an impartial judge. Alonso Sanchez wrote the king a very respectful letter, in which he assured him of his innocence, of his willingness to serve him with the same fidelity he had done his father, in treating him not to carry into execution the severe sentence he had passed against him. But the king persisting in his revenge, Alonso Sanchez, at the head of a considerable body of troops, entered Portugal, and did a great deal of mischief. The king sent against him the master of Avis, with a superior corps of troops, whom Alonso Sanchez engaged and routed. The king, full of resentment, took the field in person; and the governor of Codeceyra, near Albuquerque, having put that strong place, which belonged to Alonso Sanchez, into the king's hands, he burnt it to the ground, and then returned into his own territories^m. His mother Donna Isabella, understanding that Alonso Sanchez had written again to the king, interposed with her son, and told him plainly that all he had imputed to Alonso Sanchez was false; that he was a very brave and a very great man; and that as he had divested himself of other prejudices, so he would find it for his interest to get the better of this, and recal his brother. The king took her advice in good part, and sent Alonso Sanchez word, that if he would return, he was content to hear him; on which, notwithstanding all that had happened, he came immediately to court, and the king, after a short coldness, received him into high favourⁿ. An action so royal, that it deserves to be communicated to posterity. A. D. 1336:

At the persuasion of his consort, the king was very desirous to marry his daughter to Don Alonso the eleventh, king of Castile and Leon, and caused some propositions on this head to be made to that prince, who, the Portuguese historians say, was already married to Donna Constantia the daughter of Don Juan Manuel, a powerful and turbulent prince of the blood: ^{A quarrel with Castile, which is at length compromised, and an alliance concluded.} but the best Spanish writers say, that he was only contracted to Donna Constantia, which is more probable, as that lady was too young to be married. At first the king of Castile had no great inclination to the princess of Portugal; but at length, from motives of policy, grew very desirous of it; caused Donna Constantia, whom he should have married, to be put into prison, and made so much haste to conclude it, as not to stay for a dispensation, which was held necessary in those days^o. Soon after this, prince Peter, heir apparent of the crown of Portugal, espoused Donna Blanch, daughter to the infant Don Pedro of Castile; but she proved to have some distemper that rendered her incapable of marriage. This produced a

(C) Don Alonso was born at Coimbra, in the year 1290; he was educated with care during his infancy, and discovered such a pregnancy of parts, as induced the king his father to leave him to himself a little too soon (1). His marriage with Donna Beatrix, daughter to Sancho the fourth, and sister to Ferdinand, king of Castile, brought him into an early acquaintance with the factious princes of that family, and excited in him a desire of giving law, when in reality he received it from those about him. By his princess he had four sons and two daughters, viz. Alonso, Denis, Juan, Pedro, Mary, and Leonora: of these the three first died in their infancy; Don Pedro succeeded him; Donna Maria espoused Alonso, the eleventh king of Castile; and Donna Leonora, Don Pedro, the fourth king of Aragon (2). In the disposition therefore of his children, he acted very prudently, and so as to draw to himself and his subjects, a share of all the good fortune that happened in the neighbouring kingdoms as well as his own, and secured their interest, in case he was at any time attacked by the Moors, points which had been the principal objects of his predecessors (3).

negotiation for espousing the lady Constantia, who should have been the king of Castile's a consort, to prince Peter of Portugal. To this Don Alonso gave his consent in words, but took every method possible to prevent it. This monarch also being fallen into an amour with Donna Leonora de Guzman, treated the queen Donna Maria, though the daughter of the king of Portugal, with great indignity, notwithstanding the interposition of the two queens of Portugal, who were his near relations, and for whom he professed great deference and respect. At length, after reciprocal injuries, things ended in an open war by land and sea; and the subjects of both crowns were for twelve years exposed to all the miseries of repeated incursions with fire and sword, for the sake of these domestic jars between their princes. But as we have already entered into the detail of this matter in the history of Spain, it would be both needless and tedious to enter into it here; and therefore we shall only observe, that Don Alonso the eleventh of Castile, finding himself in danger of being attacked by the whole force of the Moors, was obliged to have recourse to the kings of Arragon and Portugal for assistance, even before the war was concluded with the latter; and finding that monarch well disposed, very wisely entered into a treaty, which was concluded in the month of July at Santaren, by which Donna Constantia was permitted to go into Portugal to consummate her marriage with the infant Don Pedro: and the king of Portugal promised to assist his brother of Castile with all his force, which he religiously and gallantly performed; and was present in the glorious battle of Tarifu, or Celdano, fought on the 30th of October: in which the Moors were totally defeated; and for his assistance in which his son-in-law made him all possible acknowledgements ^p.

The Moors
make a descent upon Algarve, and are obliged to abandon it.

THE war against the Moors continued for several years: and the king Don Alonso, in pursuance of his engagements, furnished his son-in-law with succours both by land and sea; in consideration of which, he obtained from Rome a permission to levy the tenths upon the clergy for two years ^q. The Moors, to revenge their losses, projected and executed a descent on the kingdom of Algarve; where they burnt and plundered the country, murdered the inhabitants, and, having made themselves masters of Castro Marine, demanded assistance from Granada, in hopes of being able to keep possession of that country: but the king of Portugal soon awakened them from these dreams, and by coming with a superior army, recovered the place ^r. This success restored the quiet of his dominions, which in all other respects were in a very flourishing condition; the laws being strictly executed, the king very active in his administration, and not addicted either to luxury or covetousness. Yet in the midst of this calm, and when it was least expected, a new storm arose, which shook the government to its very foundations, and the dismal effects of which were felt some ages after, as state-convulsions often are.

Unfortunate amour of Don Pedro, prince of Portugal, with Donna Agnes de Castro.

Don Pedro, prince of Portugal, had given very pregnant signs of a noble and well regulated courage; had behaved very dutifully towards his father, and was a very kind and good husband to Donna Constantia Manuel, by whom he had several children. Yet it was thought he had a tenderness for Donna Agnes de Castro, the daughter of a Castilian gentleman, who had taken refuge in the court of Portugal. Some say, that the princess Donna Constantia perceived, and grew melancholy upon it, and it is even thought to have hastened her death ^s. The king Don Alonso being apprised of it, acted like a great politician; he appointed Donna Agnes godmother to his grandson Don Ferdinand, because in the Romish church this creates a kind of religious alliance, which disables the godmother from ever marrying the father of the child. The scheme was certainly subtil, but it proved notwithstanding ineffectual. As yet the kindness of Don Pedro for this lady had not exceeded the bounds of decency; perhaps had not proceeded so far as any declaration, when the princess Donna Constantia died: for whom Don Pedro shewed a becoming concern, and Donna Agnes de Castro, who it is likely knew nothing of the suspicions that were entertained concerning her, manifested an affliction equally tender and sincere, which affected the prince so strongly, that it contributed not a little to fix his inclinations for that unfortunate lady, which discovered themselves not long after, with all the transports of a violent passion; but whether this was of a criminal nature, is at least very doubtful, since Don Pedro afterwards affirmed, in the most solemn manner, that he was privately married to her; and in justice to that lady's memory, we ought to believe that this marriage took place before she had any share in his bed ^t. It was, however, kept very secret: and out of respect to his father, and from other motives of policy, he suffered his commerce with her to pass for that kind of gallantry which was held excuseable in a person of his rank, who was become a widower in the flower of his age.

a Upon the accession of Don Pedro the Cruel to the throne of Castile, many of the nobility of that kingdom, and some even of the first distinction, thought proper to retire into the dominions of the crown of Portugal, where they were kindly received by the prince Don Pedro, and generously entertained and protected by Donna Agnes and her brethren^a, whose conduct in this respect was generally applauded in public, and in private as generally con-^bdemned. Our prince, said the politicians, out of complaisance for his mistress, encourages the Castilians who desert their master's service to retire hither, and there is the highest probability that his kindness to these exiles may involve us in a war with our neighbours. The common crowd of courtiers whispered, that all passages to favour and preferment were blocked up by the mistress's relations or countrymen, who obtained whatever they asked, while those who had a natural right to what they obtained, were deluded in their hopes, and disappointed in their expectations. The mob of the court (for courts have their mobs) hated the Castilians, merely because they were so, hated those who provided for them, and hated those for whose sake this provision was made: thus the fuel was prepared and placed before fire was set to the machine. Those who managed the contrivance, insinuated to the king, and perhaps to the queen, that it would be for the honour of the crown, and perhaps for the interest of the nation, if Don Pedro could be prevailed upon to marry again; that his distaste to this proposition arose entirely from his attachment for Donna Agnes, and his tenderness for his children by her; and that this intrigue, though at present it only vexed the royal family, might in the end prove fatal to the state^c. The common pretence of those who would rise by extraordinary counsels.

At last the malice of those, who envied the fortune of the family of Castro, induced them to suggest to the king, that his son was married to Donna Agnes, and that this match was very much beneath him; and to carry this still farther, they named Giles, bishop of Guarda, as the prelate by whom it was solemnized. That the king spoke of this to Don Pedro, and that he did not own the marriage, seems to be certain; in which the conduct of the prince deserves blame, more especially if it be true, as some have written, that the king also told him, that if he would avow the marriage, he would cause her to be treated as princess of Portugal. In the end, when the king's uneasiness and dissatisfaction plainly appeared, these people hinted the danger of his grandson Don Ferdinand, from the ambition of Don Ferdinand and Don Alvaro de Castro; and when the king demanded what remedy could be applied to this evil, they wickedly suggested the putting lady Agnes to death, as an expedient actually requisite to the safety of the royal family. The king hesitating, the thing took air, and coming to the ears of the queen and the archbishop of Braga, they, from a generous and christian spirit, gave notice of it to the prince; who, believing his father incapable of such an action, looked upon it as a new artifice to engage his consent to a marriage. But those who had the ear of the king, and knew how capable he was of resolving even of matters of the greatest importance on the sudden, and executing these resolutions without advice, took their opportunity, and carried him to Coimbra, when the prince was absent from thence^d on a hunting match.

The unfortunate Donna Agnes was then at the monastery of Santa Clara; and the manner of the king's coming, joined it may be to some previous information, rendered his purpose so apparent, that the innocent victim went out to meet him, and with her children threw herself and them at his feet, with which spectacle the king was so much moved, that he desisted from his design; but his three counsellors, Alvaro Gonzalez, Diego Lopez Pacheco, and Pedro Coello, reproaching him with his want of spirit, and his having more tenderness for a woman than for his subjects and the state, he relapsed to his former resolution, and gave them commission to go and execute what he first intended; which with great brutality they did, and then returned to the king with their daggers reeking with the blood of the princess his daughter-in-law^e. He was so strangely misled, as to avow and approve this horrid action; and having ordered her corpse to be interred in the monastery of Santa Clara, he left Coimbra as if he had done nothing there for which he ought to be ashamed^f. But when the prince was informed of this cruel event, he suffered himself to be transported into such fury, that he wasted all the country between the rivers Minho and Douro with fire and sword; and had carried things to greater extremities, if the queen and the archbishop of Braga had not interposed, and represented to him in the strongest terms, the absurd barbarity of resenting the injury done him by the king upon his subjects, who were one day to become his own; which, as he easily comprehended, and had naturally the greatest love for justice, he readily complied with their request, and accepted such terms as they proposed; and thus a civil war, that might have been of the most dangerous consequence, was hardly felt before it was composed^g.

THE king Don Alonso, who had this peculiarity in his temper, that he quickly saw his errors, ^a and was very earnest to repair them, not only accepted his son's submission, and received him again into favour, but studied every method to oblige him; and to bring him so far to forget the deplorable fate of his princess, as not to aim at revenging it; and some say, that he took an oath at his father's request to this purpose. It is more certain, that, contrary to the natural plainness and candor of his disposition, the prince dissembled with his father, and with the world, in such a manner that he was thought to have suffered time not only to dry his tears, but to heal his heart; and what seemed to put this past all doubt, was his entering into a new amour with a Galician lady ^b, and the readiness he shewed to embrace the proposition made by Henry, count of Trafemara; who advised him, in his mother's right, to set up a title to the crown of Castile, against Don Pedro, who was already considered as a tyrant: ^b but the king Don Alonso interposed out of compassion to his own subjects, whom he would not suffer to be embarked in a quarrel he thought to be unjust. In the mean time, Mary, queen dowager of Castile, daughter to the king and sister to the prince of Portugal, died ^c in that kingdom, to which she retired, out of the reach of her son, who was as little famed for piety as pity. Mariana suggests, that she died unfairly, on account of her indecent familiarity with the Portuguese noblemen, by order of the king Don Pedro of Portugal; but as his sister's death happened before he was king, it shews there is a mistake in the story: and perhaps it may be entirely a mistake; for the Castilians, after the death of Leonora de Guzman, bore that princess no good-will, and took great freedoms, whether with or without foundation at this distance of time it would be very hard, if not impossible, to determine. ^c

Death of Don Alonso, and a succinct view
istration.

Don Alonso, now advanced in years, and grown very infirm, began to think of disposing all things for his quiet passing out of this world; and therefore did various acts of charity, piety, and bounty, enquired into and redressed grievances throughout his dominions, established just laws for repressing immorality and avarice, dictating what he thought to be the proper maxims for ruling the state, and labouring all in his power to efface from the memory of Don Pedro the injury and insult he had received. But, however, fearing, or perhaps foreseeing that this would prove a task impracticable, he had recourse to what remained still in his own power, the providing for, and putting out of his reach such as were most likely to become the objects of his resentment. He gave therefore considerable sums of money to Alvaro Gonzalez, Diego Lopez Pacheco, and Pedro Coello, enjoining them to retire into ^d Castile, and endeavour in a foreign country to enjoy that ease and safety which their own impetuous counsels had rendered it improbable would ever be their lot in their own ^e. These measures taken, he departed this life in the month of May, 1357, in the thirty-second year of his reign, and the sixty-seventh year of his age ^e. It was said, and with great truth, that he was an undutiful son, an unnatural brother, and a cruel father. But these harsh epithets expressed, as was fit, all that was hateful in his conduct. In other respects he was a great man, and a great king. He was very brave, and very fortunate in war. All Spain stood indebted to him for the generosity with which he assisted Alonso the eleventh, king of Castile, burying his private resentments in the noble desire of distinguishing his own and his subjects courage at the expence of the common enemy. He was a politician, indeed too much ^e of a politician; for all his misfortunes arose from that false and fatal maxim, that good can ever be attained by illicit means. He loved his children, and his subjects as if they had been his children. He was strict in the administration of justice, and would suffer no rank of men to plead the unrighteous privilege of being exempt from, or superior to law. He was so tender of property, and so attentive to public welfare, that industry flourished under his reign, and his people were rich, and at their ease, while their monarch's coffers were full; and yet he drew nothing from them beyond the ordinary and accustomed revenue. After all, he was rather revered for a right use of power, than relied on as a public parent; and tho' much esteemed, was not very much beloved. He gave for his device an eagle on the wing, with these words, Altiora Peto, i. e. My hopes fly high ^f.

Accession of Don Pedro, and his care to negotiate an
Castile.

DON Pedro ascended the throne in the thirty-seventh year of his age, and by some historians is surnamed the Cruel, by others the Justiciary, or Lover of Justice ^g, either from an apprehension that this was more suitable to his real character, or to distinguish him the better from the other Pedros; since at this time Don Pedro the Cruel occupied the crown of Castile, and Don Pedro the fourth that of Arragon ^h. The first care of the new monarch was to send Arias Gomez de Sylva, and Gonsalo Yanez de Beja to the court of Castile, to renew the treaties subsisting between the crowns, and to inform the king of his sincere desire to live with him in the a strictest friendship possible (D). This produced an embassy the next year from Castile, when, besides ratifying the ancient alliances, a new family-convention was concluded, by which it was agreed, that Ferdinand prince of Portugal should marry Donna Beatrix; and that the infantas Constantia and Isabella, all three daughters of Donna Maria de Padilla, should espouse the princes Juan and Denis, sons of Donna Agnes de Castro. The king farther entered into a league with Don Pedro of Castile, against the king of Arragon; and it was stipulated by an express article, that both parties should reciprocally deliver up such malecontents as should fly to them from each other's dominions ⁱ.

THE true aim of this treaty soon appeared; for the king of Portugal having in the first assembly of the states held after his accession, caused the three murderers of his beloved Agnes de Castro to be attainted, and their estates confiscated, Don Pedro of Castile suggested to him, that if he would seize some persons, his subjects, who had retired into his dominions, he would deliver up those who had imbrued their hands in the blood of his princess. The Portuguese monarch accepted the proposal, and having caused Men Rodriguez Tenorio, Hernando Gudiel de Toledo, and Fortuno Sanchez Calderon, to be seized, he sent them to Seville. Don Pedro Nunez de Guzman had met with the same treatment, but he fled to Albuquerque, to Sancho Ruiz de Villegas, upon whose friendship he depended; but he either sold or sacrificed him to the king, by whom he was put to a cruel death. On the other hand, Pedro Coella and Alvaro Nunez, were seized in the like manner in Castile, and sent to the king of Portugal; but Diego Pacheco, who happened to be hunting, having timely intelligence given him by a beggar of what had happened, made his escape into Arragon. Don Pedro, having the sentence of the law on his side, and the criminals in his hands, gave a loose to his resentment; and, with an impetuosity excusable in a lover, but no way becoming a king, not only caused them to be put to death with exquisite tortures, but was present at this shocking scene, and insulted them in their last moments; in which they behaved with great spirit, and returned the same language they received. This terrible execution was performed at Santaren ^k. Don Vasco Fernandez, archbishop of Toledo, being ordered to retire into Portugal, by Don Pedro of Castile, who seized his estate and effects, that prelate was received with the utmost respect, and had a retreat given him at Coimbra, where he spent the remainder of his days in acts of piety and devotion ^l.

d THE king Don Pedro's affections for Donna Agnes continued as strong as ever, and his grief for her death was not assuaged by the torments exercised on the authors of it. He summoned therefore at Cantanedes an assembly of the states, where, in the presence of the Pope's nuncio, he swore upon the gospels, that having privately obtained a dispensation at Rome, he had secretly espoused at Braganza Donna Agnes de Castro, in the presence of the bishop of Guarda, and of his master of the wardrobe, both of whom testified their knowledge of the truth of what the king had sworn ^m. In consequence of which, the king having first

(D) Don Pedro was born at Coimbra, on the 13th of May, 1320, and was about five years old when his grandfather died, for whose memory he always preserved a very high veneration. His marriage with Donna Constantia, daughter to Don Juan Manuel, brought him an immense sum of money, and drew to him also many of the Castilian lords, particularly his wife's brother, to whom he gave lands in Portugal, and created him count of Sintra. By his first princess he had two sons and a daughter; these were Don Lewis, who died young; Don Ferdinand, in high favour with his grandfather, and who succeeded his father; and the infant Donna Maria, who espoused the infant Ferdinand of Arragon, marquis of Tortosa, son to the king Don Alonso the fourth. By the unfortunate lady Agnes de Castro, he had issue Alonso, who died young; Don Juan, who married Donna Maria de Tellez, by whom he had Ferdinand of Portugal, lord of Eca. After he returned into Castile, he married the king's ballard sister, Donna Constantia, with whom he had the county of Vaienza, and by whom he had three daughters: he had also several natural children. Don Denis, the third son, who was obliged to quit his country because he would not pay homage to queen Leonora, married in Castile Donna

Joanna, natural daughter to Don Henry the second, from whom descended the counts of Colmenero and Villars. The infanta Donna Beatrix, married the infant Don Sancho of Castile, count of Albuquerque, and by him had an only daughter, Donna Leonora, who espoused the infant Don Ferdinand of Castile; who in process of time became king of Arragon and Sicily. Besides these children, the king had by Donna Theresa Lorenza, a lady of quality of Galicia, a son, Don Juan, whom he caused to be elected grand-master of Avis, whom he legitimated, and who became afterwards king of Portugal. Some of the best Portuguese writers affirm, he was not given to women; that in the life-time of his first princess, he curbed his passion for Donna Agnes; and that it was not till after her decease, he took Donna Theresa, to console his melancholy, and to prevent the king's forcing him upon a marriage. It is at least certain, that he had a great aversion to incontinency in other men, and punished it very severely, but more especially in the clergy; but it was chiefly adultery against which he pointed his justice, stiling it a sin against society, and esteeming it the source of more mischiefs than almost any other vice.

published the Pope's bull, containing the dispensation, ordered the body of the deceased lady to be removed from Coimbra to the royal monastery of Alcobaça, with a pomp unknown in Portugal, and there to be interred under a white marble monument, with all the funeral honours due to a queen. This, with the legitimation of her children, and the care he took of all who had been in her service, consoled him in some degree, and rendered him more conversable than hitherto he had been. The king had sent his ambassadors into Arragon, in order to reconcile the king Don Pedro to the monarch of Castile; but the first mentioned prince declined his mediation, and sent ambassadors to his court, to represent the unkindness of his late treaty with Castile; and offered to treat of a marriage between the infanta Donna Joanna and prince Ferdinand of Portugal; which, the circumstances of affairs being much altered, was not wholly rejectedⁿ. He saw the instability of affairs in Castile, and was determined not to twist them with his own.

Don Pedro resolves to make a thorough reformation throughout his kingdom. IN the course of his reign, the great object that Don Pedro had in view was the absolute reformation of every thing that was amiss throughout his whole dominions: a resolution singular in itself, and prosecuted with as much steadiness as if it had been less difficult. He began with himself; and that he might the more thoroughly understand his duty, he went frequently to the monastery of Alcobaça, where he contemplated the tomb in which he was to lie, and the account he was one day to give. He was very easy of access, and examined every thing to the bottom. In general his court was very frugal and modest; but upon particular occasions very splendid and magnificent. In those cases the common people and the poor had their share; for he held, that those who worked and fared hardest, had the most need of refreshments. He made short tours into the provinces, that he might hear with his own ears, and see with his own eyes. On such occasions he carried a sceptre and a whip, to signify that he meant to reward and to chastise. He was alike vehement in both: he bestowed freely, and frequently; but his enquiries were very strict, and his punishments severe. He suspended for a certain time all taxes; and when it was represented that his treasure would be soon exhausted, he said, that a king who gave wisely, and only to those who deserved it, might be liberal at no great expence. He had no respect of persons; but administered justice as he expected to see it administered, when the secrets of all hearts are laid open. The memoirs nearest his own times speak of him with admiration, and are very far from loading him with those indecent epithets, that would have been attached to the name of any other prince, who had done as many severe acts as he. But it seems that he so far attained his end, so qualified the strictness of his justice by his affability and kindness to all the world, and brought the bulk of his subjects to have such a relish for that regularity which he so much affected, that, by degrees, the people were as much altered as the prince; and almost universally admired those qualities in their king, that in any other country would have procured him the appellation of a tyrant (E).

His conduct towards Don Pedro of Castile, and his death. WHILE Don Pedro of Portugal was acquiring, Don Pedro of Castile was losing the character of a good prince, and became at last so generally hated, that upon his brother the count of Trastemara's assuming the title of king, he was abandoned by the best part of his subjects^o. A little before this cruel reverse of fortune happened, he had sent his eldest daughter, the

(E) In this note we propose to give a few of the many extraordinary marks of justice for which this monarch was famous, and these as features of his character, and to support the account we have given of his reign. An ecclesiastic, in a high fit of passion, killed a mason whom he had employed, for not executing something agreeable to his mind. The king dissembled his knowledge of the crime, and left it to the cognizance of the proper courts, where the issue of the business was, that the priest was suspended from saying mass for a year. At this slight punishment the family of the deceased were highly offended. The king caused it to be hinted to the mason's son, that he should kill the priest: which he did, and falling into the hands of justice, was condemned to suffer death; but as no capital sentence could be executed without the king's consent, this was laid before him among the rest; upon which he asked, what was the young man's trade? It was answered, that he followed his father's; then said the king, I shall commute this punishment, by restraining him from meddling with stone or mortar for a twelvemonth. But after this he punished capital crimes in the clergy with death; and when they desired that his majesty would be pleased to refer their causes to a superior tribunal, he answered very calmly, that is what I mean to do: for I send them to the highest of all tribunals, to that of their maker and mine. A woman of intrigue, whose name was Eleanor, having corrupted a young girl for his admiral Lanfrata Pessania, the king condemned the old woman to the flames, and the admiral to lose his head. It is indeed true, that, at the request of the republic of Genoa, he pardoned him; but it was some years before he was suffered to appear again at court. Complaint being made to the king, that an officer of justice having delivered a summons to a person of distinction, he in a rage gave him a box on the ear, and pulled him by the beard; the king, turning to the sheriff who was near him, said, such a one, naming the person of distinction, gave me at such a time, a box of the ear, and pulled me by the beard, for which he was immediately apprehended, and lost his head. If this inflexibility of his had ever digressed from the road of strict justice; if he had ever respected persons, or been less severe to those about him than to the rest of his subjects, he had certainly become odious; whereas the rectitude of his conduct rendered him, in spite of his severity, revered; in so much that his subjects said unanimously of him on his death bed, that ten such years of government had never been seen before, nor would be seen again.

- a infanta Donna Beatrix, with an immense sum in ready money into Portugal, where, pursuant to the treaty between the two crowns, she was to marry the prince Don Ferdinand, and not long after took the same route, with a small body of troops which remained faithful to him, not doubting of a good reception, and of a powerful support; but the king of Portugal was no sooner informed of his arrival on the frontiers, than he sent to desire he would remain where he was; and when he had deliberated with his principal nobility, acquainted him that he was sorry for his misfortune; but that his son, the prince Don Ferdinand, having taken an absolute resolution not to marry the infanta Donna Beatrix, and as his subjects were by no means inclined to enter into a war with the people of Castile, he had sent back the princess with all her treasure, and desired he would seek some other retreat. Don Pedro attempted to retire in-
- b to the castle of Albuquerque; but finding the gates shut against him, he had recourse once more to the king of Portugal, for a safe-conduct through his territories into Galicia, which had not yet declared against him. This was granted, and Don Ferdinand, and Don Alvaro de Castro were sent to escort him, who, by the orders of the infant Don Ferdinand, procured the means of escaping to Donna Leonora, the king's niece, and daughter of the count de Trastemara, by whom Don Pedro was dethroned^p. This conduct in the Portuguese king was extremely satisfactory to his subjects, and opened a new passage for the reconciliation with Arragon, to which the infant Don Ferdinand was very much inclined; but before things could be reduced into any order, the king Don Pedro fell into a disease, which brought him to his end on the 8th of January, in the year of our Lord 1367, at Estremos, when he had reigned ten,
- c and lived forty-seven years^q. His device was a star, with these words Monstrat Iter, This shews the way. As if, thro' the course of his reign, his thoughts had been fixed rather on a celestial than temporal state (F). His subjects expressed much concern for their loss, as foreseeing that the regularity which he introduced would not last much longer than its author; and therefore they applied to him what the Romans said of Titus, that either Don Pedro should never have been born, or never died^r.

- Don Ferdinand, the only son of the deceased king, by his first princess Donna Constantia Don Ferdinand successor his father; his disposition, temper, and character. ascended the throne with the universal acclamations of the people. He had a very fine person, was in the flower of his age, being about twenty-seven, courteous in his manners, very bountiful, and of a very easy chearful temper^s. This prejudiced almost all men in his
- d favour; and yet some of the old king's ministers began to doubt the stability of that great reformation, which with equal vigour and perseverance he had wrought, and under a young prince who seemed to be in all respects the very reverse of that father. Instead of a sound and solid judgment, they perceived that Don Ferdinand had a warm, lively, and roving imagination, which he laboured to gratify, without considering consequences; that so far from strictness of morals, or even a proper respect for the decorum of his court, the king was inclined to pleasure, and troubled himself but little either about the conduct of others, or what they thought or said of his own. The frugality of the last reign was the jest of the present; ine somuch that Don Ferdinand considered it as a hard task to dissipate the vast treasures which the three preceding kings had laid up. In few words, he was a prince not without virtues, and those much superior to his vices; but he had a kind of levity in his disposition, beyond the power of education to correct, or experience to root out; and never shewed any constancy but in a single instance, and there it did him hurt. Yet notwithstanding this, his majestic presence, his being always in good humour, his boundless liberality, and a kind of sweetness in his nature, which discovered itself in all his actions, preserved him the affections of the populace, when he had lost the esteem of the wiser part of his subjects. (F) Don Pedro in his person was rather above the common size; his forehead high, and well spread; his eyes large, black, and very quick; his hair long, and his beard also, about which he was remarkably nice. He loved learning, and was himself a man of letters. He was pleased with music and dancing; wrote himself very elegantly in verse, as appears from some compositions of his, which are still extant. His voice was very soft and agreeable, notwithstanding he had a small hesitation in his speech. He was so far from being naturally peevish, passionate, or sullen, that he was rather of a gay and sprightly disposition; allowed the nobility, and such as were about his person, to live with him on terms of the greatest liberty, and shared with them in all their diversions. His common saying was, if you do not offend the laws you cannot offend me, which he observed with the greatest punctuality, and looked with an eye of scorn on such as shewed either too much timidity, or seemed to be too eager in endeavouring to please him. His people in general had a very high opinion of him, because he devoted his whole time to the study and practice of his duty, and would very commonly say, that a king who passed a whole day without doing something that was remarkably and incontestibly for the good of his people, did not deserve to be thought a king.

ceive, that we were under a necessity of drawing his character previous to the history of his reign, which will be found little more than an illustration of it, and the events of which would otherwise appear absurd and incredible; so much the humour of this prince wrought upon his affairs, and gave a turn to almost every thing that he undertook, either in his private character or public administration: in other princes, tho' this might be no less true, yet scarce in any prince was it ever so perceptible, for in assigning the motives of their conduct, even able historians often differ. But in regard to Don Ferdinand of Portugal, all who have written concerning him are unanimous; and though some are milder than others in their expressions, yet in respect to the general representation of his conduct they all agree; which we hope will prove a sufficient apology for this variation from our usual method, and for the placing the picture of this monarch at the beginning rather than the end of his reign.

*He inclines to

for the heir of Castile, on the death of Don
Cruel.*

THE same humour that led him in his father's life-time to refuse the infanta Donna Beatrix, and to prevent his giving any assistance, or so much as countenance, to her father Don Pedro, prompted him, as soon as he had ascended the throne, to compliment the count of Trafalgar, now stiled king Henry of Castile, and to offer him his assistance and alliance. But when the affairs of that prince took another turn, and he was obliged to abandon that kingdom, which he had so lately acquired, Don Ferdinand never attempted to lend the least support to his falling fortune¹. He preserved, in all appearance, the same spirit of neutrality; and after the prince of Wales's retreat, king Henry again entered Castile, and after a short but sharp struggle, once more seated himself on that throne, from whence, using his own arm as the instrument, he had by death removed his brother². In his conduct hitherto, Don Ferdinand seemed to act the politician; but no sooner was Don Pedro dead, than he declared himself most zealously in his favour, giving the opprobrious names of tyrant, traitor, and murderer, to Henry, and assuming to himself the title of king of Castile, as great grandson to Don Sancho the Brave. He coined money with the arms of Castile and Portugal: he suffered no distinction to be made at his court between the two nations: he received several towns on the frontiers into his protection; and bestowed so bountifully lands and estates upon all the Castilian nobility who came to take refuge in Portugal, that his palace was quickly full of them, and his subjects saw with amazement their prince surrounded by those as his favourites who but a little before were esteemed his enemies. In order to support his pretensions, he found that taking a few malecontents into his pay would not go very far: he therefore projected a league with the king of Aragon, undertook to marry the infanta Leonora, his daughter, who had been promised to the prince of Castile, and to furnish large subsidies for the assistance that prince was to give him. He entered into a negotiation likewise with the king of Granada; in which he also succeeded, and had no reason to complain of the infidelity of the Moor; and yet he gained not either credit or conquest by this war³.

Henry, and

cludes a peace.*

HE began his military operations by making an irruption into Galicia with a small army, where, after over-running the open country, he made himself master of Corunna, and some other places, into which having put competent garrisons, he found himself in no condition to keep the field; so that upon the approach of the Castilian army, he retired into his own territories⁴. King Henry, who was an older man, and a better officer, did not amuse himself with recovering the places he had taken; but fell with all his forces into Portugal, took the city of Braga, burnt it, and, wasting every thing with fire and sword, passed through to his own frontiers. King Ferdinand, having at length collected an army, marched against him, and sent a herald before to challenge him: but Henry, too wise a king, and too brave a man to take any notice of such messages, as fighting was not his business, retired into his own territories, to defend them against the king of Granada; who, in execution of his treaty, had made a powerful diversion in favour of his ally. King Ferdinand ought to have acted in concert with him, and he actually had a fleet upon the coast of Andalusia; but his motions were so unsteady, and he was so little equal to the task he had undertaken, that his subjects, who, in several excursions had performed very gallant things, perceived and censured it publicly⁵. He had sent several noblemen and prelates of the first quality into Aragon, in order to accomplish the negotiation which had been begun, and with them, as the Portuguese writers say, eighteen hundred weight of gold, to be coined into money, to defray the expences of the war. He likewise equipped a squadron of six beautiful galleys to attend that on board which his queen was to embark, and which is said to have been covered with gold to the water edge, and to have had sails of silk, which he sent to *Barcelona*⁶. Notwithstanding all this, and that he had married Donna Leonora of Aragon, publicly by proxy, he, at the per-

a suasion of pope Gregory the eleventh, and under the mediation of his nuncio, concluded a treaty with Henry of Castile; by which he undertook to desert his old allies, to assist him against all powers whatever, and, in consideration of several good towns and a large sum of money, to espouse Donna Leonora his daughter. This was sufficient to disgust the king of Arragon, and the method he took to express it was by laying his hands on the Portuguese money^a.

THIS stroke, which he might easily have foreseen, but did not, and which might have been as easily prevented, if he had foreseen it, since he had stipulated a fortune of one hundred thousand florins with the infanta Donna Leonora of Arragon, which he might have discounted to her father, upon his subsidy, in case he had performed the treaty between them, brought him immediately under such difficulties as none of his predecessors had ever felt; for the treasure, not only of the crown, but of the kingdom of Portugal being wasted, he had recourse to that miserable shift of false politicians, raising the value of the little coin that was left; from whence a long train of mischiefs arose: of which becoming at length sensible, he reduced his coin again to its old value; but so improperly, that his subjects suffered full as much from the remedy as they had done from the disease. But as great an evil as this was, he found a way to diminish the sense of it, by bringing one much heavier upon his own shoulders and theirs. In the apartments of his sister, the infanta Donna Beatrix, he saw a very lovely woman, whose charms did not at all suffer by any endeavours to conceal them. This lady was Donna Leonora Tellez, daughter to Martin Alonso Tellez, brother to Don Juan Alonso, count de Barcellos, and the wife of Juan Lorenzo da Cunha, a nobleman of one of the most distinguished families of Portugal. The king at first sight became so excessively enamoured of her, that for the sake of this third Leonora he forgot both his wives of the same name, the infantas of Arragon and Castile. The first person to whom he communicated his thoughts was her maiden sister Donna Maria Tellez, a young lady not inferior to her in beauty, and in all other respects much more than her equal. Donna Maria answered him very prudently, that his majesty would do well to stifle a passion equally inconsistent with her sister's honour and his own; that he ought to reflect she was already married; and that it would be equally dangerous and disgraceful for him to take a woman out of the bed of her husband, to receive her into his: that he was himself contracted to a princess equal to him in birth, and in every other respect worthy of his crown; and that this alliance being the principal article of the late peace, he had just reason to apprehend plunging his people into a new war, by the breach of it in so scandalous a manner. A man deaf to reason and conscience is incapable of listening to any advice: this was the case of Don Ferdinand, who told Donna Maria, that her sister's marriage being within the degrees of consanguinity, and without a dispensation, was null and void; that he could very easily disengage himself from his promise to the infanta of Castile; and that he should not find it very difficult to bring the populace, at least, to espouse the cause of their prince. Donna Maria gave the like good advice, but with no better effect, to her sister. Donna Leonora was proud of her conquest, and in raptures at the thoughts of being a queen. A process was set on foot to dissolve her marriage with Don Juan da Cunha: that nobleman, foreseeing what would happen, made but a slight defence; so that the cause was soon at an end^b. The king, in the mean time, acquainted his neighbour of Castile, that he was desirous of observing the peace in all other points, but that having placed his affections elsewhere, he chose to decline the marriage with his daughter. Henry answered like a great king, that the infanta was to be sought, and not imposed; and that the peace being kept, the king of Portugal might marry where he pleased^c. Don Ferdinand was much elated with his success, flattered himself he had managed things like a great politician; and having privately married Donna Leonora Tellez, carried her with him to Lisbon. There the people, headed by Ferdinand Velásquez, a taylor, raised an insurrection in the night, invested the palace, and threatened the most outrageous mischief, till the king came out into a balcony, assured them he was not married to Donna Leonora, and promised for their satisfaction, to make a solemn declaration of the same kind the next day in the church of St. Dominick. Instead of doing this, he conveyed himself and his bride privately to Santaren, caused the taylor and some of his chiefs to be seized and put to death; which stopped the clamour indeed, but heightened and extended the resentment of his subjects^d.

It was from this interval of compelled silence, that the king persuaded himself the nation was satisfied; and full of this false notion, he carried Donna Leonora into the province between the Douro and Minho, and there caused his marriage to be publicly celebrated, in the presence of the princes, prelates, and peers of Portugal; all of whom did homage to the new queen, except his brother the infant Don Denis, who, after earnestly declaring how much he disliked the marriage, flatly refused it^c. The new queen bent all her endeavours to extend her interest and influence; and the king, understanding that John, duke of Lancaster, son to Edward the third, king of England, had assumed the title of king of Castile, upon his marriage with Donna Constantia, the eldest surviving daughter of Don Pedro the Cruel, resolved to enter into an alliance with him, notwithstanding the pretensions he had formed to this crown himself. He sent over for this purpose a minister into England; but laboured at the same time to keep his intentions secret from his subjects, who he knew would disapprove it^d. The Castilians, however, about his court, having penetrated his project, surprised the city of Tuy in Galicia, and renewed their excursions into their own country on every side. ^b King Henry soon assembled a formidable army for the defence of his territories; but having heard that some ships belonging to his subjects had been seized at Lisbon, he sent an ambassador to reclaim them, and with him went Don Diego Lopez Pacheco, to bring him an account of the true state of affairs in Portugal, and how far the king was able to maintain this war, which he had entered into so precipitately, without receiving, or even pretending, any provocation on the side of Castile^e.

After a short but bloody war, makes peace again upon very indifferent terms.

On the return of Don Diego, and the coming over of the infant Don Denis whom, in a high fit of passion, the king, his brother, would have stabbed with his dagger, if some of the nobility had not prevented him, Henry of Castile received such clear informations, as left him no room to doubt that, by pushing the war with vigour, he might compel Don Ferdinand to make such a peace as he had made before, and obtain, perhaps, better securities for the performance of it^f. In the midst of winter therefore he detached his son Don Alonso with a good corps of troops into Portugal one way, while himself, with the rest of his army, entered it another. He reduced Viseo, and its territory, and from thence advanced to Coimbra, where, being joined by his forces from Andalusia, he might easily have taken the place. Indeed the Portuguese writers say, he did take it; whereas the Spanish historians, who ought to be as well informed, assert, that the queen Donna Leonora being brought to bed there of the infanta Donna Beatrix, the king sent her a very polite message, that he meant her no disturbance; and turning from thence, marched directly for Lisbon; where, either through treachery, or by surprize, he entered the lower city, and took up his quarters in the convent of St. Francis^g. The king Don Ferdinand was at Santaren, from the walls of which he might discern the Castilian army marching to Lisbon: notwithstanding which, he made no proper dispositions for its relief, though whatever commendable qualities he might want, courage was not of the number. Don Alonso, son to the king of Castile, took Cascaes, on the Tagus; and the Castilian fleet became master of all the Portuguese fleet and gallies except four^h. The Castilian finding it, however, impossible to reduce the whole city, and that his army began to diminish, burnt the best part of the town, and retiredⁱ. In Galicia, the Portuguese were driven out of all the places they had taken; and the king himself became quite sick of a war where he had nothing to hope, and all things to fear; was extremely well pleased with the arrival of the pope's nuncio, and very readily accepted his mediation, though he knew very well the king of Castile would not grant him peace upon very moderate terms. Indeed, when the nuncio came to Henry, he did little less than dictate them; and though Don Ferdinand at first expressed some reluctance, yet in the end he consented to and ratified them. The principal points were, that the king should once more desert his allies, and stipulate to join a squadron to the Spanish fleet when employed for the French, against the English: he farther promised, that this last nation should receive no stores from Portugal; and that he would oblige the Castilian exiles to quit his dominions. When these points were settled, the kings had an interview upon the water, at which the nuncio was present. Don ^f Sancho, brother to the Castilian monarch, espoused the infanta Donna Beatrix, sister to the king of Portugal; and more effectually to strengthen the friendship between their families, king Ferdinand promised his natural daughter, Donna Isabella, to Don Alonso, king Henry's natural son, count of Gijon: and thus, says an honest Portuguese writer, the war ended, much to the satisfaction of both kings, but to the great desolation of both their kingdoms^m.

a THE king of Castile having the mortification to lose his brother Don Sancho, who was unfortunately killed in a tumult, leaving the infanta Donna Beatrix big with child, resolved to bind the king of Portugal, if possible, to his interest by a fresh alliance, and with this view proposed, that his natural son, Don Frederick, should espouse the infanta Donna Beatrix, then in her cradle. This marriage seemed in many respects very unequal, and yet the states of the kingdom, assembled at Leyria, approved it: in all probability determined it, because Don Frederick could not inherit the kingdom of Castile. It may be doubted whether the king meant any thing by it more than to keep things quiet on that side, having now framed a project of a war with Arragon, to be revenged on that king for the money he had seized; but, like all his other projects, this proved only expensive and abortiveⁿ. His passion for his queen Donna Leonora seemed to increase daily, and the general hate of the people against her rose in the same proportion. She managed the one with great address; she sustained the other with equal intrepidity. By her interest with the king, she procured all the great employments for her creatures, and when once she found herself secure, she thought it time to be beloved. It is inconceivable how soon and how effectually she changed the minds of the whole nation: she brought the king, who was naturally indolent, to be attentive; she granted audience to all that asked it; she procured favours in consequence of every audience; so that in a little time she was as much mistress of the court and of the people, as of the king. But her tranquility, if she really enjoyed any, was of a very short continuance^o.

c THE infant Don Juan, the king's brother, and infinitely beloved by the people, fell desperately in love with her sister Donna Maria, now the widow of Alvaro diâs de Suza, and finding her virtue impregnable, had secretly married her. This might have proved a firm support to the queen; but she saw the thing in quite another light. She remembered the sentiments expressed by her sister at the time the king became first enamoured of herself; she reflected on his declining state of health, and on the probability there was that the people might set his brother upon the throne. This, with other conceits of the same kind, inflamed her resentment to such a degree, that having sent for the infant Don Juan, after bestowing on him the most flattering caresses, she told him he had ruined all her designs in his favour, since she had intended to have given him the infanta Donna Beatrix as soon as she was capable of matrimony; that he had not only lost this princess, who would have brought the crown with her as a portion, but had lost her also for a woman who dishonoured his bed. The infant, credulous, hasty, and ambitious, flew to Coimbra, where his wife was, and without enquiry or expostulation, dispatched, or caused her to be dispatched with two strokes of a dagger^p. As soon as he had committed this murder, he retired to the frontiers of Castile. The queen, though she affected to appear inconsolable for the loss of her sister, yet obtained his pardon from the king; and very soon after he returned to court, where being in a short space of time undeceived with regard to the queen's intention, as well as her information, and perceiving that the grand-master of Avis, and the brother of his deceased wife, only waited for a fit opportunity to kill him, he withdrew again into Castile, and took shelter there with his sister Donna Beatrix, the widow of Don Sancho^q. This horrid action revived the public hatred against the queen; and notwithstanding she practised her old arts of dissimulation, she was now unable to deceive any but the king, and him she held as fast in her toils as ever, though she misled him daily into new errors.

The cruel and infamous behaviour of that princess towards her own sister and the king's brother.

A. D. 1378.

e UPON the death of Don Henry of Castile, and the accession of his son Don Juan, there followed a new negotiation with the court of Portugal; for that prince having an heir born to him, immediately conceived a design of marrying him to Donna Beatrix, notwithstanding the contract between her and his bastard brother^r. This proposition was eagerly embraced by Don Ferdinand; more especially on account of a singular circumstance which attended it: Don Juan consenting, that if either of the parties died without issue, the survivor should inherit both kingdoms; and desired, that with this clause the contract might be ratified in the most solemn manner by the states of Castile and Portugal; which was accordingly done^s. The queen suffered all this in compliance with the king's temper, who loved to embark in great schemes, tho' he was very unable to manage them. But the treaties were no sooner concluded and ratified, than she contrived the means of breaking them. Don Juan Hernandez de Andeyro, one of those Castilian noblemen to whom the king had been so lavish of his favours, and who, upon the conclusion of the last peace with Henry king of Castile had been obliged to retire to England, came over secretly from thence to acquaint the king, that the duke of Lancaster was taking effectual means to vindicate his right to the crown of Castile, and was therefore desirous of his alliance. The queen Donna Leonora supported this proposition, partly out of distaste to the treaty lately made, in which she had little or no share; but more out of affection to its author Andeyro; for this woman, as a Portuguese historian well observes, having sacrificed her honour and her husband to a king, now sacrificed that king to her new gallant^a. This strange measure was no sooner taken, than preparations were made for putting it in execution. For this purpose a fleet was provided, the garrisons on the frontiers reinforced, and levies made throughout the kingdom. It was impossible that things of this nature should be concealed, and Don Juan of Castile did not trouble himself to enquire into the reason. On the contrary, he assembled an army on the frontiers, and equipped a fleet at Seville. The revolt of his brother, the count de Gijon, who had married the king of Portugal's daughter, hindered the war from breaking out so soon as it would have done^b. The king Don Ferdinand employed this respite in demolishing the Roman walls about the city of Evora, without reflecting that it would be impossible to put that place in any state of defence before it would be in danger; and that therefore it would have been much more prudent to have left it in the condition it was. But the sense of this mistake was quickly obliterated by a greater: the fleet, when ready to sail, was put under the command of Don Juan Alonso, the queen's brother; and tho' it was superior in force to that of Castile, under Ferdinand Sanchez, yet, thro' the want of conduct in the count, it was beaten, and himself taken prisoner. This misfortune was followed by another still greater, which was the defeat of the Portuguese army by land, the loss of the town of Almeyda, which was taken by Don Juan of Castile, who thereupon disposed every thing for the siege of Lisbon^c. Some say, this was proposed by the infant Don Juan of Portugal, who was in hopes of carrying it by intelligence; but being disappointed withdrew, to which it is highly probable the advanced season of the year might not a little contribute.

Carries it on by the assistance of Edmund, earl of Cambridge, and the English.

THE English fleet and army, under the command of Edmund earl of Cambridge, entering without any interruption into the port of Lisbon, gave a new turn to affairs. The king of Castile found himself obliged to act for some time on the defensive, and saw, with no small chagrin, that his troops were not forward to engage these strangers, on account of the claim of the duke of Lancaster, in right of his wife Donna Constantia. On the other hand, Don Ferdinand of Portugal, who was charmed at this seasonable mark of attention shewed to him by a foreign power, grew extremely fond of them; and with that warmth, which was natural to him, proposed and concluded a marriage between Edward Plantagenet, the son of Edmund, earl of Cambridge, then a child, and the infanta. While the diversions attending this solemnity occupied the court, the count of Ourem breathed his last, and the queen procured his title to be bestowed upon her favourite Andeyro, which occasioned great murmurs amongst the nobility^d. An accident happened soon after that raised them higher; the queen seeing Andeyro, through some exercise or other, in a great sweat, tore her veil, and gave it him to wipe his face with it; Don Juan, grand-master of Avis, and the king's brother, together with Gonsalo Vasquez de Azevedo, took the liberty to expostulate with her upon the impropriety of the thing, at which she dissembled her resentment. But after a little reflection, concluding it safest to take them out of the way, she surreptitiously procured, or, as others say, forged an order from the king, directed to Vasco Martinez de Melo, commanding him to seize and confine them, which he did, in the castle of Evora, of which he was governor. Some time after, a like order came to put them to death; but the governor, who was a man of parts and prudence, thought it expedient to shew this order to the king before he obeyed it. Don Ferdinand was very much amazed, and began to open his eyes a little on this proceeding. His fondness, however, for the queen was so great, that he ordered they should remain some days longer in confinement; and, when they were set at liberty, the favour was attributed to the queen, whose hands they were obliged to kiss upon their coming to court^e. Some writers say, that when she found herself discovered, she engaged the earl of Cambridge to ask their release; but which way soever the thing happened, it is certain that all parties were reconciled in shew, and continued to hate each other sincerely in their hearts. An event strange, but not unusual at courts.

WE have already given the history of this war in another place, and have shewn, that partly through the misunderstandings between the English and Portuguese, and partly through the natural mutability of Don Ferdinand's temper, a peace was suddenly concluded between the two crowns, in which it was stipulated that the Portuguese gallies should be restored, and that the English army should be sent home in Spanish bottoms. When this treaty came to be ratified, Don Juan demurred to these two points, supposing that the Portuguese were now so embarrassed with their allies, as to be obliged to accept whatever terms he prescribed; but

- a Don Ferdinand cut the matter short, by sending him a challenge, which, when the king of Castile had read, he contented himself with saying, I did not think he had been so brave, and immediately subscribed the treaty. By this, as by all the rest, the infanta Donna Beatrix had a new husband given her, who was the infant Don Ferdinand of Castile, the king's second son, substituted instead of his elder brother, to prevent the union of the two kingdoms. The Portuguese in general were better pleased with this than with any of the former alliances; and the English being returned home, both nations began to breathe a little, and to taste with great satisfaction, the sweets of peace. The court, however, was still disturbed with intrigues; the queen maintained her ascendancy; the grand-master studied to form a party amongst the nobility; and the king, though he grew daily more infirm, sighed for some new negotiation
- b that might employ his thoughts, and it was not long before his wishes were gratified²; but it was, however, for the last time.

THE death of queen Leonora plunged the court of Castile into the deepest sorrow. The king was afflicted beyond measure; and the people were equally moved by the loss of the queen, and by that concern which he expressed for it. Don Ferdinand gave but a little time to grief; he regretted the queen, but remembered that the king of Castile was become a widower; he had already contracted his daughter, the infanta, to both his sons, he resolved now to offer her to the father. The queen was very well pleased with this motion; she perceived he could not live long, and she saw that, in consequence of this marriage, she might continue a queen, and even govern Portugal after his decease. Her favourite Andeyro, now styled count of Ourem, was fixed upon to be the ambassador; and his equipage was so splendid, and his expence at the court of Castile so large, that the Castilians made some smart reflections, not much to the honour of the court from whence he came. He succeeded, however, in his negotiation, and the king Don Juan, struck with so advantageous an offer, accepted the terms upon which it was made, and sent an ambassador extraordinary to ratify them. In the history of his reign, we have shewn what these terms were; and therefore it would be improper to repeat them here, only it may not be amiss to observe, that the prudence shewn in the last treaty, did not at all appear in this, for in case the infanta died without children, Don Juan was to enjoy the kingdom of Portugal; but indeed, some of the Portuguese writers say, that to balance this, if the king and queen of Castile died without heirs, Don Ferdinand was to succeed, of which, however, there was no great risque, since he was in a manner dying, and scarce lived to see the marriage, which was the last effort of his extraordinary politics³.

As the king's infirmities rendered it impossible for him to assist at it in person, the queen, who delighted in such magnificent spectacles, took the care upon herself, and provided every thing requisite at a vast expence. When all was ready, she set out with her daughter, the infanta, who was scarce thirteen years of age, attended by the principal nobility of Portugal, for Estremos, where she was received by the archbishop of Compostella, chancellor of Castile, and who, in quality of ambassador, had negotiated this marriage. He was attended by the prelates, lords, and deputies of towns, who swore to the punctual performance of the treaty in all its branches; after which the queen proceeded with the infanta to Xelves, where the king met his bride, and solemnly espoused her; then taking leave of queen Leonora, he conducted her that very evening to Badajoz, where the next day he received the nuptial benediction in the cathedral church; at which ceremony also the Portuguese plenipotentiaries were present⁴. This was in the beginning of May; and some writers assert, that while the queen was thus employed, and had the pleasure of being idolized by two great nations, the king Don Ferdinand projected a very unpleasant reception for her favourite at his return, signifying his commands to Don Juan, grand-master of Avis, his brother, to put Don Ferdinand, count of Ourem, to death, the first fair opportunity he had, without injury to the public peace. Others say, he dictated this order to his secretary; who having read it, took the liberty of observing to his majesty, that the master of Avis had already too great power over the people; and that it imported him very much to consider whether it would be for the interest of himself and family to augment his popularity, by intrusting him with such an order; upon which the king, who affected the politician to the last, ordered the letter to be burnt. But the former account, for reasons which will occur to the reader in the course of this history, seems to approach nearest the truth. It appears however, that this secret was so well kept, owing very probably to the general hatred born to the favourite, that not a tittle of it transpired upon their return to the frontiers either to the queen or to himself⁵.

Ferdinand of Portugal, and sorrow of his subjects.

THE king bore his long and painful sickness with which he had been afflicted for some years, with wonderful patience and resignation, even to the very last, and died with great marks of piety and composure of mind, on the twenty-second of October, one thousand three hundred eighty-three, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and in the sixteenth of his reign. He directed by his will that his corpse should be buried without any ceremony at Santaren; and directed also, that every one of his domestics should have a competent provision made for him during his life, in consideration of the great tenderness and indefatigable pains expressed by them in their attendance upon him during his declining state of health^a. He gave for his device, a sword thrust through two hearts, with these words, Cur non utrumque, the meaning of which is not easily understood. Some say he meant to signify, that he could penetrate other mens thoughts as well as his own. It may be, it alluded to the violence of that passion which had united him to his queen (G). His subjects had long expected his death; and the king of Castile waited for the news of it on the frontiers: yet when it happened it occasioned a general consternation, and the people expressed more affection in their mourning for this king than they had shewn in the time of his life^c.

leged.

THE first step taken towards settling the government was made by the grand-master of Avis: he applied himself to the king of Castile, advised him to come without delay into Portugal, and intimated the expediency of leaving the government, when settled, in his hands, till the young queen Donna Beatrix had a son. This was rejected, perhaps with some degree of disdain: upon which the grand-master thought it high time to respect his own safety, tho' not thoroughly determined as to the properest means for him to take^d. By the treaty, and by the king's will, the queen was to be regent, and to have the government: to which the magistracy of Lisbon seemed to assent, for they went to compliment her at the palace; but at the same time insinuated to her, that she would do well to be more attentive to the public concerns than her husband had been, and she received them in such a manner, that they returned satisfied^e. On the other hand, the king of Castile sent ambassadors with compliments of condolence; but with instructions to demand that his consort, Donna Beatrix, should be proclaimed at Lisbon, and throughout the kingdom; for which orders were accordingly given^f. Don Henry Manuel, count of Cintra, uncle by the mother's side to the late king, was appointed to display the standard in Lisbon; but in that, and indeed in most of the cities through the kingdom, this ceremony was interrupted by persons who cried out, "Long live our lawful king Don Juan, the son of Don Pedro and of Donna Agnes de Castro,"^g then in Castile, and whom the king instantly sent to prison, as soon as he had intelligence of this event, and began to make the necessary provisions for assembling forces on the frontiers^h.

DON Ruy de Pereyra, a man of great courage and quality, brought some troops into Lisbon for his defence: he was a determined enemy to the conjunction of Castile and Portugal, which he considered as a fair word for making the latter only a province to the former; and believing that this would be effected by the queen regent, by the advice of the count of Ourem, who was himself a Castilian, he first conceived the necessity of taking this man out of the way. He communicated this to Alvaro Paez, who had been chancellor during the reigns of Don Pedro and his son Ferdinand, who approved it. They then sent for the grand-master of Avis, and proposed it to him, who objected that it might be ill received by the people, and that the queen would still have her brother, the count de Barcelos, who was a person of great weight

(G) This unfortunate monarch had a very fine person; he was tall, graceful, and majestic; his countenance oval; his eyes dark, but very brisk; his complexion fair; and his hair of a light brown. He was very adroit in his exercise; and whether he spoke or was silent, had something in his manner that sufficiently distinguished him from his subjects, and taught even strangers to perceive he was the king. In his second war with Castile, he introduced two new dignities into Portugal, by creating Don Alvaro Pereira de Castro constable, and Don Ferdinand Counting marshal of the kingdom. His profusion was in a manner incredible; he gave at once to Juan Alonso de Moxica, a Castilian gentleman, fifty horses, thirty mules, three suits of armour, thirty thousand marks in silver plate, four horse load of rich tapestry, besides villages and lands. His raising the value of the coin did a great deal of mischief; but, however, he had the satisfaction of setting that matter to rights before his death.

His pulling down the old Roman walls of Evora produced a great clamour; but he afterwards put that city into a good state of defence. He likewise demolished all the fortifications of Lisbon, and rebuilt them within the space of two years; by which the city and kingdom was preserved after his decease. He made many good laws, more especially with regard to agriculture and commerce. He was very much shocked at the impudence of the people, who suggested, that the infanta was the daughter of Andeyro, though he did not return from England to Portugal till she was eight years old. He expressed great penitence on his death-bed, and begged pardon of his subjects for the miseries he had brought upon them. His character is succinctly and truly drawn by a certain historian in these words, He was a very indifferent king, with very great capacity; and a very weak man, with abundance of courage.

a and wisdom, to assist her in her designs. The chancellor told him, he would undertake for both. The grand-master replied roundly, that then he would dispatch Andeyro with his own hand. In the mean time the queen, having consulted with her favourite, summoned the grand-master to council; where, after declaring that they had intelligence of the king of Castile's arming with intention to invade Portugal, they proposed intrusting the command of the army on the frontiers with the grand-master; who, by this means they thought to have removed to some distance, and had prepared by great liberalities to gain the people in his absence. This was in the morning of the sixth of December: the grand-master accepted the proposition without hesitation, and offered to set out without delay. He did so; but he returned suddenly, with the count de Barcelos, the chancellor, and Ruy Pereyra, and came to the palace a little before dinner. He told the queen, that he thought it not expedient to advance to the frontiers without troops: and she so little apprehended any danger, that she invited him to her table. He accepted the invitation; and going into another room, made a sign to Andeyro that he wanted to speak with him. Their conversation was but short; for the grand-master drawing a dagger stabbed him. The count turned, and would have fled into the queen's apartment; but Pereyra prevented him by a thrust with his sword, which laid him dead at his feet. The queen was soon acquainted with the fact, which she bewailed bitterly, saying, she had lost her best friend; that he was a martyr, and not a criminal; and that she would undergo the ordeal in support of his innocence. She next sent to the grand-master to know if she was to die too: but he answered, the queen had nothing to fear ^k.

c AT the instant of the count's death, the grand-master ordered the palace-gates to be shut, ^{The populace} having first sent out the chancellor, and one of his own pages: the boy cried out, that his ^{support the} master was fast in the palace, and his life in danger, which the grave old chancellor confirmed: ^{grand-master,} upon this the whole city was immediately in arms; and Don Martin, bishop of Lisbon, ^{and carry him} retired for safety, with a friend or two, into the tower of his cathedral. The people seeing ^{umph.} them there, called to them to ring the bell; and upon their refusing, broke open the doors, ran up, and threw them into the streets. This prelate was a man of an exemplary life, and his only crime was being a native of Castile. The grand-master having by this artifice discovered how thoroughly the people were in his interest, caused the gates of the palace to be opened, suffered them to rescue him from the danger he was never in, and went with the count de Barcelos to a friend's house to dine with Don Ruy de Pereyra and the chancellor, leaving the queen at full liberty to bewail the ambitious and unfortunate Andeyro ^l.

WHEN the grand-master was more at leisure, he went to make his excuses to the queen; in ^{Match pro-} which he partly justified what he had done, and partly cast the weight of it upon necessity. ^{posed between} The queen heard him with great indifference, and answered him but coldly: however, she ^{him and queen} made one request, which was, that she might have leave to retire from Lisbon to Alenquez; to ^{Leonora, but} which he consented, and went thither accordingly, attended by many of the first nobility; for in ^{rejected by her} general the great families adhered to the queen. The grand-master, after her departure, affected even to his friends a very deep melancholy, suggested, that for the sake of the people, and to make some effort to preserve the liberties of his country, he had quitted an easy and a happy situation for a life so miserable that he could not one hour count upon the next, and therefore weary of perpetual fatigue, and distracted with so hopeless a prospect, he thought best to retire to England. The old chancellor, who was perhaps the only man that understood the grand-master's language, told him, that, in a situation like his, flight was always scandalous, and seldom safe; that he saw the people ready to do or to suffer any thing for him; and that therefore he ought to embark their liberty and his safety on the same bottom. In the end, the grand-master suffered himself by a gentle violence to be drawn to this conclusion ^m. A proposition was then made to the queen Donna Leonora, that for the sake of peace, to recover her own power, and to extinguish the memory of all that was past, she ⁿ should marry the grand-master, and with him hold the regency till her daughter should have a child of age to assume the government; but the queen rejected these terms with contempt, and repeated her applications to Don Juan of Castile, for assistance and protection. The commons threatened those who held out the castle of Lisbon into a surrender, from the apprehension of seeing their wives and children murdered before their faces; and then proclaimed the grand-master protector of the Portuguese nation, and regent of the kingdom, promising never to forsake him, and conjuring him to neglect nothing that might contribute to their mutual defence ^o.

UPON the queen's repeated intreaties, and on her promise to meet him at Santaren, Don Juan of Castile began his march towards Portugal, with a considerable body of forces, fol- ^{Don Juan of} ^{Castile assumes}

lowing in that respect the advice of the younger part of his council; whereas graver heads had persuaded him to adhere strictly to the treaty, to send ambassadors before him into Portugal, with the strongest assurances on that head, and to propound only the restitution of the power of the queen dowager, in conjunction with a council to be chosen by the states ^a. The reason he rejected this was, that he looked upon the conquest of Portugal as a thing equally easy and certain, and therefore to be undertaken at once. On his approaching to Guarda, the gates were opened by the command of the bishop, who was chancellor to queen Leonora. He proceeded next to Santaren, where the queen met him, and where he insisted she should resign all title to the regency; which she did, but unwillingly. He then made a public entry with his queen, and caused himself and her to be proclaimed, adding Portugal and Algarve to his titles: and caused money to be coined with his own bust, and on the reverse the arms of both kingdoms ^b. Excursions were now daily made into Portugal by the Castilians, and into Castile by the Portuguese: but Don Juan, not well satisfied with his mother's humour, shewed little regard to her advice, and less to her request; while her daughter, Donna Beatrix, treated her with great freedom and indifference. The Portuguese lords were not better satisfied: they were indeed well entertained; but the king was not so familiar with them as Don Ferdinand had been; neither did they meet with the golden showers they expected: on the whole, there was much dissatisfaction amongst them, and the king disdaining to take any cognizance of such little quarrels, applied himself to the assembling of an army that might be numerous enough to invest and besiege Lisbon, in conjunction with those of the nation who were still in his interests; and believed that it was very practicable, in spite of the aversion of the populace, to fix him upon the throne ^c. He was the more confident of this himself, as most of the strong places, and the major part of the kingdom had declared for him; but he had not sufficiently considered that they might alter their opinions, and that he had not an army numerous enough to secure them by Castilian garrisons; and if this had been in his power, it was doubtful whether they would have given him admittance.

The grand-master declared regent and protector of Portugal, by the people.

On the other hand, the regent, from the time he assumed that title and office, acted with all the prudence and sagacity imaginable. He was himself one of the ablest politicians ever embarked in a scene of this nature; yet he was content to be advised in every thing, and had penetration enough to make choice of a council who were really capable to advise him. The office of chancellor he bestowed upon Rigas, a man of great parts, and whose pathetic eloquence had a strong influence upon the people. He did this at the motion of Alvaro Paez, who had held that office long, and now wanted strength to go through it. At present, said he to the regent, the business is not power but safety. However, he was the first man sworn of the regent's council, and how well he deserved it, appears from the maxim he recommended to him when he seemed diffident of the high professions that were made to him. To fix these people in your interest, said Alvaro, you must give them what is none of your own, and reward them with what is not in your power; meaning, that he should promise them confiscations, and the governments of places, then in the hands of the queen ^d. He likewise advised the regent to send an ambassador to England, to demand the assistance of the duke of Lancaster. And no doubt it was by his instructions, that this minister made no scruple of turning prophet, in giving the title of king of Portugal to his master long before he assumed it. The regent himself made no scruple of practising every art for his own advantage; and perceiving that numbers were inclined to the infant Don Juan, he caused him to be depicted in his standards, lying on a bed of straw, with irons on his legs, as if he had been so treated in Castile; by which he animated the populace against their enemies, and made the phrase of the king Don Juan familiar ^e. The war could not be carried on without treasure; the plunder of the queen's friends, and the plate of the churches, was a ready and convenient supply, yet he received it with reluctance; and declaring his sincere intention to replace it, he kept those who were stripped from engaging against him, and brought the priests to act vigorously on his side. In the whole course of his conduct, he never lost sight of old Paez's first admonition, haughty to your foes, and humble to your friends. When he spoke of the liberty of Portugal, it was in the language of the old Romans; but in his applications to the people, he was so modest, and so resigned, that all things were forced upon him, and he seemed to be no more than an engine directed at their pleasure. The nobility saw through this, and thought to expose it, by calling his adherents the disciples of the Messiah; but as there is no reasoning, so there is no jesting with the multitude, for they took this literally, and retorting it upon his opponents, called them infidels and Jews ^f.

- ^a AFTER all the pains taken by the regent, and in spite of all his address, he might very probably have been crushed by the power of the king Don Juan, and of the party who remained firm to the interest of queen Beatrix, if their affairs had been conducted with equal spirit, or if the like unanimity had prevailed amongst them. The queen dowager, heated by her resentment, and forgetting against whom she acted, endeavoured to diffuse amongst her creatures an opinion that she was injured, and that, to secure their own liberties, and obtain justice for her, the shortest way was to reconcile themselves to the regent; upon this, many who doubted on which side to act, took her advice. The king, her son-in-law, expostulated this matter warmly, more especially as he had been refused entrance into Coimbra, by Don Gonsalo Tellez, her brother. The queen gave so plausible an account of this matter, that the king knew not what to think, more especially when she proposed going herself with him to Coimbra, in order to oblige her brother to put that important place into his hands. He carried her thither accordingly, and in a conference with Don Gonsalo, she reasoned, threatened, commanded, intreated, and cajoled him in such a manner, that Don Juan could not doubt of her intention; though all proved ineffectual, and her brother could be only brought to promise, that when a king of Portugal should demand them, he would deliver the keys^w. Queen Leonora laid hold of this expression to facilitate a most horrid design, which she had formed against the king's life. Don Pedro, count of Trafemara, and Don Alonso, his brother, near relations to the king, were in the camp, and the latter had an intrigue with one of the queen's ladies of honour, who proposed to him that count Pedro should kill the king, marry the queen regent her mistress, and declare himself king of Portugal; and as he might be assured that Coimbra would be rendered to him by her brother, he might rest satisfied that other cities and towns would take the same step. Don Pedro was weak and wicked enough to enter into this wild scheme: in the management of which he was obliged to trust a Jew, who, either through fear of punishment or hopes of reward, discovered it to the king; upon which, immediate orders being given to double the guards, a servant of Don Pedro's carried him the news; and, as guilt is easily alarmed, he made his escape. The king charged Donna Leonora with it before the queen her daughter; but, without being disconcerted, she denied the whole, and, when the Jew was produced, she treated him as an informer and impostor. This, however, made no impression on Don Juan, who, by the advice of his council, sent her prisoner into Castile^x.
- ^d As the king's sole dependence was now in his arms, he sent orders to Seville to equip a fleet, which was intended to block up the river of Lisbon; and at the same time directed, that the principal nobility in his dominions should march to his assistance, with all the forces they could raise^y. In the mean time hearing every day of places revolting to the regent; he resolved to punish what he treated as a spirit of rebellion, and sent out detachments to burn and plunder; who did their business without the least mixture of pity or regret. The regent, who now saw all at stake, directed the small fleet that he had at Lisbon to repair to Porto, that they might not be blocked up; and directed his letters to all the maritime places in the kingdom, requiring them to send what naval force they could thither^z. To restrain the Castilian troops, he gave the command of the best part of his to Nugno Alvarez Pereyra, one of the bravest and best officers he had; and notwithstanding his elder brother, the prior of Crato, who was in the service of the king of Castile, laboured all that was in his power to draw him to that interest, he rejected all offers; and with great intrepidity, though with forces far inferior to the enemy, attacked the Castilians, and gained a glorious victory^a. This answered the intended end of restraining incursions; but the king Don Juan's reinforcements arriving daily, he was quickly in a condition to undertake what was the main object of his desires, the siege of Lisbon; and as soon as he had the news that his fleet was arrived before it, he marched with a numerous and well-disciplined army, with which he invested the place, not at all doubtful of the event, as the enemy had no succours to expect, and as his troops were abundantly supplied with provisions from the fruitful countries that lay behind them. The presence of the regent was the great strength of the place; for the number of troops he had was very small, and he had no army in the field in a condition to raise it. He defended himself, however, with great spirit and resolution; and having good intelligence, executed some bold sallies with success. His fleet at Porto, being gradually augmented, put to sea, and swept all the ships upon the coast of Castile, by which they made a prodigious booty; and, after carrying their prizes to Porto, they entered the river of Lisbon, and blocked up the Castilian fleet, that had hitherto acted against the town^b. But it may be, the king of Castile's superior force, which gained him in the course of the siege many advantages, would in the end have carried the place. But the irresistible arm of Providence interposed; an epidemic distemper, a little differing from a plague, broke out in his army, and made such devastation, that he at length thought it expedient to try what a negotiation might produce^c. The regent readily listened to this, as it raised the spirits of his own people, and as he knew the disease would continue to act while hostilities were suspended. The king proposed, that if he would proclaim himself and queen Beatrix, he would leave the regency of the kingdom to him, in conjunction with a Castilian nobleman. The regent having protracted the treaty for some time, answered, that this was against his principle, since he only fought to preserve the government of Portugal to the Portuguese^d. While the negotiation lasted, he wrote to the constable at Evora, to assemble all the troops he possibly could, and to advance towards Lisbon, to countenance a sally he intended to make with his whole force; but Don Juan of Castile hindered^b his orders from taking effect, by raising the siege suddenly, and retiring with the wretched remains of his army, as fast as they were able to march, towards his own dominions^e. The Portuguese historians say, that, turning his eyes upon the city at his departure, he wished he might see it in ruins, and the ground ploughed up upon which it stood: a stroke of resentment as idle as that of queen Leonora when she went to Alenquer, who, turning to it, said, Base and ungrateful Lisbon, how much would it rejoice my eyes to behold thy palaces in flames. The bitterness of these curses fell infinitely short of the joy of its inhabitants at this happy deliverance, which they attributed entirely to the vigilance, valour, and fortune of the regent, who for the first time repressed and reproved the people, exhorting them to repair to their churches, and pay their thanks where it was due, since it was God who had delivered them, and not a mean contemptible man like him. This had a good effect; the people took his advice, and for a whole day there was nothing seen but a decent and composed spirit of devotion, to which they were principally excited by the example of the regent himself^f.

It was not without reason that the regent, or protector, of Portugal, affected so much religious and civil prudence in all his actions; for beyond question it was entirely due to this caution and circumspection that the city escaped ruin, and himself was preserved, as the outworks were lost, and Don Pedro de Castro had formed a conspiracy for delivering up a great part of the city. Famine had made as sharp attacks within, as the plague without: nor would the king of Castile, after all, have raised the siege, if the queen had not fallen sick^g. Don Juan therefore acted as wisely as worthily in attributing their common deliverance to the special interposition of Providence; which, upon reflection, filled the people with still higher sentiments of him than those they had at first expressed: insomuch, that they offered themselves, and all that they had to his will; which was so much the more extraordinary, as few nations have valued liberty more, or understood it better than the Portuguese. The friends of the regent advised him to lay hold of this transport of popular affection, and to prosecute his good fortune; which counsel he accepted from a nobler motive, that of providing for the health and happiness of the people. He drew some thousands of the younger sort into the field, that the citizens might be more at their ease; and as fast as he could amass them he sent great quantities of provisions to Lisbon. His expedition was attended with all the success he could desire: many fortified places opened their gates, several persons of great distinction came over to his party; some out of respect to his person and his merit; some through their zeal for liberty; but the greater part out of hatred and malice to the Castilians, who, as they were never beloved by the Portuguese, had now, by their own ill conduct, heightened prejudice into aversion, and swelled natural dislike into irreconcilable detestation^h. The picture is not pleasing, but it is drawn from the life.

He gives encouragement to the count de Trastemara to conspire against the regent.

THE king Don Juan of Castile, notwithstanding this severe check, still kept up his pretensions, appointed such as would accept commissions from him governors of the towns they held, and began to raise in his own dominions such an army as, if he had employed at first, would infallibly have conquered *Portugal*ⁱ. Yet in the midst of these preparations, he had recourse to a sinister method; which not only failed him, but was in other respects also highly detrimental to his interests. He wrote to the count de Trastemara, whom queen Leonora had embarked in a design against his own life, that he might recover his favour, and prevent the confiscation of his vast estate, if he could by any means compass the death of the regent. The count, who, notwithstanding his alliance to the royal family, was very fit for such an enterprise, readily embraced the proposal, and drew in Don Pedro de Castro, to whom the regent had given his life when detected in a former conspiracy, to join with him. John Duque, governor of Torres Vedras, Juan Alonso de Baeza, and Garcia Gonfales de Valdez, were also embarked in this a black design; into which they drew Figuêredo, who had been governor of the castle of Gaya, and leaving it in the hands of his wife, she had so tormented the country round about, that the nobility in the neighbourhood rose, and took it from her; and this, though he knew nothing of the matter, he was to revenge upon the regent. It was also communicated to the count Don Gonçales de Telles, brother to queen Leonora; but these two last, after a little reflection, repented, and gave the regent notice of his danger at the very instant it was to have been executed. The count and Don Pedro de Castro made their escape, so did Alonso de Baez; but Garcia Gonçales de Valdez was taken, and by the regent's order burnt alive^k. John Duque was so provoked at this, that he cut off the hands and the noses of six Portuguese gentlemen who were his prisoners, and sent them to the regent; who immediately commanded six Castilian gentlemen to be treated in the same manner; but before the officer to whom he spoke quitted the room, he said, "I have given enough to resentment in issuing such an order; but it would be infamous to carry it into execution: see that the Castilians suffer no hurt." This, most authors agree, was the greatest action of his life^l. The Castilians themselves were so sensible of it, that they began to act with less rigour in regard to such of his party as fell into their hands.

THE people of Portugal in general saw clearly, that without restoring the ancient form of government they must be undone; and if they wanted a king long, their country would cease to be a kingdom. An assembly of the states was called at Coimbra, to meet at Easter; which, if not by the regent's authority, was at least by his consent: and he went thither to share in, and attend the event of their consultations. It is said, that at some distance from the city, he was met by a great number of boys upon hobby-horses, or riding upon their sticks, who no sooner saw him, than they cried out, "Long live Don Juan! Don Juan king of Portugal comes in a happy time! Don Juan shall be our king!" Whether this was owing to art or accident it had a great effect: The archbishop of Braga presided in this assembly; in which were present the bishops of Lisbon, Lamego, Porto, Coimbra, and Guarda, with many of the nobility, and most of the deputies of cities. The chancellor Regras made a long and laboured speech, in which he endeavoured to shew, that the throne was really vacant; and therefore as it was their duty to fill it, he recommended the regent to their choice, as the person who for many reasons best deserved it^m. This, tho' acceptable to many, was not so to all: Don Vasco da Cunha, a man of great quality and greater probity, rose up, and declared, that he was far from being persuaded by what he had heard: that hitherto none had pretended to doubt the reality of Don Pedro's marriage with Donna Agnes de Castro; and that if this marriage was valid, Don Juan, though an exile, though a prisoner, was king of Portugal. He closed his speech, however, with saying, that if the states were of another opinion, and should think themselves at liberty to chuse a king, he should look upon himself as bound to obey. The constable Don Nugno Alvarez de Pereira, when he saw that this speech, which was supported also by Don Vasco's two brothers, made a great impression upon the assembly, was for putting an end to the opposition, by making away with him on the spot. But the regent interposing, prevented any violence: the constable had then recourse to words. He told the states, that Portugal would be undone without a king: that let the right of Don Juan be what it would, the nation had no hand either in his exile or in his captivity, and therefore ought not to suffer by it: that some people thought the title in Donna Beatrix: that the king of Castile had thought proper to assume it; and by that act had cancelled all claim to it; that others were for Don Juan, the son of Donna Agnes; that he thought where three sovereigns claimed there was no allegiance due; that the states of Portugal were the sole judges of so embarrassed a question; that the people could be no longer without a head; and that without losing time in debates, the states ought to name him. This brought things round again, and the assembly seemed in general inclined to come to a resolution, when the regent desired to be heard, and a deep silence ensuedⁿ.

F HE began with setting forth the misery of their present condition; the just apprehensions they were under of having those miseries for ever entailed upon their posterity, by falling under the dominion of a foreign power. He expatiated on the troubles, dangers, and hardships to which, by his office of regent or protector, he was exposed. He said he pretended no right to the crown, nor did he desire it. That the king of Castile had plainly forfeited his, and the queen's likewise, by entering Portugal with an army, in breach of the treaty, from which alone her right could arise. That with respect to the infant Don Juan, if the states would declare him their king, he was content to take the same pains that he had hitherto done; that he was ready to swear to him as his lawful sovereign; to expel the Castilians out of his dominions; and to defend them for him till Providence, by restoring him to his liberty, should restore to Portugal her lawful king. That from what he knew of the weight and duties of that high office, he was sensible he wanted talents to discharge it; but that to expel strangers, to preserve the liberties of the people, and to keep the crown for its lawful owner, he was ready to expose himself to any labour or hazard^a. The assembly understood this perhaps, as it was intended, as a modest refusal, that might render the placing the crown upon his head more grateful to the people of Portugal. Accordingly, the question being put, the regent was unanimously declared king, and Don Vasco da Cunha was one of the first who complimented him upon his election^b, and made him a tender of his services.

Don Juan declared king, which puts an end to the inter-regnum.

Thus ended that long interregnum which had been so fatal to Portugal, which had destroyed the face of government throughout the best part of the kingdom, and rent the whole nation into factions, and introduced a foreign army into the heart of the country; which had put a full stop to industry, and, by taking away security, had rendered a great part, even of the most fertile provinces, desert. The sad effects of the interregnum did not, however, end with it; but on the contrary were augmented in number, and heightened in their nature; for the Portuguese were rebels now on which ever side they acted, and maltreated on both sides if they declared for neither. Yet a ray of hope was let in by this election; and by degrees, his own vigilance, and his people's valour, secured to Don Juan the crown, which in every country, purging all defects, made him, in the eyes of his subjects at least, and in the end in the eyes of his neighbours also, a legal king.

Comprehending the reigns of John I. Edward, Alonso V. and John II.

Additional restrictions upon Don Juan, when declared and acknowledged.

DON Juan, grand-master of the order of Avis, was declared king by the states of Portugal, at Coimbra, on the sixth of April, and we shall therefore stile him for the future John the first, as it will enable us to distinguish him the better from his competitor, Don Juan king of Castile (A). Those who made him a king thought fit to prescribe some additional

(A) Don Juan was the natural son of Don Pedro, the Lower of Justice, by Donna Theresa Lorenza, a Galician lady, and born, as the best writers say, at Lisbon, on the 22d of April, 1357, which was one great reason why the people of that city were so early, and continued so steadily, attached to him. He was first put under the care of Lorenzo de Leyria, a citizen of Lisbon, who delivered him, as soon as he was capable of instruction, to Don Nugno Freyras de Andrada, grand-master of the order of Christ, who educated him with infinite care and affection, and when he was seven years old produced him at court, which is said to be the first time the king his father ever saw him. His tutor observed how much he was pleased with the aspect and behaviour of the boy; and laying hold of this favourable opportunity, demanded for him the mastership of Avis, which was just become vacant by the death of Don Martin de Avilar: the king readily yielded to his request, knighted him upon the spot, and sent him to be bred up at Tomar, which was the residence of the grand-masters of Avis (1). There he received an admirable education, which, joined to his own great parts, produced him early in the reign of his brother Don Ferdinand upon the public theatre, as one of the best officers, and one of the ablest men in Portugal. He gave his brother good advice, and frequently hazarded his life in his service. He was civil to the queen, but never of her faction. He publicly reprov'd the lightness of her behaviour, which she revenged by procuring his imprisonment; and, as we have shewn in the text, was very near taking away his life, which it is probable he never forgot. The king his brother charged him to kill the queen's favourite, and he executed that order after the king's death (2). He was a deep politician; for he covered all his designs with an appearance of openness and candour. He gained the friendship of the ablest men in the kingdom, whether soldiers, ecclesiastics, or lawyers; but above all, he studied the people, and understood their humours perfectly. He wrought upon those humours by concealed and unsuspected means, and seemed to be the instrument only of his own contrivances, and to receive from others those orders which he had secretly dictated. His prudence gained him the confidence of the wife; his steadiness and gratitude the friendship of the brave; and his liberality the bulk of the nation. He was in the twenty-seventh year of his age when he was declared protector, and in the twenty-eighth when he was proclaimed king (3). He was one of those few persons upon whom prosperity and adversity had no manner of effect. He was not elated by the one, or depressed by the other; but, if occasion required it, could counterfeit both. By pretending fear, and threatening to leave the kingdom, he was elected regent; by promising titles, governments, estates, as if he had been really master of the whole kingdom, when he had very little of it, in the end he became so (4). In one thing he was very singular; though he was so great a master of art, he never employed it but when it was necessary; and though he had it fully in his power to a tional articles to the old laws of Lamego ; such as that he should exclude from his council, and the magistracy of towns, all the creatures of queen Leonora ; that he should be very careful in bestowing the great offices of the kingdom, and of his shoushold ; that in all cases of any moment he should take the advice of his council, and be for that purpose attended by a committee wherever he went ; that he should not conclude peace, or declare war, but with the assent of the states ; and that he should not interpose his authority in making or dissolving marriages, which ought to be entirely free, and not subject to any controul ; nevertheless the new king should be obliged to ask the assent of the states before he entered into wedlock. The king readily ratified all but the last. He said, that marriage was the prerogative of every man ; that he would promise them never to invade it, and for this reason he was unwilling to lose it. The states acquiesced, the king swore to the rest, and was then proclaimed: as to the solemnity of a coronation, he deferred it till they were more at leisure. He declared the constable Nugno Alvarez, major-domo ; his brother Alvaro Pereyra, marshal of the kingdom ; Vasco da Cunha, standard-bearer. Regras was continued in his office of chancellor, and all were sworn of his council, with some other lords of equal character and reputation^a. The king and the constable both took the field, and reduced several places by force, and recovered others by composition, particularly the city of Braga. The king gave very honourable terms to the Castilian officers who defended places against him, but refused them to the Portuguese, whom he now affected to treat as rebels^b.

c At length Don Juan of Castile, at the head of the whole force of his dominions, and with the flower of the Castilian nobility, entered the province of Alentejo ; and, as the Portuguese historians say, besieged Elvas without effect^c ; so that being obliged to retire from before it, he returned to Ciudad Rodrigo, in his own dominions, full of resentment and chagrin. There he held a council of war ; in which, yielding to the opinions of the young and hot-headed nobility, he resolved to invade Portugal again ; to ruin all the country before him ; to drive the master of Avis, as they stiled him, once more into Lisbon : and not to depart from before that city till she owned her lawful king. This scheme was pursued, several places taken and sacked, Trancofo particularly, where a body of Castilian troops had been beat, and the church burnt^d. In the mean time, John king of Portugal lay at Abrantes, with a small army, as if he despaired of expelling the enemy, and was at a loss what measures to take. But in reality he waited for the English succours ; and his prudence and courage were so well known, that, notwithstanding appearances were so much against him, there were none who censured his conduct. The constable Don Nugno Alvarez alone pressed the king to fight : he said the ardour of his troops would supply the want of numbers ; and that it was dishonourable to see the kingdom burnt and spoiled, without attempting its relief. The king heard him patiently, and gave him good words ; but did not shew his usual alacrity in marching to find out the enemy. At length an officer he had sent to view the Castilian army returned, and published through the camp, that though the report was true as to their numbers ; yet that they were extremely harrassed, were in great want of provision, and so dispersed that they might be easily surprized. This he did by the king's express orders ; for there was not a single word of it true, the army of Castile being in the plains of Aljubarota, very strongly posted, and very well supplied.

f THE Portuguese soldiers cried out to be led to the battle ; the constable expostulated again with the king ; and he, as if over-persuaded, at last gave orders to march. The Castilians had great advantages if they had preserved them : their army consisted, according to the best accounts, of thirty thousand men^e. Some Portuguese historians make theirs but six thousand six hundred ; but the Castilians say they were ten thousand. The constable led the van, Men Rodriguez commanded one wing, Antonio Vasquez the other, and the king was in the center. The Castilians came precipitately to the action, and were not only the aggressors, but charged with such fury that the constable with his troops gave way. The king of Portugal perceived it, and ordered the main body of his forces to open and give them way. The enemy, disordered in the pursuit, he attacked on their flanks, and in half an hour their rout became unavoidable. A multitude of their best officers were killed upon the spot; the king of Castile fled that night upon a mule to Santaren, upwards of thirty miles. This victory, which was A. D. 1385. decisive, was gained on the fourteenth of August, by four in the afternoon. The Castilians lost ten thousand men, all the places in the neighbourhood surrendered; and the constable immediately after made an irruption into the dominions of Castile, where he had the good fortune to defeat the grand-master of the order of St. James, who was killed upon the spot, and returned, covered with glory, into Portugal^f. This campaign fixed the fate of Portugal, and rendered the authority of king John permanent and stable.

King John

lady Philippa,

John duke of Lancaster.

THE king created the constable upon his return count of Ourem, and rewarded the rest of his officers with great magnificence^g. At the opening of the next year he reduced Chaves, after a long siege. He next made an irruption into Castile in person, and besieged Coria; but without effect. Upon his being obliged to raise it, his usual discretion deserted him, and he happened to say, though in a jesting manner, "That he had taken the place, if, like king Arthur, he had had good knights at his round table." Men Rodriguez de Vasconcellos answered immediately, "That possibly the knights of the round table had more reason to complain they were not blessed with an Arthur, to distinguish their valour, and make a right use of it." The king saw his mistake, and held his tongue^h. The duke of Lancaster arriving at Corunna, the king went to meet him, and finding with him his consort Donna Constantia, who took the title of queen of Castile, and his daughters, he quickly concluded a marriage with the eldest Donna Philippa; and as soon as a dispensation could be obtained from the Pope, the marriage was celebrated at *Lisbon*ⁱ. We have already given the history of this war; and shall not therefore dwell any longer than is absolutely necessary upon it here. The king, in conjunction with his father-in-law, made an irruption into Castile, without gaining any great advantage; for Don Juan being informed how ill the sultry heats of Galicia agreed with the English, put good garrisons into his frontiers, and withdrew all provisions: so that the English and Portuguese were glad to retreat without fighting. At his return to Lisbon king John fell dangerously ill, and his queen miscarried; which, with the miserable circumstances the kingdom was in, caused a great consternation: from which, however, they were in some measure relieved by the king and queen's recovery^k.

Compels the

By king John's advice, and with his full consent, the duke of Lancaster, with his family and forces, embarked, under the escort of a Portuguese squadron, for the dominions of the crown of England in France, with full assurance that he would return the next year with a more numerous army. But after he was at Bayonne, it appeared that he had made a treaty with the king of Castile, by which the prince Don Henry, his eldest son, was to espouse Donna Catalina, the duke's second daughter: in consequence of which their pretensions were adjusted^l. The Spanish historians say, that this gave great uneasiness in Portugal; but the Portuguese affirm, that the king, all things considered, was not so much offended as he appeared to be, as foreseeing that this would bring about a peace, of which he was in great need^m. He reduced some of the few places that still held out, and then made an irruption into Castile; but soon after returned to Braga, in order to hold an assembly of the states: where, by recommending it strongly to them to spare the people in their taxes, he carried his point, and obtained as great a subsidy as he could desire; which in spite of their poverty the people very cheerfully paidⁿ. The king afterwards made an irruption into Galicia, where he was so fortunate as to reduce the city of Tuy, and the town of Salvaterra. Upon this the Castilian offered if they were restored to conclude a truce for a certain term, and to deliver up some places which he still held. To which king John very readily assented. His interest with Pope Boniface the ninth was so good, that he obtained from him the erection of Lisbon into an archiepiscopal see^o. The peace with Castile had not perhaps been of any long duration, if the king Don Juan had lived; for the Castilian nobility were extremely piqued at what they took to be a diminution of their honour; but the king being killed by a fall from his horse, and leaving no issue by his queen Donna Beatrix, all colour of making war upon Portugal ceased^p. In the minority^q of the young king the truce was prolonged for fifteen years, with great advantage to Portugal: but the historians of that country say, that these terms were but ill observed by the Castilians; for which they assert, their king would have procured satisfaction by force of arms, if some domestic troubles had not prevented them: but as to the rise and nature of these troubles, authors are not very well agreed, and we can only endeavour to reach the truth by comparing them^r.

^a THE chancellor Regras, who was a great politician and a very plausible speaker, undertook to rectify his master's judgment with regard to his liberalities, objecting particularly to the large grants he had made the constable Don Nugno Alvarez de Pereyra. He further observed, that the constable had not turned these to his own advantage; but had exercised the same royal generosity towards the gentlemen who had served under him: by which he was in a manner master of the provinces of Alentejo and Algarve. He concluded, that the king had already several children, and was likely to have more, and that a competency was at least due to them, as well as power and magnificence to the constable. Moved by these persuasions, the king published an edict for resuming, upon certain terms, the grants he had made in the time of his necessity. The constable, who found himself exceedingly embarrassed and aggrieved by this edict, came to court, and expostulated the matter with the king, who, on account of their ancient friendship, heard him patiently; but told him it was impossible for him to retract his edict. The constable upon this went down to his government, and putting his affairs into the best order he was able, signified an intention of leaving the kingdom. At this the king was equally alarmed and displeased: he sent therefore several ecclesiasticks to dissuade him from that resolution; but without effect: for the constable's high spirit could not brook what he understood to be an act of injustice. The king thereupon sent him orders to come to court; and when he came, took him alone into his closet, where he explained to him the true motives of his conduct. The constable came out from this conference perfectly satisfied; and the edict was executed without any farther disputes. It seems the king intending his natural son Don Alonso, who was his great favourite, for the constable's only daughter, he was unwilling that his establishment should appear more considerable than that of his lawful children; and as soon as the constable perceived that what he did was not at all the effect of any coldness or disregard, but was in itself highly reasonable, he came at once into his master's measures; so that this may be reckoned among the few instances of expostulations between a monarch and a subject, without prejudice to either. But the reader will remember they were both men of consummate abilities.

ALL this time the jealousies and heart-burnings between the Castilians and Portuguese still remained, and the fire of war lay smothered under its embers. The king of Portugal, under pretence that the articles of the last convention between them had not been well observed, surprized the town of Badajoz, and made an attempt upon that of Albuquerque, a place of strength and importance. Don Henry of Castile resented this, upon which the war flamed out afresh, and the constable of Portugal made an irruption into Castile. But while king John meditated something of greater consequence, he was not a little surprized at the news that Vasco da Cunha, Ferdinand Pacheco, and Juan Alonso Pimentel were retired into Castile, and had prevailed on several considerable places in his dominions to revolt. At this time his troops were employed in Galicia, where they had once more taken the city of Tuy, and the constable was there in order to fortify and put it into a proper state of defence. In some small space the meaning of this defection appeared; for Don Denis of Portugal, assisted by a considerable body of Castilian troops, advanced to Braganza, and having joined the malcontents, assumed the title of king. But the constable marching with all his forces on one side, and the king assembling an army at Porto on the other, Don Denis was advised by his friends to lay aside the royal title, and to withdraw with as much privacy as possible into Castile. This did not put an end to the war, which was very injurious to the subjects of both crowns by land and sea, without turning in any degree to the benefit of either. This made both princes willing to listen to a negotiation; plenipotentiaries were appointed on both sides, and though they separated without coming to any conclusion, yet they met again soon after, and agreed upon a truce for ten years, on very equal terms. The king of Castile dying not long after, Donna Catalina, the English queen, having the tuition of her son Don Juan the second, caused the truce to be converted into a peace; and soon after demanded assistance of the king of Portugal against the Moors, which he not only granted but offered, as her son was under age, to command the army of Castile in person, which the queen's council, however, advised her to decline, on a narrow principle of jealousy.

By the late treaty with, and by this obliging behaviour towards the crown of Castile, a great check was given to those animosities that had so long disturbed both nations, and the king was

John governed his dominions in peace. left at leisure to prosecute his political views for the good of his subjects. As he had been once a private man, and never had any degree of pride, he preserved, which was very wonderful, the same familiarity with all persons of condition that he had been accustomed to in his youth. His nobility dined at his table; he frequently made visits; and, when he granted an audience, commonly attended the person with whom he had been speaking to the door of his apartment. His maxim was, that a prince without coin must pay in civility. But he did not say or do this from a principal of avarice; on the contrary, his generosity made him poor. But with all this condescension he was very much a king, strict upon proper occasions, and inflexible when he found this strictness necessary. He observed that many of the nobility had bravos about their persons, men recommended by the wicked actions they had done, encouraged and subsisted to do more. He made an edict against this, and he took care that it should be executed so punctually, that these sort of people were rooted out. He suffered no office to be sold of any kind, nor would prefer from any other motive than merit. He moderated the imposts as soon as it was in his power; was a true friend to industry, and encouraged his subjects to pursue it from his own example. His old friends were always welcome to him; and before he did any thing of importance he was wont to say, we must know the constable's mind upon this. When his revenues increased, he indemnified those from whom he had taken grants; and his inclination to justice was so well known, that those who suffered imputed it to his necessity and not to his will. He did not affect amusements or spectacles, but was wont to say, that conversation was of all diversions the cheapest, and improved the most^b. He introduced, by his own example, the love of letters, and a true taste amongst his courtiers.

Death of queen Philippa, and great regret of her subjects for their loss. The king had more than once shewn an inclination to confer the honour of knighthood upon his sons; but the young princes made a scruple of accepting that honour in a time of full peace; and the king, with much more reason, made a scruple of entering into a war, merely to make knights. At length, however, he ordered military preparations by land and sea, which alarmed all his neighbours. He confided his secret to none but the prince against whom these preparations were pretended to be made, and this was the count of Flanders, who he gave out had injured his subjects in their trade, and on whose dominions he proposed to make a descent. The count being previously informed that his real intention was against the Moors in Africa, took the proper measures on his side to keep up the farce. At length, every thing being ready for the intended expedition, in which the king proposed to command in person, he appointed the grand-master of the order of Christ viceroy in his absence; and then communicated the whole scheme and intention of his voyage to the queen, to whom before he would never reveal the secret^c. She pressed him earnestly to lay aside the thoughts of going himself, and would certainly have prevailed, if the princes had not as earnestly laboured to keep him to his first resolution. The apprehension of his absence, however, affected the queen so much, that she fell suddenly ill, and her malady proved so violent, that in a few days she died, to the extreme regret of the king, and of the whole court^d.

A. D. 1414.

Don John's glorious expedition into Barbary, and reduction of the fortress of Ceuta. THE fleet assembled for this enterprize consisted of fifty-nine galleys, thirty three tall ships of war, and one hundred and twenty transports, carrying in the whole fifty thousand soldiers and seamen. The rendezvous was appointed in Lagos bay, where the bull of Croisade was published, and from thence the king passed through the Streight, steering directly for the port of Ceuta. On the 14th of August they discovered the place, and on the 21st they began to debark the troops, with the infants Don Henry and Don Pedro at their head^e. The Moorish governor, Sala Bensala, had made very great preparations for the siege, which he had long feared, and had brought a considerable number of auxiliaries into the place; but as there happened a great storm while the Christian fleet was at sea, those auxiliaries would stay no longer. The attack was presently made, and with great fury, in which the infants Edward, Henry, and Pedro, had an equal share of danger and of honour; and at length, with some effusion of blood, the town was taken, and the enemy retired into the castle^f. The king caused that fortress also to be attacked, and Sala perceiving that he had no relief to expect, after having stood one assault, retired in the night and left the Portuguese masters of the place^g. The king having caused the fortifications to be repaired, and the mosque to be purified, left a good garrison under the command of Don Pedro de Meneses, count of Alcontin; and having reimbarcked the rest of his troops on the second of September, returned safely into Portugal; and having reviewed his army at Tavira, and rewarded the several persons who had distinguished themselves in his service, he declared the infant Don Henry duke of Viseo; and gave the title of duke of Coimbra to the infant Don

^a Pedro^b. This year he abolished the æra of *Augustus*ⁱ, which had been before abolished in Arragon in 1350, and in Castile in 1383. The princes of Barbary immediately formed a league for the recovery of Ceuta, which obliged the king of Portugal to send back the infants Don Henry and Don Pedro with a considerable force, who found greater difficulty in relieving than they had done in acquiring the place, which at length, however, they accomplished, after defeating the infidels both by land and sea; which success of theirs proved fatal to Abu-fade, king of Fez, upon whom the Moors had laid the blame of this loss; in resentment of which, his subjects conspired against and murdered him; upon which so great troubles ensued, that they had no king for eight years^k. But by what right, unless there subsisted a continual war with the Moors in Barbary, this conquest was made, does not at all appear.

^b AFTER all the reputation resulting from the success of the king's arms in Africa, some of his ministers, for he allowed every man to speak his mind freely, made it a question in his council, whether it was for the king's advantage to keep this new conquest, or whether all the benefits proposed from it might not be obtained by demolishing the city and fortrefs, and the great expence saved which a garrison constantly kept there would necessarily require; besides the much larger disbursements that would from time to time become necessary for the embarkation of armies as often as the Moors were disposed, and found themselves strong enough to besiege it. On the other hand, it was urged, that the keeping of Ceuta was of common benefit to all Spain, as it divided the Moors from the Moors, and facilitated the reduction of the kingdom of Granada. It was alleged, that the Moors, as infidels, and aggressors in the conquest of Spain, were to be considered as hereditary and perpetual enemies, against whose descents and incursions, as well as piracies by sea, it was absolutely necessary to take the best precautions possible, than which there was none comparable to the keeping the castle, town, and port of Ceuta. It was added in reference to the great charge it entailed upon the kingdom, that it might be lessened by various means; that the Pope would undoubtedly oblige the clergy to contribute to it; that the garrison might serve as a kind of school for the military orders, and in consequence of that subsist in some measure at their expence; and that very probably if the king enlarged his conquest on that side, he might find means to draw a considerable part of their subsistence from the inhabitants of the conquered country. King John, having thoroughly weighed the arguments offered on both sides, determined to keep Ceuta; and thereupon gave orders for enlarging and augmenting the fortifications, as well as for forming an intrenched camp under them. He augmented his forces there to six thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; which he judged sufficient to deprive the Moors of all hopes of recovering it, or at least capable of repelling their attempts, if, contrary to his expectation, they should endeavour it. He likewise addressed himself to the Pope for the assistance proposed, and procured from him all that he demanded^l. By this means he struck a great terror into the infidels, which lasted all his reign.

A. D. 1419.

It often happens in other countries, and it more than once happened in this, that princes grown to men's estate become impatient in obeying, and from a too high estimation of their own abilities, through false ambition, or excited by pernicious counsels from others, disturbed the government they were bound by nature, as well as duty and interest to support. In all other things fortunate, king John was most fortunate in this. He had many sons, whom he saw men, men of parts and men of action; but men who had no emulation, save that of shewing their affection to his person, which they manifested by employing all their abilities in the support of his administration. This was in a great measure due to the care he had taken in their education, and the pains with which he himself had instructed them in solid and useful knowledge. Henry, duke of Viseo, had the direction of affairs in Africa, and his father procured him the best appointments in his power; these he employed as if they were only intrusted with him for the public advantage. He it was, as we have shewn in another place, that set on foot those discoveries which proved so beneficial afterwards, not to Portugal only, but to all Europe. The first fruits of them was the settling and possessing the island of Madeira, which very soon yielded a considerable revenue. He it was, who taking notice of a small but secure post in the kingdom of Algarve, about a league and a half distant from Cape Vincent, caused a town to be erected there, which is allowed to be the best laid out and fortified of any in Portugal. This is called Sagrez; and some think we may trace therein somewhat of the ancient name of the Cape, which was called in Latin Promontorium Sacrum. It was here that he erected his magazines, built and laid up his ships that were continually employed in useful enterprizes^m. But this spirit of improvement in the king and his sons, though it laid the foundation of future emoluments, produced for the present a great want of money. In this case the king had again recourse to the clergy, and desired their consent to coin the church-plate. These men, who had disturbed almost every other reign, had the good sense in his to be as tractable as any of his subjects. They owned there was nothing more reasonable than that a prince who had exhausted his own coffers in a war against the infidels, should be supported out of the treasures of the church. They gave a farther instance of their good temper: the Pope had been informed, that the king, like some of his predecessors, had brought ecclesiastics before lay tribunals, and had in other respects invaded what is stiled the immunities of the church. Upon this he directed some prelates to enquire into the king's conduct in this respect; insinuating, that he would proceed very rigorously if he saw cause. But those prelates reported that there was none. They knew the king's intentions were good: they saw that justice was strictly and impartially administered amongst all ranks of people; and they were afraid of seeing a scandalous clergy in a well-ordered kingdom, which induced them to act as they did; for which the king made them very grateful returns^a. In this respect king John had visibly the advantage of all his predecessors, who found it much easier to deal with the Moors than with their clergy.

He takes no advantages of the factions or disturbances in the kingdom of Castile.

As during his long reign there happened many turns and great distractions in Castile, as we have shewn in their proper place, he might, if he had been an unjust and ambitious prince, have fomented their disturbances, and have drawn their malcontents to depend upon him. But he meddled no farther in these matters than was necessary to preserve the quiet of his own dominions; and if he gave shelter at any time to the discontented nobility, he gave them at the same time honest advice, and interposed his good offices to prevent things from coming to extremities. He interposed to prevent a war between the crown of Castile on one side and those of Arragon and Navarre on the other. The latter offered to leave all disputes to his arbitration, and afterwards clapped up a peace without his knowlege, which he resented. The king of Castile thereupon sent an ambassy to him to complain of his supporting the infants, who were inclined to disturb the peace of his kingdom. King John answered, it was true that he had given shelter to those princes, because they were princes: but he immediately published a proclamation, forbidding any of his subjects taking any share in their quarrels; by which the king of Castile was thoroughly satisfied of the rectitude of his intentions, and expressed that satisfaction in the clearest terms and in the most public manner; which was one of the last remarkable transactions in his reign, and which at the same time did him no small honour^c.

Death of king John, which is entirely regretted by all ranks of his subjects.

A. D. 1428.

THE king's last cares were about the settlement of his family: he married prince Edward, the heir apparent of his dominions, to the infanta Leonora, the daughter of Don Ferdinand of Arragon, with whom he received two hundred thousand florins of gold, which in those days was an immense sum^d. This marriage was negotiated by Don Pedro de Norogna, archbishop of Lisbon, and was highly acceptable to his subjects. The next year he gave his daughter Donna Isabella to Philip the second, duke of Burgundy, surnamed the Good; and it was at the solemnity of this marriage that that prince instituted the famous order of the Golden Fleece^e. The infant Don Pedro had before married Donna Isabella of Arragon, daughter of the count of Urgel. His younger brother, the infant Don Juan, espoused Donna Isabella, of Portugal, the daughter of his natural brother Don Alonso, by the heiress of the constable^f. The death of that great man Nugno Alvarez de Pereyra, after he had led a life of retirement and devotion for nine years, proved a great affliction to the king, and a prologue to his own^g. He was very sensible of his declining state, though he took care to hide it as much as possible, that he might not alarm either his subjects or his family. When he was seized with his last illness, he sent for the prince, and admonished him to be careful of religion, justice, and the morals of his people. He then sent for the rest of his children, and exhorted them to unanimity, testified great piety and resignation in his last moments, and submitted to fate on the eleventh of August, 1433, in the seventy-sixth year of his age^h, and in the forty-eighth of his reign, extremely regretted by his subjects and by his children; but they were not able to give immediately such marks of this, as they would otherwise have done in his funeral, because the plague raged at Lisbon; and it seems probable that himself and his queen Philippa both died of that distemper.

a He gave for his device, a rock in the midst of the sea, and a hand from the clouds thrusting a sword into it, with these words, Acut ut penetret, i. e. "Sharpened that it may pierce". By which he intended to intimate, the being in continual action was the only way to be ready to seize an opportunity, or to avert a danger. His conduct was a good commentary upon it; for no prince applied himself more assiduously than he through his whole reign, none struggled through greater difficulties with more honour, and none knew better how to accommodate himself to all situations, how to chuse the properest methods for accomplishing his ends, or how by a dextrous management of circumstances to divert mischiefs (B). He was unquestionably one of the most fortunate princes that ever reigned in Portugal, or perhaps in any other country; he established himself firmly upon the throne, though he had but a very dubious title: he outlived all his competitors, and by that means secured the possession of it to his posterity: he allied his family so wisely by marriage, that he rendered it the interest of almost every crowned head in Europe to assist and protect him. His virtues were scarce of greater utility than what seemed to be weaknesses in him: for his liberality, which some thought to be profusion, by dispersing the crown lands into a great number of families, attached four-fifths of the nation to his succession, since, by supporting that, they secured the titles of their own estates. He is indeed said to have devised, on his death-bed, a method of eluding those grants; but that seems rather to have been the work of his chancellor Regras, which was more worthy of a lawyer than a king.

c Don Edward, the eldest son of the deceased king, was immediately proclaimed his successor, and complimented as such by the princes of the blood, and the nobility then at court. It is reported, that a Jew physician very earnestly dissuaded the king from accepting the homage of his subjects that day, because he knew, as he said, from his skill in astrology, that the stars were not favourable. Edward, who was near forty-two years of age, a prince of great good sense, and exemplary piety, despised this prohibition as became him; to which the populace then, and some historians since, have foolishly enough ascribed his misfortunes, as if it was consistent with the wisdom of our great Creator to punish a prince for trusting in his mercy and goodness, rather than in the vain conjectures of a positive and assuming man. He went afterwards to Cintra, to spend some time there in rural diversions, in order to amuse his melancholy, or, as others say, he only gave this out, being obliged to fly thither from the plague. About the time of the anniversary of his father's death, he resolved to cause his body to be removed to a monastery of his own erecting, where it was to be interred. There was never any ceremony of this kind executed with greater pomp in Portugal. The journey was divided into five stages, and at each of them the corpse was received by one of the infants, attended by a large body of the nobility and gentry, and there was scarce a person of distinction in Portugal absent when the body was interred. Such was the duty of his children, and such the affection of his subjects to king John.

Edward succeeds his father, and is proclaimed king of Portugal at Lisbon.

A. D. 1434.

As soon as these last honours were paid to the memory of that great prince, king Edward went to Leyria, and from thence to Santaren, where he held an assembly of the states,

(B) This great prince, whom the Portuguese historians consider as the founder of a new family, had a very pleasing aspect, and was very handsome in his person, of which, however, we have no particular description. His helmet and his battle-ax are still preserved, which shew that he was of a very large size, and of a prodigious strength (6). In dress and in diet he was very plain, loved mirth and freedom at his meals, and was naturally of a lively cheerful disposition, yet not given to any kind of excess. Besides the famous monastery of Batalha, he built the convents of Penalonga and Carnota, and the churches of St. Francis at Leyria, and of our lady of Oliveira at Guimaraes, which were all very magnificent structures. He likewise built the palaces at Lisbon, Santaren, Cintra, and Almerin; which were spacious and magnificent (7). He reduced the ten bezants in each of the five escutcheons of the arms of Portugal to five, and annexed the cross of the order of Avis to the bottom, to shew that he had been once grand-master of it (8). He had great connections with England during his whole reign: hence it was that he gave the name of Edward to his son, in honour of Edward the third. The Portuguese historians say, that he was one of the knights companions of the order of the garter; and though this does not appear in any of our lists, yet it is very likely to be true, because those lists, more especially in the reign of Richard the second, are very imperfect (9), and because the Portuguese writers mention some very clear and positive proofs of it; such as his giving for his crest the dragon's head, and his introducing amongst his troops the English cry of war, St. George, St. George (1). In his last illness he was, by the advice of his physicians, removed to Alcouchete, for the sake of the air; but finding this had no effect, he would be carried back to Lisbon, that he might die in the city where he was born (2); careful it seems to the very last of turning every event to some purpose, and of letting no opportunity slip of obliging and captivating the minds of his people: a science in which he certainly excelled, and gained as much by it as any man ever did.

the infant Don Henry to save

in which he produced a code of laws, collected and digested under proper heads by his own order, that there might be but one rule of right through the whole kingdom; whereas, under pretence of their ancient customs, the law had almost been different in every one of the provinces. He also proposed another law for suppressing luxury in dress and in diet, which, it seems, was become highly necessary; and the king promised that himself and the nobility should have a strict eye to its execution, by which, as he explained it, he meant no more than that they would pay an exact obedience to it; for it was his maxim, that whatever was amiss in the morals of the people, either proceeded from the example of the great, or might be easily corrected by it^a. His brother, the infant Don Henry, being taken prisoner with the king of Arragon in Italy, by the duke of Milan, occasioned a general consternation; but it did not last long, as they were very soon informed that he had recovered his liberty^b. The king, being desirous of signaling his reign, by extending his conquests in Africa, cast his eyes upon Tangier, or rather had it pointed out to him. His council agreed that it was a place of consequence, the reduction of which would add lustre to his arms, though they could not agree about the properest manner of reducing it. The infant Don Juan, grand-master of the order of St. James, gave it as his opinion, that if the king made an expedition on that side, it should be with a numerous fleet, and a strong army, since otherwise his own, and the reputation of the crown might receive a check not easy to be recovered. But the infant Don Ferdinand, grand-master of Avis, treated the affair in another manner, magnified the military skill and courage of the Portuguese; and put the king in mind of the ease with which his father had made himself master of Ceuta. The king, whose coffers were not very full, listened to this advice, notwithstanding all that Don Juan could say; so that the army was fixed at fourteen thousand men, with a proportionable fleet: and this resolution taken, the conquest of Tangier was looked upon as a thing in a manner accomplished^c; but this was only amongst the young nobility at court.

THE army for this expedition being assembled, and the fleet for their embarkation being prepared, the infants Henry and Ferdinand embarked on the twenty-second of August, and arrived after a favourable navigation at Ceuta. When they came to review their forces, they discovered, to their great astonishment, that, instead of fourteen thousand, they had scarce seven thousand men; which was chiefly owing to the precise orders for embarking, and the distaste that many took to this expedition, upon hearing that Don Juan's reasons were rejected^d. Some of the principal officers gave it as their opinion, that the fleet ought to be sent back for a supply of troops before they undertook any thing: but the infants, esteeming it equally hazardous to allow the enemy so much time to repair, or to undertake any thing with so small a force, resolved at last to proceed; and accordingly the infant Don Henry marched with the best part of the forces by land, and Don Ferdinand with the rest proceeded by sea for Tangier, the siege of which they began on the fifteenth of September. The Moors were extremely alarmed at this attempt, and immediately set on foot a general confederacy for the preservation of the place; but that they should be able to bring into the field, as some writers mention, an army of six hundred thousand foot, and fourscore thousand horse, the reader will certainly think with us, is altogether incredible. It is, however, certain, that the king of Fez, at the head of a numerous army, marched to the relief of Tangier, and, before the siege was far advanced, attacked the besiegers in their trenches. It is true they made a gallant defence, and the Moors were repulsed; but notwithstanding this, they made a proper use of their superiority by investing the besiegers, who finding themselves shut up between the fortress and the army, were constrained to send some of the principal persons amongst them to capitulate with the king of Fez; and to offer him the restitution of Ceuta, if he would permit the remains of the army to embark for Portugal. The king readily listened to this proposition, and offered to give them hostages for the due performance of the articles; but he demanded in return, that one of the infants should remain as a hostage for the restoring of Ceuta: upon which Don Ferdinand readily offered himself, which was accepted; and Don Henry, and as many of the Portuguese as were left, embarked on board the fleet, and returned to Ceuta^e. There he fell sick, but sent the fleet back to Portugal; which meeting with a great storm in its passage, several vessels were wrecked on the coasts of Andalusia, where the people were received and relieved by the subjects of the king of Castile, not only with great kindness and humanity, but with such cheerful generosity, as is very honourably recorded, and very highly commended by the Portuguese historians^f.

It seems that after the departure of the fleet the king either suspected, or was informed, that the force sent to Barbary was inferior to what had been proposed; he therefore equipped with all imaginable diligence a strong squadron, with a considerable body of fresh troops on board, a commanded by his brother the infant Don Juan; which arrived safely in the harbour of Ceuta. The sight of this squadron and these troops contributed not a little to the recovery of the infant Don Henry; who having changed the garrison, augmented the fortifications, and filled the magazines of the place, directed his brother to return with the invalids, and such as had been able to recover the garrison since their misfortune at Tangier, which he did; but the king was still dissatisfied, and therefore sent a positive order to the infant Don Henry to return likewise; but it was because he could not avoid it. However, he would not go to Lisbon, but retired to his own town of Sagrez, in Algarve^b; being so much ashamed of his defeat, that he declared he was unwilling to look the king in the face. But it may be, indeed it is highly probable, there were other reasons. It was given out, that the infidels had broke their capitulation by attacking the infant on his march to the ships; by which it was pretended they had forfeited their right to Ceuta; and it is not at all unlikely the infant Don Henry did not care to declare any thing to this purpose himself^c. In all other respects his conduct was irreproachable.

THE king held a great council to decide this delicate question, Whether they should part with the noblest monument of their father's glory, or sacrifice the infant Don Ferdinand, the son and brother of their kings? One would have imagined, that, even a meaner victim would not have been offered, since in reality a hostage is rather the witness of a contract than an equivalent for the execution of it; since, if it was otherwise, no man would become, no nation would accept an hostage. The council of Portugal determined otherwise, after having had the advice, as it is said, of the Pope; but it was agreed, the intercession of many princes should be used, and large sums of money offered for the ransom of Don Ferdinand; and in case the infidels continued to withhold him, then the Pope was to publish a crusade for his deliverance. In short, his liberty was to be procured in any way except by the restitution of Ceuta. The kings of Castile and Granada interposed warmly and sincerely; but without effect. The Moors would never part with the prince, whom they had received as a pledge of the faith of Christians, and whom they retained as a proof how well it had been kept^d. He supported his captivity with the most heroic courage, which gained him the esteem and admiration of the Moors, amongst whom he remained to his death. He is considered for this reason as a saint and a martyr in Portugal; and his example is commemorated on the fifth of June^e. How much soever he may deserve on the score of his patience and sufferings for other people's faults, there is surely very little excuse to be made for those who advised, or rather compelled the king to abandon him, and to break faith, and give up a brother, rather than part with a fortress to the infidels, which had been taken from them by the valour of the Portuguese, and by their valour no doubt might have been recovered again at a more proper time.

As the misfortunes attending this unlucky expedition increased the miseries of the kingdom, which were already but too great, and as the royal revenue had never recovered, notwithstanding the edict of the late king, the repeated blows given it by his liberality, Edward found himself under a necessity of taking some strong step or other to restore his finances. Under this dilemma he applied himself to the chancellor Regras, his father's counsellor, and who was deservedly famous for his inexhaustible fund of expedients. He did not deceive his confidence upon this occasion; but suggested to him a method which answered very effectually in Portugal, though it may be very justly doubted whether it would have done so any where else. He engaged the king to declare, that, in a conversation he had with his father upon his death-bed, that monarch informed him his real intention in all his grants was, that lands should descend from father to son as a reward for past, and an encouragement to future services; but that the crown-lands should by no means descend to females. By this scheme a plain way was opened for all the royal domain, that had been alienated, to revert to the crown: a thing just and reasonable in itself, and to which the people submitted without murmuring; though, besides the many inconveniencies that attended it, and the heavy losses sustained by individuals, there was a precedent introduced big with consequences beyond the power of the human understanding to conceive. It is remarkable that the chancellor Regras himself, whose estate was derived from the bounty of his master, had only daughters, but the king granted him a dispensation, which, though very honourable in him, yet whether it was so in the chancellor we leave it to the reader to determine. To accelerate as much as possible the filling of his treasury, the king reduced his expences within a very narrow compass; and the people, moved by his example, and being persuaded of the uprightness of his intentions, submitted patiently to a resumption which nothing but necessity could justify^f. Their moderation was attended with good effects.

Unexpected and deplorable
death of king Edward, of the plague.

A.D. 1438.

In the mean time vast preparations were making by land and sea for carrying on the war ^a against the Moors, in consequence of the Pope's bulls, and of the spirit the whole nation expressed to leave no means untried for obtaining the liberty of the infant Don Ferdinand. But when things were very far advanced, and when the proper measures had been taken for assembling a numerous fleet and a potent army, Providence interposed, and overturned the whole, by a blow so much the more afflicting as it was altogether unexpected. The plague still continued at Lisbon and in the country adjacent. The king, to avoid the infection, retired into Estremadura, and fixed his residence for a short time at Tomar; where, upon opening a letter, he was suddenly seized with a distemper, and expired the ninth of September, one thousand four hundred thirty-eight, in the forty-seventh year of his age, and when he had ^b reigned five years and almost a month (C). He is allowed by the Portuguese writers to have been a religious, prudent, and learned prince. He spoke the Latin tongue fluently, and wrote it elegantly. He wrote several books, and particularly two, one entitled the Good Counsellor, which he dedicated to his queen, and which consisted of moral and political reflections; the other on the art of breaking and managing horses, which he is said to have understood beyond any man of his time ^m. By his will he appointed the queen Donna Leonora regent during the minority of the prince his son; and directed by his will that the money he had saved might be applied to the ransom of his brother; and that if his liberty could not that way be obtained, then Ceuta should be restored to the Moors, which he affirmed to have been always his own desire and intention ⁿ. He gave for his device a spear invested with a serpent, with these words, Loco et tempore, i. e. In fit place and time ^o; by which he ^c seems to have meant that war was not to be undertaken at random, but after mature deliberation, in which all circumstances ought to be well considered. His death was deeply and justly regretted by his subjects, as it happened at a very critical conjuncture, dissipated all thoughts of prosecuting the war, and left a child upon the throne, under the tuition of a mother, who quickly found that the title of queen could not exempt her from the cares and misfortunes incident to human life, and more especially to those who move in its higher spheres.

(C) The person of king Edward was altogether graceful and majestic; he was of a middle size, well-shaped, round faced, his hair black, his eyes dull, and his beard thin. He was remarkably strong and active; the very best horseman of his time, could take a nut from the ground on full speed, and parry a javelin or a spear without shield or weapon by the adroit motion of his body (1). We have mentioned his contempt of the Jew astrologer's prediction at the entrance of his reign, which is highly commended by Mariana, as a noble instance of religious fortitude; and he farther observes, that the event justified the king's prudence, as the whole course of his reign was prosperous (2). The French translator takes from hence occasion to exclaim against judicial astrology as a vain and foolish art (3). The Portuguese historians are, some of them at least, of another opinion; they say, the Jew declared the king's reign would be but short in point of time, but that it would appear long from the miseries attending it, and intimate that it did so (4). We see from hence, that an appeal to facts is not always decisive; and as to the Jew's prediction, it was no more than a guess, in which he had an even chance, whether he should be right or wrong; and indeed something more, since no two historians have agreed in their sentiments of this reign. After all, guessing is not science, and if the principles of an art are not capable of demonstration, as those of astrology are not, it has no pretence to that title; and the king's conduct was truly commendable, whatever the character of his reign may be (5). The death of John king of Portugal was commemorated in England, as a knight of the garter, and his son Ed- ward elected in his stead; and an order was made on the eighth of May, 1435, for garter king at arms to carry him the ensigns of that order, which was not executed, however, till the year following (6). This was in the minority of Henry the sixth, who was one degree farther distant than king Edward from their common ancestor John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster. However authors differ as to the representation of king Edward's reign, they all agree in speaking of him as one of the wisest and worthiest monarchs of that age. He loved splendor and magnificence, but he confined this to proper occasions. He was sincerely pious without bigotry, and the most eloquent man in his dominions. If he had reigned longer, he would have done more; but in the few years he did reign he was the author of great good to Portugal, for he reduced the laws within compass, and brought them into order. He made a thorough regulation of the coin by fixing both the standard and the species. He did the like with regard to the revenue, so that the ordinary income exceeded considerably the expence; and he drew, by his favour and liberalities, some of the most eminent persons in Europe for knowledge to Lisbon (7). The Portuguese historians fix his death to the ninth of September; but then they say, that it was thought to be predicted by an eclipse (8). At this time of day we are abundantly satisfied that notion was groundless; but Mariana has well observed, this circumstance plainly proves he did not die on the ninth, but on the nineteenth of September, and this is clearly confirmed by the records of the order of the garter, which fix it to that day (9).

As much as the queen appeared to have been the darling of the people during the life-time of her husband, yet he was scarce interred before they conceived and published a disgust, to which they were encouraged by the infant Don Juan. All they had to allege was what the queen knew too well, and what it was not in her power to help, that she was a stranger and a woman. They added also, that she was a Castilian: which was in one sense true, for she was a princess of that royal family. In this situation it was requisite for her to look round for support; and there appeared none from whom she could so naturally demand it as the infant Don Pedro, Duke of Coimbra, a prince of great abilities and unblemished reputation (D). To bind him the closer to her interest she told him, that the late king, his brother, had left a note in the hands of his confessor, by which he directed that his son and successor, Don Alonso the fifth, should espouse the daughter of that prince. Don Pedro expressed in the strongest terms his respect for his brother's memory, and his attachment to her service^p. Her affairs rendering it absolutely necessary, an assembly of the states was called at Torres Novas, where, contrary to the queen's expectations, they intrusted her only with the education of the king her son, appointed Don Pedro to have the direction of all military concerns, the marquis de Villa-viciosa president of justice, and the count de Atouguia governor to the king^q. The queen was extremely offended with this, and entered into cabals through the arch-bishop of Lisbon, who was her minister, with Don Alonso count of Barcelos, natural son to king John, and the infant Don Juan, that king's lawful son, who had married the count's daughter, the first who disturbed her administration, and who now sought to be reconciled to her, in hopes of marrying the king to his daughter. The states, desirous of cutting these factions up by the roots, declared Don Pedro regent, and made other necessary regulations^r. The queen, however, took no notice of these; but bestowed places, and directed all things as if she had been sovereign in her own right; in which Don Pedro gave her no disturbance, and only desired she would give him the paper she had mentioned, and the queen did so: with which when her new allies were acquainted, they insisted she should take it from him. Upon this the count de Ourem, son to the count de Barcelos, went to Don Pedro, and desired to see it. The infant very calmly took it out of his cabinet, tore it, and put the pieces into his hands^s. As they believed themselves now entirely safe from him, they put so many slights upon him daily, that he retired from court. The people obliged him to return; and though the king of Arragon sent an ambassador to support the queen, she was obliged to deliver up her children to the regent, of whom she took leave by saying, that

(D) This Don Pedro of Portugal was the fourth child, and second surviving son of king John, and was born March the fourth, 1394 (1). His father gave him an excellent education, which, joined to strong natural abilities and much application, rendered him one of the most accomplished princes of his time. He was not only very learned himself, but a great lover of learning, and a great patron of learned men. It was chiefly with a view to improve his knowledge, that he spent four years in travelling through different countries in Europe, Asia, and Africa, with a train suitable to his quality; of which travels there is a relation still extant, but so loaded with fabulous circumstances, that it wounds the reputation it was designed to raise (2). At his return he espoused Isabella, daughter to the count of Urgel, and grand-daughter to Don Pedro the fourth, king of Portugal, which was esteemed a very great advancement of his fortune (3). He was elected into the most noble order of the garter April the twenty-second, 1417, in the fifth year of the reign of his cousin Henry the fifth, grand-son of John of Gaunt, by the father's side, as our duke of Coimbra was by the mother. He was installed the year following; and when the ensigns of the order were sent to his brother king Edward, a rich surcoat was likewise sent to him (4). In the assembly of the states, held soon after the unfortunate defeat at Tangier, the infants Don Pedro and Don Juan declared clearly and loudly, that Ceuta ought to be given up, rather than their brother Don Ferdinand made a victim, with which the commons were so moved that they concurred with them; and if the arch-bishop of Braga had not made it a point of religion to preserve a fortress rather than the life of any single man, it had been carried (5). It is affirmed by some writers, that Don Pedro was very ambitious, which, however, the best authorities deny; and indeed the actions of the better part of his life seem to contradict it. He took but one officious step after his brother's death, and that was in swearing himself, and obliging the nobility to swear homage to the infant Don Ferdinand, in case his brother Don Alonso should die without issue. At the time it was done, this was thought to be a very disinterested action; the queen herself thought so, and obliged him against his will to subscribe the summons for the first assembly of the states (6). His brethren, Henry and John, prevailed upon him to become regent, from which time we treat of his actions in the history. His real character is to be taken from thence, and from the Spanish and French historians, who, as strangers, are like to be most impartial (7). One thing was very remarkable in his conduct from the beginning; he was ever diffident of his security, and was kept in his post of regent in a manner by force, which, tho' for a time considered as a strain of policy, yet was at length regarded in a very different light.

she was now completely a widow, without husband and without children. After saying this ^a she retired to Alenquer, full of resentment¹, and of projects for executing revenge.

Don Pedro governs the kingdom with the title of regent, and with great reputation.

THE administration of Don Pedro was so mild and so just, that the magistrates and people of Lisbon concurred in demanding his leave to erect a statue to him. The regent thanked them, said he should be unwilling to see a work of theirs demolished, and that he was sufficiently rewarded by this public testimony of their affections. The queen having desired that her daughter might come to her at Alenquer, retired from thence into the estates of the prior of Crato, and by his assistance raised an insurrection. The regent marched immediately to suppress it: upon which the queen retired into Castile, and the prior submitted². The count de Barcelos seized Guimaraez, and fortified it: upon which the regent marched against him, having his son the count de Ourem in the army. When he arrived before the place, ^b the count de Barcelos sent him a message, that he would do well not to expose the king's troops, for that he was determined to live and die the queen's faithful servant, and had those with him, who would behave gallantly in so good a cause. The count of Ourem desired the regent's leave to go and speak to his father. "If he is your father, said the regent, he ^c is also my brother, go and behave like a nephew and a son." The two counts understood one another very well: the matter was soon settled between them, and the count of Barcelos submitted³. About this time the infant Don Ferdinand died in his captivity; and ^d his chaplain who was the companion, wrote also the history, of his imprisonment.

A. D. 1443.

Deplorable death of Donna Leonora, queen dowager of Portugal, in Castile.

THE regent, having obtained the Pope's dispensation, called an assembly of the states, and ^e with their consent contracted the king to his daughter⁴. The queen Donna Leonora had engaged the king of Castile to send two ambassies to demand she should be restored to the regency. Don Pedro answered, that it was not in his power, but that he had all the respect and veneration for the queen imaginable; that he even doubted whether her return into Portugal would be at all for her interest, but that he would take care to pay her regularly her dowry⁵. This poor princess, breathing nothing but vengeance, laboured to persuade the king of Castile to declare war against Portugal, assuring him it would throw that kingdom into the utmost confusion; and in order to prevent expence from being any bar to this project, she and those who retired with her, gave him all the money, jewels, and effects they had brought with them, which he very readily received, without making the return that she expected⁶. ^d In this dismal and distressed condition, without means of supporting herself in the manner she had hitherto done, she at length took a short turn, and wrote to the regent, giving him a plain and sincere account of the measures she had pursued, and of the circumstances to which she was reduced, beseeching him to let her come and live in Portugal, in any manner he judged expedient, and bitterly bewailing that she had been the dupe of those who envied the just credit of so great and good a man. But before the regent had time to express what his compassion would have naturally dictated, death, assisted as is supposed by Don Alvaro de Luna, put a period to the poor queen's troubles; for that ambitious minister perceiving that Donna Maria, queen of Castile, and this princess, had great influence over the king, and were by no means disposed to be his creatures, judged it proper to remove them out of the way, that ^e he might have no competitors in his master's favour⁷. The regent having obtained a bull from the Pope, which confirmed the separation of the orders of St. James and Avis from the order of Calatrava in Castile, published it, to the great satisfaction of the Portuguese nation⁸.

The constable of Portugal sent with a body of troops into Castile.

THE steadiness of the regent's administration, the attachment of the best part of the nobility to him, and his enjoying, in so absolute a degree, the confidence of the people, not only secured the interior tranquillity of the state, but raised the credit likewise of the crown of Portugal to a very great height in the sentiments of its neighbours. This appeared by the king of Castile's demanding succours, which were sent under the command of the constable of Portugal, Don Pedro, son to the regent, whom his father had raised to that employment⁹, upon the death of his brother, the infant Don John. These succours, though they did not arrive till the war was over in which they were to have been employed, were received with all possible testimonies of kindness and respect; more especially by the all-powerful favourite Don Alvaro de Luna, who concluded with Don Pedro, in his master's name, a marriage between him and Donna Isabella, daughter to the infant Don Juan of Portugal, with whom he had always a private correspondence¹⁰. He did this, however, not only without the consent, but without so much as consulting his master, whose inclinations carried him another way, and who, though he had not spirit enough to refuse this wife from his minister's hands, a resolved notwithstanding to take his life for this act of presumption : what is more extraordinary, this queen concurred in the measure ; and not only excited the king to execute, but also contrived the manner of carrying it into execution ^f. Upon the report of this marriage by the constable to his father on his return, it was confirmed, though not celebrated till after the king came to age ; as it was on all hands allowed, that this alliance might be very beneficial to Portugal, and prove an effectual means of burying in oblivion the old sources of disputes and discontents that had subsisted between the two nations, and produced a radicated aversion between them, which was equally fatal to both : but experience shewed that, though specious, this reasoning was far enough from being conclusive.

b In the course of his regency the duke of Coimbra had made it his continual study to pursue the public good ; to ease the people in general, and the inhabitants of Lisbon in particular, of several grievous impositions ; to maintain the laws in their full vigour ; to give the king an excellent education ; and, if that had been at all practicable, to diffuse a perfect unanimity through the court, by assuaging the malice and envy of his enemies. Upon his first reconciliation with his brother Don Alonso, count of Barcelos, he consented, that the archbishop of Lisbon should have leave to return into the kingdom, who had fled to Rome, on account of the share he had in the first disturbances, and who had been pursued thither by the clamours of the people against his morals, which it seems were not very edifying ^g. On the death of Don Gonsalves, lord of Bragança, he procured it, with the title of duke, for his brother Don Alonso, as a mark of the sincerity of their reconciliation on his side ^h. But the new duke considered it rather as a mark of his absolute authority, and hated him heartily, not for the sake of the gift, for that was very acceptable, but for having the power to give ; which, with the advice of the archbishop, and of his own son the count de Ourem, who, under the specious pretence of the warmest friend, was the most determined foe the regent had, he resolved to wrest out of his hand, as soon as a favourable opportunity offered ; and for this purpose began to cabal with some of the young lords, who were about the king's person, and were the companions of his exercises and diversions, to whom he represented the regent as a man of very severe morals, and who would never permit them to receive those rewards for their services, which otherwise they might easily have obtained through the king's favour. In this situation the court stood when the king drew nigh the age of fourteen, at which time he was to become major, according to the law, or at least custom of Portugal.

c ALONSO the fifth, afterwards, for his heroic exploits, justly surnamed the African, was at this time the finest youth of his age in Portugal. The regent knew the value of a good education, and the method in which he had received it ; he was therefore assiduous from the very beginning in procuring this advantage for his nephew. He shewed him that pride was a very indifferent shield to cover ignorance ; and that, to merit the respect and deference due to a king, he must acquire those qualities that ought to adorn a throne ; and that modesty and affability would set a lustre upon these, which ostentation and ceremony could never bestow ⁱ. In the cortes, or parliament assembled for that purpose, the regent laid down his office, and rendered an account of the manner in which he had executed it, desiring the king and people's pardon for any errors of which he might be guilty. Don Alonso behaved upon this occasion in a manner so composed, so gentle, and yet so manly, that it charmed all his subjects. He granted Don Pedro all he asked ; the cortes entirely approved his administration, and gave their consent to the king's marriage with Donna Isabella, the regent's daughter, which was now celebrated, and to the request which the king made his father-in-law, that he would continue to assist him with his advice. This was certainly highly reasonable ; and the duke of Coimbra governed for about two years in the same manner, and with very near the same degree of power, as while the administration remained in his hands with the title of regent ^k.

d His enemies, however, at the head of whom was his own brother, the duke of Bragança, with the archbishop of Lisbon, continued their insidious practices with indefatigable assiduity. They turned the gravity and serious discourses of Don Pedro into ridicule : they grounded malicious suspicions on the high respect paid him by the magistrates of Lisbon, and other great cities ; and they brought most of the king's favourites to speak the same language. When they found that the king had no longer that awe and respect which he had formerly expressed for his uncle, they went a little farther, and flattering the king's parts, insinuated it was high time he should govern his own dominions, and let his subjects see that there was somebody in them greater than the duke of Coimbra. At length they boldly asserted, that he had been guilty of flagrant mal-administration during his regency ; that his ambition was exorbitant ; and that the king could enjoy only the empty title of sovereignty while he was about his person. The king listened to these stories, and in proportion as he gave credit to them, withdrew his favour and countenance from the duke of Coimbra. But it has been doubted ^a whether he could have been prevailed upon to remove him, if the duke, disgusted with such treatment, had not resolved to withdraw of himself, and with great humility desired the king's leave. This Don Alonso readily gave him, and his back was no sooner turned than his enemies very boldly brought out their whole charge, affirming, that he had poisoned his brother king Edward, queen Leonora, and the infant Don *Juan*¹. This amazed all, but persuaded very few. The infant Don Henry, duke of Viseo, came from his own town of Sagrez, to justify his brother; but his mouth was soon stopped, by turning the same charge upon him^m. The principal nobility adhered steadily to Don Pedro; and Don Ferdinand, governor of Ceuta, the second son of the duke of Bragança, came over from thence to defend his uncle against his father: but the most extraordinary circumstance attending this prosecution was the behaviour ^b of Don Alvaro de Almada, count of Abranches, esteemed the bravest knight of his time. He came into the king's council completely armed, with his robe thrown over him, and after making a short speech in defence of the regency, he stood up, and said, "If any man shall presume to affirm, that Don Pedro, duke of Coimbra, is not a loyal servant to his prince, and a friend to his country, I am ready at the sword's point to prove that man a liar and a traitor." The courtiers said, this was insulting the king; but the king himself said, that Don Alvaro had behaved like a true knight and a man of honourⁿ.

It was the great point of the court, though certainly not of the king, from this period, to drive the duke of Coimbra into a rebellion. The first step taken was to forbid all the king's subjects by an edict to have any correspondence with him; which produced no other effect than ^c inducing the count de Abranches, and some other friends of his, to go and join him. A message was then sent to require all their arms: to which the duke answered, they were necessary to him and his friends for their defence against their enemies, and could be of no use to the king, who had none^o. The queen interposed as far as she could in favour of her father; and at length prevailed upon him to promise, that if the duke of Coimbra would write him a letter, and acknowledge his faults, he was willing to pardon them. The duke being informed of this, wrote one letter to the king, and another to the queen. In that he told her he had out of complaisance to her wrote such a letter as she desired, which she was so imprudent as to shew the king, who tore the letter addressed to himself without reading it; adding, that since he wrote it only in complaisance to her, he retracted his promise^p. He was then com- ^d manded to come to court upon his allegiance. By the advice of the count de Abranches he took with him an escorte of a thousand horse, and five hundred foot. In his passage he was proclaimed a rebel, and soon after surrounded by the king's troops. The duke seized an advantageous post, and fortified it as well as it was possible. The king then published a proclamation requiring all men to desert him, on pain of being punished as traitors; but not a man quitted him: on the contrary, many of the king's troops withdrew, and some went to die with the duke of Coimbra. The next day he was attacked in his intrenchments, and in the heat of the action killed with an arrow^q. The count de Abranches continued the fight, and, refusing quarter, was likewise killed, with several other persons of distinction^r. The king carried his resentment so high, that he forbid their bodies to be buried; in ^e consequence of which they lay three days on the field of battle, and then the peasants carried away the duke privately, and buried him in an obscure village^s. His virtue, hated in courts, was adored by the uncorrupt part of his countrymen.

THE king Don Alonso returned in triumph to Lisbon, where the implacable enemies of the duke of Coimbra vented their resentment, not only upon all that had been in arms with, but on ^f those also who had shewn any affection for him. His son Don Diego, and many more, were kept in prison; his eldest son Don Pedro retired into Castile; several were put to the torture, and interrogated as to the duke's treason, but to no purpose; all his papers likewise fell into the king's hands, and these gave great lights, not into any conspiracy, but into a multitude of designs he had formed for the service of the king and of the nation^t. A manifesto, drawn up by his enemies, was sent in the king's name to Pope Nicholas the fifth, who treated it without ceremony as a heap of falsehoods, and threatened to excommunicate those who had denied him burial^u. The duke of Burgundy, who was the king's uncle, demanded Don Pedro's body; and that his children might have leave to retire into his dominions. These applications put the king much out of humour^v. He ordered his uncle's corpse to be taken up, and carried to the castle of Abrantes; stopt all prosecutions; and soon after, upon mature deliberation, declared all the noblemen and gentlemen, who had adhered to the late duke of Coimbra, his loyal subjects. On the death of the infant Don Juan, who had been acknowledged his heir apparent, he ordered the body of the duke of Coimbra to be transported, with ^a great pomp from the castle of Abrantes, to the monastery of Batalha^p, where it was interred in the tomb, which, as we have observed in the notes, he had caused to be erected for himself, though some writers say, this was not done till some years after.

SOME alteration was made in the situation of things at the court of Portugal, by the marriage of the infanta Donna Leonora to the emperor Frederic the third. She passed the sea to Italy, accompanied by some persons of the first quality, and the ceremony of her marriage was performed by the Pope himself^q. Don Alonso was very desirous of undertaking some expedition of importance against the Moors of Barbary; and till things were ripe for this purpose, supported the measures of his uncle the infant Don Henry, for discovering the coast of Guiney, from whence they already began to import gold in considerable quantities. This induced the Castilians to grow jealous; and thereupon Don Juan sent an embassy to Lisbon, alleging that he had some right to these discoveries, and threatening to support that right by force, in case the Portuguese fleet proceeded. Don Alonso answered with great moderation, that as he never heard of those rights before, it was not at all strange that he had not respected them; but that he was very willing to enter into the discussion of them whenever the king of Castile pleased^r. But Don Juan dying, this affair was attended with no great consequences. His successor, Don Henry the fourth, in the very first year of his reign, sent an agent of his privately into Portugal, to negotiate a marriage with the infanta Donna Joanna^s, the king Don Alonso's sister, which was speedily and secretly concluded, notwithstanding the king and his sister were both well acquainted with the usage the princess Blanch of Navarre, his first wife, had received, and the strong suspicions there were of his impotence. Some months after the infanta, attended and accompanied in a manner suitable to her birth, took her journey into Castile, which proved equally unfortunate to herself, and to the inhabitants of Castile and Portugal^t. On the third of May, the queen Donna Isabella was delivered of a son, who was baptized in the cathedral church of Lisbon by the name of John^u. The joy which this occasioned was equally sincere in the king and his subjects.

THE infant Don Ferdinand, brother to the king, is by the Portuguese historians said to have stolen over to Ceuta, with an intention to have distinguished himself in some expedition against the Moors; but his brother suspecting that there was in this a tincture of discontent, as hitherto no provision had been made for him, sent him orders to return, which he obeyed with such alacrity, that the king gave him a noble appenage. But we are elsewhere told, that the king appointed him to command a fleet and army; but that the latter being infected with the plague at Ceuta, occasioned his hasty return, without performing any thing of importance^v. On the second of December died the queen of Portugal^x at Evora, of a short illness, not without very strong suspicions of poison; for the enemies of her father, perceiving the ascendancy she had gained over the king, and fearing that after procuring the restitution of his honour, she might incline to revenge his ill usage on the authors of his misfortunes, thought this the shortest method to rid themselves of their fears. The whole nation expressed their affection for her by a general mourning, and by as general execrations against those they took to be the authors of her death; and the king gave the clearest proof of the sincerity of his passion, by his never having afterwards any commerce with the sex. He caused her body to be interred, with all possible solemnity, near that of her father; and at the same time caused the corpse of his mother Donna Leonora to be removed out of Castile, and to be interred likewise in the church of the royal abbey of Batalha^y. Such were the melancholy events of this year.

As the state of affairs in Castile was very unsettled, queen Joanna earnestly pressed the king Don Henry, her husband, to an interview with her brother, to which Don Alonso of Portugal very willingly consented, as a means of dissipating the concern he was under for the loss of the queen^z. In the spring of the year the two kings, with their respective courts, met on the frontiers, from whence they proceeded to Badajoz, where they feasted three days, at the expence of the king of Castile; and then repaired to Yelves, where they were feasted for the like space of time by the king of Portugal^a. The queen of Castile at this juncture introduced Don Pedro of Portugal, eldest son to the duke of Coimbra, to her brother, who received him with great testimonies of affection and esteem, restored him to his honours, employments, and estates, and carried him back with him to Lisbon^b. Pope Calixtus the second having published a crusade against the Turks, Don Alonso very readily consented to the equipment of a very large squadron, with a numerous corps of troops on board, which he actually sent to the assistance of the Christians; but the civil wars in Italy first, and next the death of the Pope, rendered that military scheme abortive^c. It is said, that the coin still current in Portugal under the denomination of cruzadoes, were originally struck upon this occasion, and were made of the gold they received from Guiney. The king having been at a great expence in making these preparations, and being of a very warm and active disposition, resolved to turn his arms against the Moors in Barbary: to which he was encouraged by his uncle the infant Don Henry, grand-master of the order of Christ, who promised to attend him with a good squadron of his own, and he was likewise accompanied by his brother, and most of the young nobility in his kingdom. This fleet and army consisted of about two hundred sail, and twenty thousand men; and the best part of the latter being safely debarked on the coast of Africa, Don Alonso besieged Alcazer^d, and took it without any difficulty, into which he put a strong garrison under the command of Don Edward de Meneses; who, within a short time after the return of the Christian army, found himself besieged by the king of Fez; but he defended himself with such resolution, that the Moors were at length obliged to raise the siege. This did not hinder their attempting it a second and a third time, in which last siege they were very near prevailing, if a strong reinforcement from Portugal had not happily arrived, and got safely into the place. With this reinforcement came the king's order to Don Edward de Meneses to return to Portugal, where he was received with all possible marks of honour, and the king, as a reward of his services, created him count of Viana^e.

The deaths of the count de Ourem, the infant Don Henry, and the duke of Bragança.

THIS success in Africa excited an extraordinary joy in the Portuguese nation, which, however, was quickly allayed by the death of several princes of the blood. Of these the first was Don Alonso count of Ourem, a man of great art, but withal of great abilities, and who had been long esteemed the greatest statesman in that country. He was quickly followed by his uncle and the king's, Don Henry duke of Viseo^f (E). In a short space after died the father of the

(E) This noble prince was the fourth son of Don Juan the first, king of Portugal, and we have had occasion to speak of him frequently in the course of the history. There are some difficulties about the time of his birth; and the manner of writing his title has created great confusion. The proper name of the city is Viseu or Viseo, in Latin Visentium, situated in the middle of the province of Beira; but by the similarity of letters, more especially in old hands, we find it commonly written in our records Visen. It is not easy to know at what time he was elected knight of the garter; but it is most likely to have been in the twenty-first of Henry the sixth; for at that time there was an order made for carrying the ensigns to Lynfranc de Henryche, uncle to the king of Portugal (8). Now this it seems signifies the infant Don Henry, who was brother to king Edward, and uncle to Alonso the fifth, who was at that time king. By the same strange way of writing, we find Queneburgh or Quimbre, for Conimbra or Coimbra, which shews how much better it would be to have records of this kind kept in Latin (9). There is no doubt that Mr. Anstis, who wrote the life of this prince, has corrected a great many mistakes in his predecessors; but it is likewise true that he has made some of his own: for instance, he says, that for some time he fixed his residence at Cape St. Vincent, and that he afterwards removed to the cape of Sagra, in Algarve (1). But the truth is, that he never removed at all. He founded the town of Sagrez, as we have shewn in the history, which stands a very few miles from Cape St. Vincent, in the kingdom of Algarve, and made it one of the finest ports and best fortified places in the kingdom, the navigation of those times considered (2). He was certainly not only one of the greatest men of his time in Portugal, but one of the greatest men that any country or any age ever produced, which, though it may seem to rise very high, is so far from exceeding, that it really falls short of his merit; for whatever difference there may be between the state of Europe now, and the time in which he flourished, whatever advantages have resulted from the discovery of the best part of Africa, of the East Indies, and of the West; nay, whatever shall result from them, to the very end of time, is strictly due to the genius and labours of this prince, unless we are inclined to refer part to his father king John, who observing that his inclinations were entirely turned to mathematical studies, encouraged and gave him proper masters in his youth; and as he grew up bestowed upon him such appointments as enabled him to carry his speculations into practice. We have shewn elsewhere what the particular searches, discoveries, and conquests were that this prince made at his own expence (3). We have likewise shewn in the history what his conduct was with respect to the public transactions in Portugal (4); and shall therefore only add here, that he was not only a practical discoverer, by the expeditions defrayed out of his purse, but that he was really the author of that spirit of discovery, by which so much has been done since. He had very just notions of the structure of the globe: he suggested the great use of longitude and latitude in sailing, and how these were to be ascertained by astronomical observations: he was a great master in the art of ship-building: he had very clear ideas of the beneficial consequences that would attend the increase of navigation, establishment of colonies, and extending foreign commerce; and he propagated these so effectually among his disciples, that tho' ignorance and superstition made many efforts to stifle this spirit, yet it was without effect, and his own country was the first that reaped the profit of his inestimable talents. The time of his death is far from being certain. We place it here in compliance to great authorities (5); but it is proper to acquaint the reader we are not satisfied with those authorities. If he was sixty-seven years a the count of Ourem, Don Alonso duke of Bragança, one of the greatest men in Portugal ; and who would have been still much greater if in the beginning his greatness had not been founded in the favour of the regent Don Pedro, his brother, and when he could oblige him no longer carried to a greater height by his fall (F). A circumstance that afterwards came home to his family when least expected.

THE king finding all things quiet in his own dominions, and being well informed of the state of Tangier, which, for having once baffled the Portuguese arms, and proved fatal to the liberty and life of his uncle, had been ever the object of his resentment and ambition, made another expedition to Africa attended by his brother Don Ferdinand, who he had created duke of Viseo, the constable Don Pedro duke of Coimbra, the count of Viana, and several other persons equally distinguished by their quality and their talents, and more especially by their valour and success in arms ^b. The first attempt was not very fortunate ; for the infant Don Ferdinand attempting to surprize Tangier, with a small corps of troops, was soundly beaten, and escaped with great difficulty. The king, ravaging the country in resentment of this disgrace, was very near meeting with a greater, since he was on the very point of being taken prisoner, if he had not been rescued by the count of Viana, who fell himself into their hands, and was barbarously cut to pieces ^c. The count de Marialva, and Don Gomez Freyras, were likewise taken prisoners, and ransomed at a great expence ; so that this expedition was none of the most fortunate. The constable Don Pedro, at his return, was invited to Barcelona, where, as we have shewn in its proper place, he was by the Catalans honoured with the title of king of Arragon ; and after running through a long series of dangers and fatigues, was so unfortunate as to die either of chagrin or of poison ^k. The troubles continued all this time in Castile, and the king had several interviews with his brother and sister ; in which a proposition was first made for Don Alonso to marry the infanta Donna Isabella, the king's sister, and afterwards that Don Juan, prince of Portugal, should espouse Donna Joanna, the king's reputed daughter ; both of which proved of age, he did not die either this year or the next (6) ; for then he must have been older than his brother Don Pedro, which he certainly was not. Mr. Anstis blames Dr. Heylin for placing his death in 1465 (7), and he gives a very good reason for it, because the lord Duras was placed in his stall of the garter before that time (8) ; but here again we are pretty much in the dark, since we know not exactly when that lord was chosen. An author of great credit places his death in 1463, and if he was sixty-seven at the time of his death, that is most likely to be the true date (9).

(F) It is of the utmost consequence to this history, to have a clear idea of the entire descent of the family of Bragança, now upon the throne of Portugal, which sprang from the person of whom we are now to speak. He was the only natural son of John the first, mentioned in history, and was certainly older than any of his legal issue, though we cannot tell exactly the time of his birth (1). This son of his, Don Alonso, he created count of Barcelos, and procured for him Donna Beatrice, the heiress of the first constable of Portugal, Don Nugno Alvarez Percyra, count of Arayolos and Ourem, which honours, upon his demise, came to Alonso, who was by this means thrice an earl. His brother Don Pedro, duke of Coimbra, and regent of the kingdom, against whom he had taken up arms, and to whom he was only in shew reconciled, at least on his side, procured from their nephew Don Alonso, the lordship of Bragança, upon the death of its then possessor ; and to render the obligation the greater, caused it to be erected into a duchy (2). This Don Alonso had two wives, Donna Beatrice before-mentioned, and Donna Constancia de Norogna, daughter to Alonso, count of Gijon, and Isabella of Portugal, whom we have mentioned before. He had children only by his first marriage, and these were two sons and a daughter ; the eldest of these, Don Alonso, who died but a little before his father, was stiled count of Ourem ; and, as we have observed in the text, was considered in point of abilities as one of the greatest men of that age. He had no lawful issue ; but by Beatrice de Sousa, his mistress, he left Alonso of Portugal, who was archbishop of Evora ; and who, notwithstanding, had also two natural children ; from the eldest of whom, Don Francisco, sprung the counts of Vimioso (3). Don Ferdinand, the second son, bore the titles of marquis de Villa Viciosa, and count of Arayolos : but on account of his services in Africa, was created by his cousin, Don Alonso the fifth, duke of Guimaraez. The daughter's name was Donna Isabella, and she espoused Don Juan of Portugal, her father's brother, by whom she had a son, Don Diego, who died without issue ; a daughter, Donna Isabella, who married the monarch of whom we are speaking ; Donna Beatrice, who married his uncle Don Ferdinand ; and Donna Philippa, who died unmarried (4). We must now return to Don Ferdinand, the first of that name, who by the death of his father and brother, became the second duke of Bragança. He espoused Donna Joanna de Castro, daughter to the lord of Cadaval, by whom he had four sons and three daughters. Ferdinand, who will be the subject of another note ; John, marquis de Montemayor, constable of Portugal, who died an exile in Castile, without issue ; Alvaro, count of Oliveira ; Alonso, count of Faro and Odemira, from whom that branch sprang ; Donna Catalina, contracted to the marquis of Arialva, but who died before marriage ; Donna Beatrice, who espoused the marquis de Villa Real ; and Donna Guyomara, who married the count de Loulle. The reader will perceive from the history, the absolute necessity of this long note (5).

The king's brother, Don Ferdinand duke of Viseo, goes over with a new army into Barbary.

AN establishment in Africa was what the king of Portugal had so much at heart, that as soon as his finances had recovered a little from the expences of one war, he was ever ready to enter on another. The chief motive to this seems to have been the establishing a maritime frontier upon that coast, the better to defend the trade his subjects had begun to establish with the coast of Guiney, and from which a considerable degree of profit was already collected. Besides this, it greatly intimidated the Moorish princes, cut off their communication with their countrymen in Granada, and gave this monarch an opportunity of raising vast sums upon those large, rich, and trading towns which lay upon the coast, and which as yet he had not been able to reduce. The king, full of these thoughts, assembled a strong fleet, and a competent number of forces, which he embarked under the command of his brother Ferdinand, duke of Viseo, whom he had made constable, upon the death of Don Pedro, duke of Coimbra, and who was also master of the orders of Christ and St. James. In this he acted with greater prudence, and therefore very probably met with better success; for he made himself master of the town of Anafe^m, situated in the kingdom of Fez, on the coast of the Atlantic ocean, and likewise obtained so good an account of some other places of consequence, and of the state of affairs among the infidels, that upon the report of the officers and engineers employed by him, the king Don Alonso determined to proceed to Africa in person the next year with a royal army, entertaining strong hopes that at length he should be able to accomplish what he had so much desired, and what had been already more than once attempted without effect.

By the precautions which the king had taken while his brother was employed in this expedition, he was enabled to execute his own enterprize in a manner suitable to his wish. He was accompanied by his only son Don Juan, prince of Portugal, Ferdinand duke of Guimaraez, Don Juan de Coutigno count of Marialva, Alvaro de Castro count of Monsanto, Henry de Meneses count of Valenza, and others of the nobility. His fleet consisted of upwards of three hundred sail, and his army of twenty-four thousand men, exclusive of the mariners, who were upwards of six thousand. He left the regency of his dominions to his daughter Donna Joanna, and appointed Ferdinand duke of Bragança to assist herⁿ. He sailed on the fifteenth of August, and when he arrived in sight of the coast of Barbary, his fleet was dispersed by a storm, in which some ships perished. However, when it was over, the fleet drew together again, and proceeded to Arzila, a strong place on the Atlantic ocean, at the distance of about fifty miles from the straits of Gibraltar, which was the first object of this enterprize. He caused it to be attacked with great vigour; but the Moors, made an obstinate defence. At length, however, it was carried by storm, many of the enemy who survived retiring into the castle, and into a mosque, where they had laid up their most valuable effects. Don Alonso caused both these places to be attacked, and it was there he lost the count of Monsanto, and the count of Marialva^o. The king, when he saw the corpse of the last-mentioned lord, the blood still streaming from his wounds, turned to the prince, and said, "God grant you, my son, the virtues of that great man^p". The Portuguese of those times might be killed, but not vanquished, and the army, though much afflicted, were more exasperated at this loss.

Gains several conquests, and redeems the body of his uncle Don Ferdinand.

THEY renewed the assault the next day, and carried both the mosque and the castle sword in hand. The booty was immense, more especially when joined to the ransom of five thousand prisoners that were taken: amongst these were two of the wives and two sons of Muley Sheik, to whom the place belonged. The king gave upon the spot great marks of piety, gratitude, and generosity. He caused the mosque to be purified, in which he returned solemn thanks to God for his victory: after which he conferred on his son Don Juan the order of knighthood: he bestowed the honour of count of Monsanto, on the brother of the deceased lord: he bestowed all the employments of which the count of Marialva was possessed, in virtue of his long and faithful services, on his son, though a very young man; and added the government of Arzila to that of Alcacer, which was already possessed by the count of Valenza. By the release of the two wives and one of the sons of the Moorish prince, he procured the body of his uncle the infant Don Ferdinand, for whom the infidels had erected a tomb on a high tower, as a monument of their victory; caused it to be transported to Lisbon, and from thence conveyed with great pomp to the royal monastery of Batalha^q. The other son of the Sheik he would not ransom upon any terms; but at his return brought him with him into Portugal, gave him a liberal and princely education, and then sent him home to his father without any a ransom. He lived many years in Barbary, and was called by the Moors, Mohammed the Portuguese^r.

A panic seized the Moors upon the loss of Arzila, and the destruction of the people who defended it; insomuch that the inhabitants of Tangier, though hitherto it had been reputed impregnable, abandoned it; and the Portuguese monarch, having intelligence of this, sent a detachment to seize the place, into which he made his public entry soon after^s. This great and unexpected conquest satisfied the king's ambition; and having provided in the best manner possible for the security of his new acquisitions, returned into Europe, covered with glory, and having acquired the lofty title of the African. He likewise added to those which were descended to him from his ancestors, that of lord of the coasts on both seas^t; and, to perpetuate the memory of his exploits, caused them to be expressed in the greatest elegance in tapestry; in which his example has been followed by some of the greatest princes and ablest generals in succeeding times. While the king was in Africa, there happened an event which might have produced a rupture with England. The bastard Falconberg took twelve Portuguese ships, richly laden, at which Don Alonso was extremely incensed; but when he understood that it happened during that revolution, in which his ally Edward the fourth was obliged to retire into the territories of the duke of Burgundy, and Henry the sixth for a small space of time placed on the throne, he was easily pacified, and the affair was soon after compromised by negotiation, which restored the perfect harmony that had long reigned between the two nations^u.

THE reputation of Don Alonso was now at the greatest height; and the remainder of his reign might have been happy and easy, as well as glorious, if he had not embarked in the very intricate and troublesome business of the succession to the crown of Castile. This had been long the object of his attention, and while it remained in any degree at a distance, his conduct was wise and like that of a great politician; for he gave general and doubtful answers, by which he left hopes to those who were in the interest of his niece, without entering into any absolute engagement; but upon the death of king Henry the fourth, who by his testimony declared this princess his heiress, he found himself reduced to a point, and under a necessity of taking one side or other^v. He consulted his council, where his son the prince, and most of the nobility, dazzled with the lustre of the crown of Castile, and withal perceiving which way the king's inclinations leaned, advised him to accept the proposals made him, and to marry the heiress as soon as a dispensation could be obtained from the Pope. The duke of Bragança opposed this vehemently. He observed that the Castilian lords, who now espoused the claim of the infanta Donna Joanna, were the very same persons who had proclaimed Don Alonso of Castile, king; had as far as in them lay deposed their lawful sovereign; and had openly affirmed that he was incapable of begetting a child. He from thence inferred, that they had nothing but their own interest in view: and that therefore it was very unsafe for the king to trust them. But the king, considering that the duke was uncle to queen Isabella, now seated on the throne of Castile, rejected his advice, though approved and adopted by the archbishop of Lisbon. He was content, however, at the motion of this prelate to send an agent into Castile, who reported at his return, that many of the first nobility, and the best part of the commons, were disposed to maintain the infanta's title; and upon this it was resolved to enter into a war, to maintain the title of that unhappy princess, and to hazard the whole strength of Portugal, in hopes of conquering Castile^x.

We have written the history of this war in another place; and therefore, to avoid repetition, will say as little as possible of it here. But it may not be amiss to observe, that Don Alonso, in espousing the cause of the infanta Donna Joanna, against Ferdinand and Isabella, acted very near the same part that Don Juan II. of Castile had done in supporting the claim of the infanta Donna Beatrix to the crown of Portugal, against the grandfather of this prince, John the first, the legitimacy of both princesses being suspected, and there being a strong party in each nation in favour of that title, which in the end proved unsuccessful. In both cases the kings had very difficult parts to act, and were in a great measure deceived by the notions they formed of their subjects' affections; for at first the Castilians, who were very desirous of making a province of Portugal, grew quickly weary of the war, and yet afterwards blamed their monarch for the peace he made. Though at the beginning the Portuguese were very earnest for this war; but the military operations not answering their wishes grew uneasy and dissatisfied, which was the principal cause of their king's desisting from his pretensions, which they likewise blamed, and imputed the miseries that afterwards befel the kingdom to that timidity, which in reality was more owing to their conduct than to the inclination of their king. In cases, therefore, of this nature, it is infinitely better to be slow in resolving, than to enter hastily into a difficult enterprise, and after a great expence of blood and treasure, be content at last with worse terms than might have been obtained at first. In this instance the loss of the battle of Toro, in which the Portuguese say that king Ferdinand shewed very little courage, and in which the Spanish historians affirm that there was something very blameable in Don Alonso's conduct, gave a turn to the war, and put it absolutely out of the power of the king of Portugal to maintain the claim he had set up to the dominions of Castile, and which threw his affairs into such confusion, as induced him to make a journey into France, in hopes of receiving assistance from a prince who was equally incapable of taking a generous resolution, or of declaring plainly he would not take it^y.

Don Alonso
makes a voyage to France, to demand assistance from Lewis XI.

This expedition of intrigue is by much the most perplexed passage in the history of the reign of Don Alonso; and we shall therefore bestow an extraordinary care to set it in a true light. This king was thoroughly convinced that the conquest of Castile was not to be obtained without assistance; and while he meditated in his own mind how this assistance was to be obtained, Don Alvaro de Alayda returned from the court of Lewis the eleventh, who being engaged in a war with Arragon, and having no reason to believe Ferdinand and Isabella well inclined to him, gave this minister such fair language, and talked in so high a strain of the king of Portugal's courage and generosity, that Don Alvaro made no scruple of assuring that prince there was nothing he might not expect from the friendship of Lewis. Don Alonso therefore returning into Portugal, sent his niece Donna Joanna to Guarda, and went from thence to Porto, where he resolved to embark for France, having there a fleet of twenty-one sail of large ships, a train of five hundred gentlemen, and an escorte of near two thousand two hundred men at arms^z. Some of his ministers laboured to dissuade him from this voyage; but Don Alonso was a prince of so much candour and sincerity, that he looked upon their suspicions and cautions as errors flowing from narrow minds, and unworthy the belief of a king. He dispatched therefore Don Francisco de Almeyda by land, to desire that Lewis would appoint a place for their meeting, and having done this, as soon as the wind was favourable, he put to sea. He touched first at Ceuta, thence he proceeded to Marseilles, and afterwards landed at Colivres. He took his route through Perpignan, where in honour of so great a guest the prison gates were set open. At Bourges he was met by king Lewis, who, as a French historian says, did him the highest honours, being resolved in his own mind to do for him nothing else^a. He told him, however, that he would have assisted him with the whole forces of his kingdom, if he had not been under the necessity of watching the motions of the duke of Burgundy; advised him to procure a dispensation from the Pope for the marriage with his niece, which would give him an indisputable title to the crown of Castile, and promised, when this should be obtained, to appoint commissioners to regulate the succours he should give him in money and in men^b. He also communicated various projects for bribing the governors of provinces and great towns.

dupe of that monarch, and is so ashamed that he would retire to Jerusalem.

Don Alonso, pleased with the success of this negotiation, undertook to conclude a lasting peace between Lewis and the duke of Burgundy; in order to which he made a journey to the duke's camp before Nancy, where the duke laboured to open his eyes, and to shew him that Lewis had not the least intention to perform the assurances he had given him. The duke being soon after killed^c, Don Alonso returned into France, and by the desire of king Lewis went to Paris, where he was treated in the most obliging manner. In the mean time the dispensation was obtained at Rome: upon which Don Alonso followed Lewis to Arras, to press the immediate performance of his promises; where finding nothing but artifice and delay, he perceived plainly that he was duped^d. He returned from thence to Rouen to wait for his fleet, and receiving there certain intelligence that Lewis was treating of a peace and an alliance with Ferdinand and Isabella, at Bayonne, he was so much affected with the usage he had received, that he determined to go and visit the holy places at Jerusalem, and hide himself from the world for ever. In pursuance of this resolution he left Rouen, accompanied only by two pages, two other servants, and Stephen Martinez his chaplain. One of these servants he directed to carry four letters to Antonio de Faria, who was lately come from the prince his son. One was directed to the king of France, giving him an account of his design, and desiring his protection for the servants he had left behind. Another was directed to the prince his son, commanding him to cause himself to be proclaimed king, and never expect to see him more. The third was directed to the nobility and people, requiring them to acknowledge the prince for their sovereign. And the fourth to his domestics, directing them to obey the count de Faro, till they

a had an opportunity of returning home^c. These letters being delivered, the French king ordered strict search to be made after him, and he was quickly found by Robinet le Beuf, a gentleman of Normandy; and the noblemen who attended him from Portugal being come about him, they persuaded him to return home; and Lewis, who by this time had concluded a treaty with Ferdinand and Isabella, furnished him readily with ships and a proper escorte^f.

In the king's absence, which was about a year, Portugal was governed by the prince Don Juan, with great ability. He applied himself with much diligence to repair all the disasters that had happened, and to prevent Portugal, as far at least as was in his power, from feeling the effects of an unsuccessful war. His diligence, and his success in this respect, merited the thanks of the states, whom he assembled at Monte-Major, and from whom he received as large supplies as he thought fit to desire, and when the assembly rose he went to Evora to give the necessary orders for covering the frontier. He was scarce arrived, before Don Alonso de Cardenas, a very enterprising Castilian officer, advanced towards the city, with two thousand lances. The prince had no troops to oppose him, and the people were equally terrified for his danger and their own. Where force is wanting, fraud is lawful in war. The prince sent him a message, that if he would have a little patience he would meet him in the field. Don Alonso answered, that he did not know that the prince was so near; but since he was, he would come and pay his respects to him. The prince perceiving this artifice had failed, ordered Don Garcia de Meneses to sally with three hundred horse, which was all he had in the place, in the night, to advance some miles towards the enemy, and to traverse all the great road till morning, and then to return. When Don Alonso de Cardenas came with his infantry near the city, and perceived the track of so many horses, he concluded that the prince had received a great reinforcement of cavalry, and thereupon retired^e. The prince having put all things into the best order possible, returned to Lisbon, and from thence went to Santaren, where he received his father's letters; and by the advice of the prelates, and principal nobility of the kingdom, caused himself to be proclaimed king, on the tenth of November. On the fifteenth of the same month, the king Don Alonso arrived in the river of Lisbon^b. It is said, that Don Juan was walking by the side of the Tagus, with the duke of Bragança and the archbishop of Lisbon, when he received this news. He asked those lords hastily how he should receive him. As your father and your king, sir, said the duke of Bragança^d. Don Juan kept a profound silence for some minutes, and then taking up a flat stone skimmed it with all his force into the river. That stone, said the archbishop softly to the duke of Bragança, shall never break my head, and from that moment meditated his retreat to Rome^k. When he had recovered himself a little, Don Juan went to meet his father, and received him not only with all the marks of respect, but with all the testimonies of joy and satisfaction imaginable. Don Alonso was sensible of his mistake, and desired to retain only the title of king of Algarve; but Don Juan answered, there could not be two kings in Portugal, and his majesty being there, there could be none but him^l. His succeeding conduct fully justified the sincerity of these warm expressions.

As soon as Don Alonso resumed the government, he laboured to renew the war with Castile, and endeavoured by all means possible to draw new friends to his party in that kingdom, instead of those who had deserted him. In this manner the war was kept up for two years, during which space the Pope annulled his own dispensation, and declared the marriage between Don Alonso and his niece void, which, however, was never concluded. At length the state of affairs so requiring, and the prince Don Juan shewing a visible dislike to the war, and the measures necessary to continue it, the king by the interposition of Donna Beatrix, duchess of Viseo, entered into a negotiation, which, after it had hung a little time, at length ended in a peace, on terms which have been already specified in the history of Castile, and which therefore it is unnecessary to repeat. It may not, however, be amiss to observe, that the Portuguese writers expressly affirm, that Donna Joanna of Castile so much resented the terms made for her in that treaty, by which she was to wait for a husband till the son of Ferdinand and Isabella was of age to marry, who might even then refuse her upon paying a certain sum of money, that she chose to take the veil at once, and went of her own accord into the monastery of St. Clara at Coimbra^m. Before the peace was ratified, in which the king and queen of Castile abandoned their pretensions to Guiney, their subjects sent a fleet thither of thirty sail, which in its return was intercepted by the Portuguese, and every ship taken, their cargoes being of immense value, which, with some other cross accidents, procured the conclusion and ratification of the peace which had been so long deferredⁿ.

assiduous in his endeavours to leave his dominions in peace.

ABOUT the time that the unfortunate Donna Joanna took the veil, the king Don Alonso fell extremely ill, and upon his recovery, seeing the plague break out in his dominions, by which multitudes of people were destroyed, he fell into a profound melancholy. In this condition he meditated a second resignation, and at the same time told his son that he had two great ends in view, when he consented to resume the crown; the first was, putting a period to the war with Castile; and the latter, reconciling him to the house of Bragança, which he looked upon as a point of no less importance^o. It is not very clear how this enmity between the prince and duke arose. Some say, that the duke could never digest the death of Don Pedro, duke of Coimbra; and that he kept by him the bloody shirt in which that prince was killed, which was given him by his aunt: but surely if this had been the case, his pique would have been against the father rather than the son. Others assert, that the prince resented the duke's chiding him for making his addresses to Donna Agnes de Mendoza, who was maid of honour to the infanta Donna Joanna. It is, however more than probable that the true, or at least the principal cause, was the supposed attachment of the duke to the family of Castile, to which he was nearly allied^p. The king took great pains to persuade his son that these suspicions were injurious, at the same time assuring him that his regard for the duke of Bragança arose from his finding him always faithful and always sincere. It seems this did not make any great impression upon Don Juan, who though perhaps not displeased with his father's disposition to resign, yet strongly opposed his intention to retire to a convent, being desirous of receiving his advice, and of having him always near. Some say^q, that Don Alonso called an assembly of the states, in which with great solemnity he devolved the government upon his son: but others with more probability assert, that having acquainted his son with his sentiments, he privately retired with an intention to go to the monastery of St. Antonio de Varatojo, which he had chosen for his retreat; but arriving at Cintra he was seized with the plague, and died there on the twenty-eighth of August, 1481, in the forty-ninth year of his age^r, and in the forty-third of his reign (G). As he was exceedingly beloved, he was deeply and universally regretted by his subjects, who saw with some concern the entrance of a new reign, which they apprehended would be of another complexion; for as benignity and affability were the characteristics of Don Alonso's disposition, so strictness and rigid punctuality were very manifest in the humour of his successor, who expected from all that profound deference and submission, and that prompt and ready obedience, which he had upon all occasions shewn to his father.

cession.

DON Juan the second, surnamed by some the Great^s, but by most of the Portuguese historians the Perfect^t, ascended the throne in the twenty-seventh year of his age. He began his reign with celebrating the funeral of his father with great pomp; and he executed his will in all respects with the utmost exactness. He went still farther: he enquired after those servants who, through mistake, want of memory, or ill offices done them, were omitted in the will,

(G) This monarch was very graceful in his person, though somewhat bulky; wore his beard thick and long; his hair was of a dark brown, and his complexion ruddy; very courteous in his manners, and became gradually dearer to his people the longer he reigned. He was very bountiful, some writers say, he carried this a little too far; remarkably temperate in eating and sleeping; still more so in regard to women, since we find no imputation upon his chastity, though he became a widower in the very flower of his age (6). He was himself a man of letters, and a great pattern of learning. He invited one Justus, a learned Italian, into Portugal, and bestowed upon him a bishoprick, that he might encourage him to write a compleat history of Portugal; but he died before he made any progress in this undertaking; and which was worse, the collection from records of the most authentic memoirs, which were put into his hands, are said to have been dissipated and lost (7). This king Don Alonso is said to have been singularly happy, in being equally beloved by the nobility and the commons. As to the misfortunes which befel him in the latter part of his life and reign, the superstitious, which, generally speaking, make the bulk of the nation in every country, attributed them to his injustice to his niece Donna Joanna of Castile, whom he never married, though the contrary is affirmed (8) by some. Yet these interpreters might have considered that he was prosperous in all his undertakings, till he embraced her cause; that in support of it, he wasted the treasures and the troops of Portugal; and that he did not desert it till, through despair, he first deserted his crown; so that the grounds of their interpretation are none of the clearest; and though that princess was certainly as proper an object of compassion, yet why this should not be also extended to Don Alonso, under as hard circumstances, is not easy to understand; and for this very reason we ought, in points like this, to form no conclusion. Modern writers, indeed, are less to blame in this particular than those who wrote in the preceding centuries, who very often warped their relations of what passed in this world, that they might the better reconcile them to their own constructions of divine justice.

a and rewarded them as if he had received his father's verbal instructions, as indeed he made a long journey in a short space of time, that he might attend and serve his father in his last moments". He caused the stone and wood-work of a large and commodious fort to be prepared at Lisbon, and sent a small squadron, with five hundred soldiers and a hundred masons on board, who, before the negroes well knew what they were about, constructed the fortress of St. George del Mina, and thereby secured that coast". He did other things that were not considered by all people in the same light. A person who had been very dear to him in his youth brought him a promise he had given him under his hand to make him a count. He looked upon it gravely, tore it, and said to the man, "I shall forget there was such a paper." He added a minute after, "Such as corrupt the minds of young princes, and by becoming the instruments of their pleasures extract from them promises that ought not to be performed, should consider it as a favour that they are not punished". He called an assembly of the states in the month of November, in which the duke of Bragança for the nobility, the deputies of Lisbon for the cities, and those of Santaren for the towns in Portugal, did him homage. He proposed and caused to be enacted many good laws; and he appointed commissaries to go into all parts of the kingdom to see that they were executed. He rewarded liberally; he punished severely; but he first reprimanded sharply. He said to an indolent and corrupt judge, but a man of parts, "Take care, friend, I hear you keep your hands open and your doors shut." He took the king's caution, and became an excellent judge. He ordered the nobility to exhibit their charters and grants, that it might be known upon what foundation their privileges stood, and particularly their exorbitant jurisdictions. He directed criminals to be seized wherever they could be found. The great lords said, this was a breach of their immunities: the king answered, that an immunity against justice was an absurdity, and that the king who made such a grant never intended it".

THE whole nobility of the kingdom were disturbed by these proceedings, and began to consider how they might stop the progress of them. The duke of Bragança was at the head of this design, which he carried so far as to demand the protection and conclude a treaty with Don Ferdinand king of Castile and Arragon. A person employed in transcribing his writings, found the copies of the duke's letters, and this treaty in the duke's archives, and carried them to the king, who ordered him to transcribe and then replace them". Some time after, when he had the duke in his power, he expostulated this matter with him, and told him, that he meant to observe the laws himself, and therefore he saw no reason to exempt others from obedience; that this was for the good of the people in general, and would strengthen the power of the nobility by augmenting the number of their vassals, and increasing their revenues. He told him what papers he had seen; but, duke, said he, "I can forgive, let me see that you can forget." Some time after, he found him involved in practices of a like nature: he caused him to be arrested at Evora, brought him to a public trial, and in consequence of that, to a public execution". The duchess of Bragança, though the queen's sister, retired immediately into Castile, with her three sons. The marquis de Monte-Mayor, and the count de Faro, brothers to the deceased duke, were also declared traitors, and their estates confiscated"; but it is remarkable, that Don Ferdinand king of Castile, did not interfere; and some say the king of Portugal wrote him a letter, in which he told him he would find it more for his interest to have his friendship than that of his nobility. But after the death of the duke he did interpose, though ineffectually, on behalf of the duchess and her children.

WE must acknowledge, that this was one of those great strokes in government, of which it is not very easy to say whether it deserves condemnation or praise. The nobility thought themselves injured, and believed they had a right of self-defence. The duke of Bragança, who was at the head of them, and who, in point of estate, was little inferior to the king, felt his diminution the most, and was therefore the most piqued. Whatever his intrigues were with the court of Castile, he never looked upon himself as a rebel, because he meant to take nothing from the king, but barely to defend the privileges of the nobles. On the other hand, the king looked upon those privileges as visibly injurious to the public welfare, and as usurpations upon his prerogative. Yet he was no admirer of prerogative; for in the assembly at Evora, he declared, that the welfare of the nation was the point to be respected, and that the palace was no sanctuary for criminals. He gave other instances of this: his judges confiscated estates to his use; he would say to them very graciously, I hope you have done right; but when they decided in favour of the subject, he would say, with apparent marks of joy, I know you have done well, and sometimes made them presents. After all, it was a struggle between the regal and aristocratical parts of the constitution, which the king managed with great sagacity and firmness, but which was not followed by the effects which he expected. Soon after the duke's death, he made a tour with the queen into the northern parts of his dominions, in order to see that the regulations, made in the assembly of the states, were carried into execution; and after this was done, he returned to Santaren, that he might have an eye to the commerce of Africa, which, through his care and attention, became every day more considerable^c. The court of Rome having some dispute with this prince, he gave the Pope to understand, that he never intended to invade the privileges of the clergy; but that he was fully resolved they should not extend them. Upon sifting this matter to the bottom, the fault was found to lie in cardinal da Cunha, whom the king reprimanded so roundly that there it ended^d.

Conspiracy of the young duke of Viseo discovered, and himself killed
by the king.

It was not long after his coming back from Santaren, that he was informed by the brother of a young woman, with whom the bishop of Evora had an intrigue, that the young duke of Viseo, brother to the queen, had embarked in a design against his life. This business was so perplexed and embarrassed, that the king found himself more than once in the hands of the conspirators, from whom he escaped only by his address, and by the assistance of Vasco Coutigno, to whom the conspiracy had been discovered by his brother. At length, under pretence of amusement, having drawn the duke of Viseo to the court, then at Setybal, he took him aside, and charged him with the wicked design in which he was embarked. What passed between them is not very clear; but it is certain the king stabbed him dead at his feet. Some say, that he addressed him with these words, "Brother, what would you do with a man that had conspired against your life?" The duke answering, "I would kill him first if I could;" the king replied, "Die then by your own sentence," and so struck him to the heart with his dagger. When he was down the king said, "Go your ways to the duke of Bragança, tell him the issue of his contrivances, and the fate of his fellow traitors." This occasioned a prodigious tumult; but it was quickly calmed by the king's presence, who avowed what he had done, and told the people that the rest of the conspirators were apprehended^e. These were left to the severity of the law, and were condemned upon full proofs. The bishop of Evora was thrown into a foul cistern, in the fortress of Palma, and there, as some say, eaten by vermin^f. His brother, Don Ferdinand de Meneses, and Pedro de Albuquerque, were beheaded. Gutiero Coutigno was imprisoned in the castle of Avis. Lopez de Albuquerque made his escape to one of his castles, and his wife, who was the sister of cardinal da Cunha, began to raise troops. The king sent her word, that though her husband had fought his, he did not thirst for his blood; and that their whole family might go into Castile if they pleased, which offer they very thankfully embraced^g. The king then sent for Don Emanuel, the brother of the duke of Viseo, to court. Diego de Silva, his governor, brought him with fear and trembling. The king received him very kindly, and after embracing him, told him the whole story of his brother's conspiracy; then added, "By his treason the estates of your family are escheated to the crown. The towns of Mouro and Serpa stand on the frontiers of Castile, and are well fortified. I doubt these circumstances might contribute to suggest ill thoughts to your brother. Except these, for which I will give you more than an equivalent, I restore you his whole succession. I make you grand-master of the order of Christ, and constable of Portugal. All I desire of you is, forget that you had a brother, and remember that you are my son^h." At this time the king meditated an expedition into Barbary, upon this principle, that he thought his possessions there insecure unless they were extended. As some preparations were made for this expedition in his ports, the Moors, who inhabited the town and district of Azemor, revolted, and offered to submit to the king of Portugal, if he would suffer them to live according to their own laws, and in the practice of their own religion; to which he assented, and received from their deputies the keys of the city upon those termsⁱ.

The great wisdom of the king's conduct in regard to Ferdinand of Castile.

The next year the king thought fit to send an embassy to their catholic majesties Ferdinand and Isabella, in which he acted with great policy; for he communicated to them all the proceedings against the duke of Bragança, and the late conspirators, as to his principal friends and allies, which exceedingly disconcerted the malcontents at home, who had placed all their hopes in the protection of that court. Don Ferdinand himself, though the greatest politician of that age, was surprised, as expecting rather an expostulation. His affairs, however, requiring the friendship of Portugal, and his army in the war of Granada being distressed for ammunition, he resolved to try how far it might be depended upon by demanding a supply from king John, who sent more than was asked, and with such speed, a that their majesties sent a solemn ambassie to give him thanks*. Some French corsairs having taken four Venetian gallies, and set their crews ashore naked at the mouth of the river of Lisbon, the king ordered them to be cloathed and fed, and sent them withal such a sum of money, by way of alms, that they ransomed their gallies, and returned home, which brought an ambassie from the republic, to return him thanks and to desire his alliance¹. He began now to add to his titles that of lord of Guiney, from whence he drew vast riches, as well as from the resort of vessels of different nations, unto the haven of Portugal, where, under colour of royal generosity, and a seeming ignorance of its consequence, he established a kind of a free-port, exceedingly beneficial to his subjects; and indeed, if we may credit what some writers report, there have been very few kings who had so much knowlege in respect to commerce as he; and who, notwithstanding, disclosed it so little; for it seems he considered it as the most lucrative branch of policy, and was rather more tender of secrets in trade than secrets of state. The reader will probably expect some proofs of this, and they shall be furnished (H). In cases of this nature they ought not to be omitted, because, in the first place, they banish incertainty, and next, they are of much use.

A. D. 1486.

b It was the king's humour, like that of many of his predecessors, not to have any settled place of residence, but to pass his time as the seasons invited, or as his occasions required; now in one place and then in another: but wherever he came, he took care that his having been there should never be forgot. Setubal, or, as we commonly call it, St. Ubes, is finely seated, has a most noble fishery, rich salt mines, and a pleasant bay before it, as well as a good port; yet it made no great figure, because the water about it was none of the best. The king advised them to bring water from some distance, by an aqueduct; but the inhabitants excused themselves by saying they were not rich, and intimated they were heavily taxed. King John took off half of their taxes, and made them a present of the other half, for a fund to raise the aqueduct. After some progress, they told the king it was impossible for them to go on: to which he very calmly answered, then I must. He finished the aqueduct: and the great trade of the place soon justified the measures taken by the king to remove this obstacle^m. The principal reason that brought the king thither was to fit out a fleet against the Moors, under the command of Don Diego de Almeyda. It consisted of about thirty sail, with fifteen hundred soldiers on board, and was intended for a secret expedition, which, through various accidents, he found himself unable to execute, and therefore landed his men in the port of Anafe; and falling upon an army of the Moors, who were in the neighbourhood, unexpectedly killed nine hundred, and made four hundred prisoners. The king being informed that these Moors were in rebellion against Muley Beljave, king of Fez, he sent an ambassador to him to let him know that this armament was made for his service,

His policy and vigilance in other respects, and what great effects they produced.

(H) If we should enter only into the detail of this prince's policy, in regard to commerce, it would require more space than we have assigned to his whole reign. We shall, therefore, only give a few great instances for the reader's information and satisfaction. He allowed only women to wear silk, silver, and precious stones. Some of his counsel objected to this, as a restriction prejudicial to trade; to which he answered, "You are mistaken. If one half of my subjects are luxurious, they will find work enough for the other." He coined a great deal of money, and was very correct in the weight and fineness. In order to increase his revenue, he took away one half of the duties at the port of Lisbon, which effectually answered his purpose, and drew thither the trade from Galicia and Andalusia. He magnified the dangers of voyages to Guiney: according to his accounts, every quarter of the moon produced a tempest; the shores were all covered by the rocks; the countries barren, and inhabited by man-eaters; a particular kind of vessel, built only in Portugal, was absolutely necessary to navigate those seas; and of these, if three out of five returned, it was a great mercy. By these stories other nations were deterred from this navigation till the Portuguese were settled upon the coast. A seaman, who had been more than once at Guiney, and having reported that any ship might sail thither as well as a caravel, the king sent for him, and reprimanded him publicly as an impudent ignorant fellow, who talked of things he did not understand. Some months after he appeared at court, and said, that being obstinate in his own opinion, he had made a trial, and found it indeed impracticable. The king smiled, sent for him privately, gave him a sum of money, bid him stick to his story, and find plausible reasons for it. Three seamen attempting to go into Castile, with proposals upon this subject, he caused them to be pursued by people, who killed two upon the spot, and brought the third back to Evora, where he was broke upon the wheel. He was told the sailors murmured at this: "So much the better, said the king, let every man stick to his element, I do not like travelling seamen." When Cano, who discovered the kingdom of Congo, told him the country was rich in gold, but they would not shew him the mines, "Never look for them, said the king, treat the people with tenderness, deal with them justly, and carry them what they like; you will then get what those mines produce, without digging in them." When the French restored the caravel they had taken, there was nothing missing but a parrokete: he refused, however, to release the French ships till the bird was brought to Lisbon. At which, when some expressed astonishment, "I would have it understood, said the king, that the flag of Portugal shall protect even a parrokete." He was more exact than any man in his dominions in obeying the laws; and when in some instances his courtiers thought this trivial, he said, "You do me wrong, the thing may be trivial, but my example is ever of importance." He was very affable and courteous to such as approached him; yet would sometimes alter his behaviour, and treat them coldly; but he qualified this by saying, "It is fit I should do this sometimes, that the people may not hate you for being favourites."

which he received with great respect, and promised to give his brother of Portugal any marks ^a that were in his power of his gratitude, for a favour, which in effect he never received ^a. He also obtained from Pope Innocent the eighth, a bull for levying the duties known by the name of the croifade, to defray the expences of his war with the infidels; but perhaps he paid more for it than it was worth, since, at the request of the pontiff, he abolished the custom of revising and confirming the Pope's bulls, by the parliament, before they could be executed in Portugal ^o. About this time he sent Don Pedro Covillan, and Don Alonso Payva, to penetrate into the eastern countries by land; to send him an account of their discoveries, and to learn as distinctly as possible the principal commodities of those countries, and from whence they came. It was by this well judged expedient, and by the diligence shewn by these two gentlemen in the execution of it, that the king stood indebted for the finding a new passage ^b to the East-Indies by sea. But with all his circumspection and great abilities, he refused the supplies necessary for executing his project to Christopher Columbus, who thereupon applied himself to queen Isabella, at the siege of Granada, which procured to their Catholic majesties their empire over the new world ^p.

By what means he prevailed upon Ferdinand and Isabella to comply with their treaty, and to marry the infant Isabella to the prince of Portugal. As the house of Bragança were now exiles in Castile, and could not be supposed to render any services to king John and his affairs, in their reports of him to their catholic majesties; and as there were many crowned heads who were desirous of allying themselves to so powerful a crown, by the marriage of Donna Isabella or Elizabeth, into their families, they began gradually to let fall the design of giving this infanta to Don Alonso, prince of Portugal. King John, who looked upon that marriage as a point of great consequence, caused several places ^c upon the frontiers of Castile to be repaired and fortified; and having put good garrisons into them, he began to construct a large and strong fortress at Olivencia. When he had thus alarmed them sufficiently, he sent an embassy to their catholic majesties, in which he gave them to understand, that he had put all the ports and fortresses throughout his kingdom into the best state of defence possible, and had adorned and improved the great cities in his kingdom, which he presumed would be acceptable to their majesties, as their daughter would one day share the throne of Portugal, and reap the benefit of all his labours. In the mean time he carried on his scheme with so much diligence, that the works of Olivencia were completely finished; and the state of their affairs not allowing them to take another resolution, Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella settled, with the best grace they could, the time and ^d other circumstances relative to the marriage ^a. His success in Africa was by no means answerable to this. He had a mind to build a very strong fort at the mouth of the river Larache; and in order thereto sent a fleet with forces, to surprize the town of Graciosa, which they performed; but they no sooner began to fortify it, than Muley, king of Fez, came down with an army of forty thousand horse, and invested it. The Christians, though the works were not half finished, defended themselves gallantly, and king John had once some thoughts of passing the sea in person for its relief; but the king of Fez proposing that the garrison should march out with all the honours of war, it was accepted. To balance this, there arrived a great number of ships richly laden from Guiney, which enabled and encouraged the king to augment his naval force, and to make great preparations in Algarve for another ^e expedition ^f, the conquest of the whole coast being the object of his ambition.

Celebration of that marriage, and unfortunate death of that young prince. As soon as king John was informed that the infanta Donna Isabella of Castile was set out from Seville, in order to enter his dominions, he appointed Don Emanuel, duke of Beja, to go with some of the principal nobility to receive her, on her passing the Zaya, which is the boundary between the two kingdoms. This ceremony was performed on the twenty-second of November, and the infanta conducted to the city of Evora, where her marriage with the prince Don Alonso was celebrated with much greater eclat than any thing of that kind had ever been, and a long train of feasts and diversions were fixed for six months to come ^g. In the month of May the court removed to Santaren, where all possible preparations had been made to render one of the pleasantest places in the world a perfect paradise; jousts, bull-feasts, and other spectacles took up the day; and the evenings were either spent in sailing on the river Tagus, or in viewing the vessels that passed thereon, adorned with flags and streamers, and in dark nights illuminated with flambeaux, and listening to the excellent bands of music on board them. These scenes of joy, which had suffered some check by the death of the king's sister, the infanta Donna Joanna, and by the breaking out of the plague at Lisbon, were entirely overcast on the twelfth of July, when the prince, riding a short race with Don Juan de Meneses, his horse fell with him at full speed, and wounded him in so terrible a manner, that though he lived till the next day, yet he never recovered his senses. As this melancholy accident happened in the sight of his parents, and of his consort, it threw the court into the a deepest melancholy possible^c. The king caused the body to be removed to the monastery of Batalha, went thither afterwards himself in the month of August, to assist at a funeral office for his son; after which his grief seized him in such a manner, that he shut himself up whole days, till, by the advice of his physicians, a natural son of his, named George, whom he had by Donna Agnes de Mendoza, was brought to him, and who, by degrees, allayed his sorrow. But as minds under the dominion of passion are liable to very sudden changes, so it was not long before the king laboured to persuade his consort to receive this boy into her favour, and treat him as if he had been her own son; and though, till that time, she had been of all wives the most dutiful, yet in this point she would never yield in the least, as apprehending it might prejudice the just claim of her brother Don Emanuel, duke of Beja, who was now become the presumptive successor of the dominions of Portugal^a. A. D. 1491.

In the beginning of the succeeding year, the king returned to Lisbon, where he laid the foundation of one of the most magnificent hospitals in Europe. He likewise erected a new convent for the canoneses of the order of St. James, at the head of which he placed Donna Agnes de Mendoza, the mother of his son George; for whom he still retained the greatest tenderness possible; and notwithstanding that he had felt the pulse of the states, when they sent a committee to condole with him on the death of the prince, yet he could not totally relinquish all hopes of procuring him the succession. To pave the way for his entire legitimation, he obtained a bull to capacitate him to hold the grand-mastership of St. James, and the order of Avis, which he bestowed upon him, though a child; but when he would have proceeded farther, and pressed Pope Alexander the sixth to remove, as far as it was in his power, the defect in his son's birth, he had not only the mortification to find his proposal rejected in a full consistory; but to be told that the thing was impracticable, because it would be an act of injustice towards the duke of Beja, the queen Donna Isabella of Castile, and other princes and princesses of the royal blood^b. The king then saw plainly, that the opposition on this side was too strong to be vanquished. He endeavoured, however, by his own indulgence, to make some amends for the inflexibility of the court of Rome, and to the great offices he had already bestowed on his son George, he added the rich priory of Crato; which put him at the head of the order of Malta in his dominions^c. These indications of the king's favour, joined to the address of a very accomplished governor, and the advantage of a plentiful revenue, did not fail to raise a party, though it was but a small one, in favour of the king's darling; which disgusted Don Emanuel, duke of Beja, to such a degree, that partly through fear, and partly through chagrin, he thought proper to quit the court, and retire to his own estate. But notwithstanding the king's thoughts were thus occupied, he gave various instances of attention to the public interest, and of the firmness of his mind where-ever that was concerned. He made several excellent laws, reformed many abuses, and vindicated the honour of his crown in a very remarkable instance. Some French corsairs had taken a Portuguese caravel from Guiney, very richly laden: of which he was no sooner informed, than he gave orders to Don Vasco de Gama to make prizes of all the French ships he could, and to seize all that were in the ports of Portugal; which amounted to ten. The French monarch, Charles, was no sooner acquainted with what had happened^d, and the cause of it, than he directed the caravel to be restored untouched, and made an apology for what had happened.

Upon the edict which banished the Jews out of the dominions of their catholic majesties, many of them, some say, an incredible multitude, retired into Portugal; which it is supposed the king permitted for the sake of the immense wealth they brought with them; but some inconveniencies being felt, and many more pretended from their stay in the kingdom, they were ordered to retire in eight months^e. The queen falling ill at Setabal, the king went thither in great haste, and remained with her, as the duke of Beja and the duchess of Bragança likewise did, till she was out of danger^f. Whether it was the fatigue of the journey, his great emotion of mind, or the unwholsomeness of the season, so it was, that the king fell extremely ill; and as several black spots appeared upon his body, a report prevailed that he was poisoned^g. As soon as he was in some measure able to bear the fatigue of the journey, he went to Evora, the air of which place he thought agreed better with him than any other. There he caused several experiments to be made for the perfecting mathematical instruments in his presence; conferred with some experienced ship-builders about the different forms of vessels, and gave instructions for building two fortresses, one at Cascaes, and the other at Caparica, to cover the entrance of the bar of Lisbon: so that he might say truly of public affairs, that he made them equally his business and his amusement. His health still declining, he sent for Alvaro Pacheco and Stephen de Barras, men in whom he had the greatest confidence, and ordered them to restore to the churches the plate, and a certain public fund, which had been taken by his father, to defray the expence of the war with Castile. He likewise ordered an enquiry to be made for any debts of his father's, for he had none of his own, and directed them to be paid^c. His punctuality in these matters was highly serviceable, as it rendered it by his example the fashion.

In the midst of his pains and infirmities applies himself to affairs of state.

THE true state of the king's disease, according to the best historians, was a complication of distempers, which at length issued in a dropsy; from which in the beginning of the year he had some relaxation; and some there were about him who began to entertain hopes of his perfect recovery. He would have enjoyed this interval of ease in a higher degree, and perhaps it would have lasted longer, if he had not been vexed by the breaking out of a famine at Evora. This was not owing to any scarcity, but to the avarice of some rich men; who taking advantage of the court's being there, and having previously bought up all the corn, kept it at a high rate. The king endeavoured to reduce it by an edict, requiring it to be sold at a just price. The monopolizers, who had as little loyalty as charity, would not sell at all; which provoked the king to a great degree. He shewed, what is rarely seen, his wisdom and his resentment at the same time. He forbid by an edict the buying of corn from any Portuguese merchants on pain of death: by the same edict he took off all duties, and gave a bounty on corn brought in by strangers; which produced plenty to the people, and absolutely broke the engrossers^d. At this time Columbus, returning from America, was forced, with his squadron, into Portugal. The king no sooner heard of it, than he sent for him; and though he knew that great man was prejudiced against him, yet he treated him with great generosity and kindness; and protected him from the ill will of some who would have dispatched him^e. The king had so true a love for merit, that when he heard Silveira, who was the manager of the duke of Viseo's conspiracy, was come into Castile, he said, Silveira has so much knowlege, parts, and eloquence, that he will be well received where-ever he is. In the summer he relapsed, and was advised to go into Algarve. There he met with Alonso Silva, who came as ambassador from king Ferdinand, and whose principal business was to inform his master how long the king of Portugal might live. The king caused him to be introduced while he was looking at some horses, when striking one of them smartly on the back, "This arm, Don Alonso, says he, has still strength enough to fight a battle or two;" and, after a pause of a minute, "against the Moors." The Castilian easily apprehended the king's meaning, and answered very politely, "My master will be very well pleased with this good news; and yet more pleased when I shall acquaint him, that your majesty's health is grown still better." He demanded afterwards, and obtained a private audience: in which he opened Ferdinand's desire, that the king should enter into the league with Italy; for which he offered him many plausible reasons. In answer to this, he gave him a long and full account of the state of things in that country, entered into the characters and views of all the princes engaged on both sides, and concluded with telling him, he had as much ambition as any of them: "but my ambition," said he, is of a different kind. I mean to be a great king as well as they; but I go a shorter road to be a great king: I am for making my own a great nation. For this reason in the vigour of my life I never engaged in any of these alliances: I shall not do it in my decline; but I will be always ready to act as a mediator, and I am the fitter to act in that character as I am totally disinterested. This you may tell your master, which is all you will ever have to tell him; for I am not given to change my resolutions." But when he perceived that Alonso did not leave Portugal, he ordered him to retire to Estremos; where he had him so well watched, that he knew the contents of every dispatch he sent to Castile^f.

His anxiety about his son to the last; his death and character.

As king John felt in himself a gradual decay, he became more and more uneasy about the succession. He ordered therefore a testament to be drawn, in which he set forth his sentiments on this and on various other topics; but directed a blank to be left for the name of the successor, unable to bear the thoughts of relinquishing his son, and at the same time as unable to devise any probable means for securing to him what he had a mind to leave. At length in a fit of tenderness he ordered his secretary Antonio de Faria to fill up the blank with the name of George: but that secretary, who was a man of parts and probity, refused to do it. He told him, that it was against justice, and against reason; that the queen, the nobility, and the people, were unanimously for the duke of Beja: and that by obeying his commands, George, instead of becoming his successor, would become a sacrifice. This was the more extraordinary as Faria had a principal hand in the detection of the duke of Viseo's conspiracy, was sure of being disgraced, and not sure of saving his life, on the duke of Beja's succession. His example however determined the king; and having commended his firmness, he ordered him to insert the duke's name in the will^g. He continued to linger long after it was signed; and

- ^a though he sent for the duke more than once when he drew towards his end, yet, through fear and distrust, he did not arrive till he was dying, or, as some say, till he was dead. He added a codicil, by which he declared his son duke of Coimbra, and gave him all the lands and estates of Don Pedro, who had formerly enjoyed that title. He demised on the twenty-fifth of October 1495, in the fortieth year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign, less hated than he had been by the nobility, but admired, and even adored by the people ^b. His device was a pelican feeding her young with her blood, with these words, Pro lege et grege, i. e. "For the constitution and the commons ^c." It was truly said of his father and of him, that one was a better man than a king, and the other a better king than a man. He fixed, however, the grandeur of Portugal, and left Vasco de Gama on the point of sailing for the discovery of the Indies. His parts, or rather his abilities, eclipsed those of his predecessors, and in return were eclipsed by the virtues and the fortune of his successor ^d.

The reign of Emanuel, surnamed the Fortunate.

- ^c AT the time of his accession to the throne, Don Emanuel was with the queen his sister at Alcaçar-do-Sal, where he caused himself to be proclaimed, as soon as he was assured of the death of his predecessor ^a. He had indeed all the titles that he could wish: he was the next heir by blood: he was recognized as such by the late king in his will: he had the hearts of the nobility, and the voice of the people: he was in the twenty-sixth year of his age; agreeable in his person; courteous in his behaviour; and universally beloved for that generosity which his vast estate enabled him to shew, even in a private condition. He came to the crown, therefore, and entered into the possession of the dominions of Portugal, peaceably and without the least opposition, though there was a pretender to the crown, whose claim was never considered by any body but himself. This competitor was the emperor ^d Maximilian, whose mother was the sister, as Don Emanuel's father was the brother, of the king Don Alonso. He pleaded, therefore, that standing exactly in the same degree, he ought to be preferred to the duke of Beja, as being an older and a greater man ^b; but this had no manner of weight with the Portuguese: on the contrary, they shewed the utmost eagerness in congratulating their new king, who received every body with the greatest kindness; promised much in general, but would not enter into any particular engagements; ordered the body of his deceased predecessor to be transferred to Silves, till it could be removed to the royal abbey of Batalha; demanded of all the ministers a distinct account of their respective departments, using his private fortune, till whatever regarded the public finances could be adjusted, and neglecting nothing that could spread universal satisfaction, and dispose the bulk of the nation to love him as their benefactor, though they might not reverence and admire him as they did their late king, of whose loss they spoke as a thing that must be endured, though it could never be repaired. In this he succeeded so well, that every thing remained quiet, and the people pleased ^c (A).

(A) It will be requisite towards the understanding the history of this reign, to say somewhat of this young prince, before he ascended the throne. He was the grandson of king Edward, the nephew of Alonso the fifth, and cousin to John the second, his predecessor (1). He was the third son of the infant Don Ferdinand, duke of Viseo, by Donna Beatrix, the daughter of the infant Don Juan (2). He was born at the castle of Alchochetti, May 3, 1469, which fell that year upon a Thursday, and the feast of Corpus Christi. This young prince being born at the very instant the sacrament passed by the door, it gave occasion to his receiving the name of Emanuel or Manuel (3). He had an excellent education given him, more especially in Castile during the time he remained there as a hostage, upon the conclusion of the peace between their Catholic majesties and king John of Portugal (4). He returned into his own country about the time the duke of Bragança lost his life; and the very next year, his brother being killed by king John, he came into the possession of his estates, and by the king's desire assumed the title, not of Viseo, but of Beja (5). As he grew to man's estate, he discovered the most amiable qualities; his disposition was mild and humane; his temper naturally grave, but

ONE of the first acts of his government was, to call an assembly of the states at Monte-Mor-o-Novo, that every thing might have their sanction, and that he might the better judge of the temper of his new subjects. In this assembly a law was made, for appointing commissioners to inquire into the grants of the late king, and the services rendered by those who had obtained them; an augmentation of the number of judges, that justice might be the more speedily and effectually administered; with some others of less importance^d. He gave very early marks of his intention to act on a very different principle from that which had governed king John; and this was reviving the power of the nobility, with whose arms, in conjunction with his own, and those of the princes of the blood, he caused his halls and dining rooms to be adorned, that the populace might be gradually drawn to reverence and esteem them: a conduct publicly applauded, but privately disapproved. We have before^b observed, that the Jews were admitted into Portugal in the late reign, for which they paid a heavy capitation tax; and not being able, or not being willing, to transport themselves abroad within the time given them, had been actually made slaves, and distributed through all Portugal, by the command of king John. To these afflicted people the king extended his mercy, restored them to their liberty, and fixed a new time for their departure. In gratitude for this favour, they would have given him a sum of money, but Don Emanuel very generously refused it^c. Their Catholic majesties, Ferdinand and Isabella, sent very early an embassy to compliment the new king, to assure him of their friendship and alliance, and to propose a marriage with the princess Mary their daughter. The king treated these ministers with great respect, assured them it was his settled intention to maintain the peace between the^c two nations; but insinuated, that it was time enough to think of marriage; and that when the time came, he would intimate his inclinations to their majesties, who were not ignorant of the meaning of this; and that it respected their daughter Isabella^f. Amongst those who came to pay their addresses to the king, came Don George, who was presented to him by the grand commander Don Diego Almeyda. He was then about fourteen years of age, and had so strong a resemblance to the king his father, that when Don Emanuel had looked upon him a little time, he burst out into tears, and promised to do for him all that he could desire or expect^g. The king's behaviour encouraged the nobility; so that many of them who were under great obligations to king John, came and kissed his son's hand, which in this country is the highest mark of respect. The youth received them with great dignity, and expressed the^d same affection and obedience to the king, as if he had been his son, and had the like honours paid him as in the former reign. The king likewise sent his ambassadors to foreign princes, caused supplies and recruits to be transported into Barbary, and had the satisfaction of learning that the revolt had been happily suppressed there, and a great victory gained over the Moors, which he looked upon as a fair omen of the succeeding glories of his reign^h. His subjects had the same opinion, and a general satisfaction was diffused through the state.

As the plague continued at Lisbon, the king, as well for the sake of pleasure as for the preservation of his health, went to Setubal, where he met with his mother and his two sisters, who pressed him very warmly to restore the family of Bragança to his favour and their estates, to which he consented. This was far from being universally pleasing, though the king took all possible measures to prevent its giving just offence; for he gave those who were benefited by the forfeitures of this family, equivalents with which they were fully satisfied, and assured accompanied with an agreeable sweetness and easy affability. He was extremely punctual in every thing, rose rather before day, and after he had performed his devotions, dispatched whatever business he had to do, and then diverted himself in hunting, shooting, or tennis. He was magnificent in his house, and very elegant in his table; but at the same time very temperate, abstaining wholly from wine⁽⁶⁾. He loved music and conversation, more especially as to the mathematical sciences, travels, voyages, and discoveries, which induced the king, who really loved him more for his personal qualities than for his near relation to him, to give him, by way of augmentation to his arms, a sphere, which he made use of ever after as his impress, and placed it over his arms when he was king⁽⁷⁾. It might be accounted the first instance of his good fortune, that he was not born heir to the crown; and, perhaps, the situation in which he lived, during the reign of his cousin, was another great advantage, as it obliged him to live cautiously, and very much within bounds. It had, however, no bad effect upon his manners; he was rather serene than serious, and very far from declining any innocent diversion⁽⁸⁾. He was circumspect, without being suspicious, very grateful and just, rewarding all services that were done him, and providing for all who attended him in any capacity. In fine, free from any apparent vice, at an age when follies are most excusable; and with all this regularity in himself, very far from being severe to others⁽⁹⁾.

a his council he did not do it with a view of throwing any imputation on his predecessor's justice, but from a persuasion, that children ought not to suffer for the offences of their parents. Some of his ministers took the liberty of representing, that he not only acted contrary to the maxims of his predecessor, but impoverished the crown to purchase an estate for those he recalled; that he administered fuel to factions and discontents; and that the nobility, encouraged by this act of clemency, would begin afresh to persecute and oppress the common people. But the influence of the ladies prevailed; and Don Diego duke of Bragança, was fully reinstated in his titles and fortune¹. The king was likewise desirous of recalling cardinal da Costa from Rome, where he had resided during the reign of king John, notwithstanding, that under that of his father he had been in great credit. At first he listened to the king's b proposition, and had some thoughts of returning to his native country; but upon mature deliberation, he acquainted the king, that he should be able to render him more service where he was, and that his infirmities made it very inconvenient for him to leave Rome^k. Don Alvaro, uncle to the duke of Bragança, was employed by the king to negotiate his marriage with the princess dowager of Portugal, Donna Isabella, either because Emanuel was enamoured of her, or because he judged it probable she might become the heiress of Castile and Aragon, and consequently his issue by her, possessors of all Spain, and the most powerful monarchs in Europe. But the first is the more probable opinion, though it coincided with the latter. A. D. 1496.

Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella seemed very well inclined to this marriage, from which, Espous. Donna Isabella, who becomes heiress of the crowns of Castile and Arragon.
c however, they thought to draw this advantage, that to purchase their daughter, Don Emanuel should enter into a league with them against Charles the eighth, king of France; but the king, though very desirous of a wife, would not purchase her upon such terms, because there had been always a good correspondence between the two crowns, and the Portuguese were great gainers by their commerce; but he went so far as to promise, that if the French king should act offensively, and enter Spain with an army, he would assist their majesties to expel them. He was not so much upon his guard against the lady, who pretended that she had an utter aversion to Portugal, from the grief that she had sustained there; that to marry a second time was beneath a princess of her rank; and that she could not give her hand to one who was a protector of the Jews^l. The wiser and better part of the council opposed this, as d a measure that would be detrimental to the state, as well as inconsistent with the king's own promise to these unhappy people. Don Emanuel was desirous of pleasing both parties. By a new edict he gave the Jews leave to depart within a certain time, assigned them different parts where they were to embark, then reduced them to Lisbon only, disappointed them in furnishing ships, and by these steps obliging them to elapse the time, punished them with slavery for not doing what it was impossible they should do; but afterwards, as if it had been a mere grace and favour, they had the space of twenty years allowed them for their thorough conversion to Christianity, though in appearance they were all obliged to become Christians immediately; and upon accepting this offer, their children were restored to them, which had been taken from them, in order to prevent their embarking: a severity which they bore so e ill, that multitudes of them murdered their children to prevent their being made slaves to the Christians; and not a few, out of the horror of having done this, murdered themselves likewise: so that it is no wonder that when any expedient was proposed, by which both their liberty and their children might be preserved, they readily embraced it^m. Many of the writers who relate this, admire the wisdom, but most of them commend the zeal and firmness of the king; though it must be admitted, that the learned prelate of Algarve, and a few others, have treated this measure in the manner it deserved, and have expressed their amazement, that it could ever be thought consistent with the principles of true religion and sound policyⁿ. In consequence of this expedient, the blood and sentiments of the Portuguese nobility have been corrupted, and the severe tribunal of the inquisition made necessary, to keep numbers in f a state of religious hypocrisy, without ever making perhaps one true Christian. After the point had been fully debated in council, the king took a resolution of prosecuting the discovery of a new passage to the Indies; and gave the command of four vessels, appointed for that expedition, to Vasco de Gama, who sailed on the ninth of July, and happily accomplished it^o. In the autumn the king made a tour into Valentia, and there espoused the infant Donna Isabella, at the very same time that her brother Don Juan, prince of Asturias expired at Salamanca, by which she became the heiress of her parents dominions; and as mirth and mourning could not well agree, as soon as the news of the prince's death was made this monarch.

As many inconveniencies had been experienced by the clashing of jurisdictions, and as these had been hitherto settled by occasional inspections, of which there were but few records, the king caused a survey to be made of his whole dominions, and the bounds of every jurisdiction was therein distinctly settled, the whole being divided into five books: from whence it seems probable that Algarve was excluded. The queen becoming pregnant, their majesties were invited into Castile; and after having held the states of Portugal at Lisbon, and received a new oath of fidelity, they set out for Toledo; where the states of Castile being assembled, the queen of Portugal was acknowledged for the presumptive heir ^q. Their majesties then proceeded with the like view to Saragossa; where, on the twenty-fourth of August, Donna Isabella of Portugal was delivered of the prince Don Michael, and expired an hour afterwards ^r. Upon this Don Emanuel resolved to return into his own dominions, having first agreed to send ambassadors to Rome, who, in conjunction with those of their catholic majesties, were to admonish Pope Alexander the sixth of the scandalous life he led, and to exhort him to behave for the future with more moderation and decency. The Portuguese ambassadors were Don Rodrigo do Castro and Don Henry de Coutino, men of great quality, and consummate prudence. They prosecuted therefore the instructions they had received very exactly; but the Pope answered them so smartly, and they were so well apprized of his true character, that they judged it convenient to withdraw as soon as possible out of his reach ^s. But after this, the Pope shewed much deference and respect for the two kings.

The discovery of the Indies, happily atchieved by
Gama.

In order to satisfy the demands of their catholic majesties, the king caused his son Don Michael to be acknowledged by the states the heir of that kingdom, as he had been in Castile and Arragon; but at the same time he promised upon oath, and gave it under his hand, that no Castilian should be capable of any preferment, ecclesiastical or civil, within the kingdom of Portugal. This young prince dying soon after, put an end to all fears that this promise might not be duly executed ^t. The king, his father, applied himself with great vigilance and vigour to the care of the administration, and attended more especially to justice and the finances. The fleet of Vasco de Gama returning from the Indies, filled Lisbon with joy, and the rest of Europe with astonishment: The history of his expedition belongs to another place: it is sufficient to say here, that he performed it in something more than two years; and that of one hundred and forty-eight persons, which made up the complement of his squadron, he brought home but fifty-five. The king received him with all possible testimonies of respect and kindness, created him count of Videgueira; and not only declared him admiral of the Indies, but made that office hereditary in his family, that the reputation and reward of his discovery might go together ^u. As he had now some leisure, Don Manuel took this opportunity of removing the body of his predecessor from the town of Silves in Algarve, where it had been deposited after his decease, to the monastery of Batalha, where a beautiful tomb of white marble had been erected to his memory ^v. At his return he caused a great quantity of gold and silver to be coined, and ordered a numerous squadron to be fitted out for maintaining and extending the newly opened trade to the East Indies ^x: that what prudence had acquired might be secured by spirit.

The king promotes the son of his predecessor, and his own nephew by

As the son of the late king was now arrived at man's estate, Don Emanuel thought it high time to perform what his father seemed to expect from him at his hands; he therefore caused him to marry on the twenty-fifth of May Donna Beatrix de Velen, the daughter of Don Alvaro, of Portugal, brother to Don Ferdinand, and uncle to Diego, duke of Bragança; and upon this occasion, declared that young prince duke of Coimbra, with all the lands and revenues which had formerly accompanied that title. At the same time he created his nephew Don Alonso, the son of the duke of Viseo, whom king John killed with his own hand, constable of Portugal, and gave him in marriage Donna Joanna de Norogno, the daughter of Don Pedro de Meneses, marquis of Villa Real ^y. This young nobleman, though very high born on the side of his father, is supposed to have been as well descended on the side of his mother, who was a Castilian lady of such quality, that the historians of those times did not think it expedient to transmit her name to posterity. The king being without children, and a widower, was continually pressed by the nobility to a second marriage: in order to which he had been for some time treating with their catholic majesties for the infanta Donna Maria, whom he declined when she was offered him before; which treaty was at length brought to an issue, and the marriage portion fixed at two hundred thousand crowns, with an annuity of ^a ten thousand, established on the revenues of the port of Seville ². At this time the king meditated a formidable expedition against the Moors in Barbary, with a numerous fleet, and an army of twenty-six thousand men. This he intended to command in person, nor could the advice of his nobility, or the intreaties of his new queen, prevail upon him to lay aside this resolution. But the Venetians having represented to him, that the Turkish emperor Bajazet ^{A. D. 1500.} threatened their state with destruction, and was about to attack them with the whole force of his empire, the king very generously relinquished the plan he had laid for raising his own reputation, and declaring, that the safety of his allies, and the interest of Christendom, were infinitely dearer to him than his own glory, he ordered a squadron of thirty sail, with a proportionable number of troops, to join the fleet of the republic, in order to act against the Turks ³.

^b The king being very desirous of promoting to the utmost the welfare of his nephew the duke of Bragança, whom he looked upon as his presumptive heir, laboured to find out a fit match for him, as the most effectual means of diverting that melancholy with which he was afflicted sometimes to such a degree, that, forgetting to take proper sustenance, he was in danger of being lost for want of food. At length the king fixed on Donna Leonora de Guzman, daughter to the duke of Medina Sidonia, whom, in obedience to his majesty's commands, Don Diego married; but soon after disappeared, and left a letter for the king, in which he desired that his majesty would bestow his honours and estates on his brother Don Denis, as he was determined to travel to, and spend the rest of his days at Jerusalem. Don Emanuel, however, caused him to be so carefully sought after, that he was discovered in the kingdom of Arragon, and sent back; when the king received him with so much affection, that he was prevailed upon to lay aside the scheme he had formed; and lived ever after in a manner suitable to his birth and quality ^b (B). The squadron sent to the assistance of the Venetians, stood first over to the Barbary shore, and attempted to surprize Mazalquivir: but the Moors making a gallant resistance, and the Portuguese having suffered some loss, Don Juan de Meneses, count of Tarouca, thought it best to pursue his voyage; and after scouring the coasts of Sardinia and Calabria, he bore away for the island of Corfu, where the Venetian fleet was to rendezvous. There his soldiers beginning to intrigue with the women of the country, the inhabitants fell upon them and killed seventy. However, the Venetian and Portuguese fleets joining, and going in search of the Turkish force, Bajazet thought fit to drop his design, and to order his fleet to return into port. Soon after which, the Portuguese squadron set sail for Lisbon; and soon after them arrived an ambassador from the republic, to acknowledge and thank the king for this timely and effectual succour ^c. This year Pedro Alvarez de Cabral discovered in his passage to India the noble country of Brazil, in South America, and having anchored in Porto Seguro, took possession of it for the crown of Portugal, to which it still belongs. The king also founded the famous monastery of Bethlehem, justly esteemed one of the finest edifices in Portugal ^d (C). He shews the like regard for the duke of Bragança his nephew by the sister.

(B) This Don Diego, duke of Bragança, had an excellent education in Castile, where he was treated with much kindness and respect. However, the misfortunes of his family depressed his spirits so much, that notwithstanding the sudden change of his condition, and the great affection which the king shewed for him, he was very restless and uneasy. In 1498, when Don Emanuel went into Castile, he declared this duke heir to the crown of Portugal, in case he died without children. It was with a view to dissipate this melancholy, that the king in a manner forced him into a marriage with Donna Leonora de Guzman, and forced him afterwards to live with that lady, instead of passing his days, as he intended to have done, in a hermitage near Jerusalem. By degrees, however, this had its effect, and he shook off in a great measure that melancholy which was the sole effect of his disposition. The constant kindness of the king contributed not a little to it, for he appointed him frequently to represent his royal person; put him at the head of the great army he sent into Africa, and omitted nothing that could serve to convince him of the sincerity of his sentiments. By the lady before-mentioned, he had a son and a daughter; the name of the former was Theodosius, who succeeded him in his titles; and of the latter Isabella, who espoused the infant Don Duarte, son to king Ema- nuel. After the demise of his first duchess, Don Diego fell in love with Donna Joanna, the daughter of Don Diego de Mendoza, governor of Moura, by whom he had four sons, and several daughters, whose names we shall mention as briefly as possible, because the succession in this family is absolutely necessary to be thoroughly known, for the clearer understanding of the succeeding part of this history. Don Diego de Bragança, who died without issue; Don Constantine de Bragança, great chamberlain to king John the third, his ambassador in France, and viceroy of the Indies, who espoused Donna Maria de Meneses, daughter of Don Rodrigro de Mello, marquis de Ferreira, by whom he had no issue; Fulgencio, prior of Guimaraez, who left two natural children; and Theoton, archbishop of Evora. The daughters were Donna Francisca, who became a canoness at Evora; Donna Angelica, abbess of Villa Viciosa; Donna Joanna, who married the duke de Maqueda; Donna Eugena, who married Don Francisco de Mello, marquis de Ferreira; Donna Maria, abbess of Villa Viciosa; and Donna Vincenta, who became a nun in that monastery.

(C) The proper name of this noble foundation is Bethlehem, but the Portuguese spell and pronounce it Bellem. There is a town, a monastery, and a fort, all of this name, which lie between four and five miles from Lisbon, on the river Tagus; but the monastery

THE king, though the commerce of the Indies had not as yet produced any thing comparable to the expectations that had been formed from it, continued to send squadrons thither well manned, and with great store of naval and military provisions, not doubting that in process of time it would amply repay that expence; at which some of the narrow minded amongst his subjects grievously repined. He also continued to meditate an expedition of more importance into Barbary than had been made by any of his predecessors; to which he was instigated by the memoirs left by king John; in which it was insinuated, that the opposite coasts of Africa were first to be conquered, then covered by fortresses, next adorned with cities and sea-ports, to which inhabitants might be drawn by gentle laws and extensive privileges, which would gradually produce a communication between the interior parts of the country and strangers resorting to the cities and havens, to the inconceivable benefit of the subjects of Portugal; which, far from being impoverished by the expence, or weakened by the sending out, would, in the compass of a single reign, be greatly enriched by her conquests, and strengthened by her colonies. He laboured also to repair and restore such places as were in a manner depopulated by the plague, and by reviewing the charters of the principal cities and towns in his dominions, to repress what, through a change of customs, was become grievous, to supply defects, and to insert new privileges^c. While he was thus employed, the queen, on the sixth of June, was delivered of a prince, in the midst of one of the most violent storms that was ever felt or heard; and as this, according to the superstition of those times, gave birth to many strange notions, so these were strengthened and increased when the prince came to be baptized, on account of a fire breaking out in the palace, which threw all things into confusion^f. The king, full of piety, according to the mode of those times, made a solemn pilgrimage to the shrine of St. James at Compostella. In his passage thither, he directed the finishing a most beautiful tomb in the city of Porto, for St. Pantaleo, the patron of that place, which had been begun by the late king^g. At the cathedral of St. James he left a noble silver lamp, in the shape of a castle, valuable from its weight, much more so from its workmanship; and distinguished himself by liberally relieving the poor where-ever he came^h. In his return through Coimbra he saw there the sepulchre of Don Alonso, the first king of Portugal, with the meanness of which he was so much affected, that he directed a new one, worthy of himself and of the memory of the great prince whose remains were to rest thereinⁱ. The fleet he had sent to Africa, with orders to reduce a certain fortress, returned without doing any thing. Notwithstanding which, he was received upon his return to Lisbon, with all possible marks of satisfaction and joy^k. In this he might be truly stiled Fortunate; for whatever were the issue of his designs, his subjects were so thoroughly persuaded of the rectitude of his intentions, that they were equally grateful for what they actually received, and for what, if it had been in his power, they knew their king meant to bestow.

gave its name to the other two. The church, which at a distance appears a most stupendous fabric, is allowed to be a most correct and finished structure, when surveyed with the greatest care. It is not so much worthy of the great Emanuel from its beauty and magnificence, though there can be scarce any thing more splendid, as from the boldness of the design, and the success with which it is executed. It is the true picture of its founder, sublime and striking, but at the same time regular and harmonious. His tomb, and that of the queen Donna Maria, are very fine; as are indeed all the monuments that adorn this sacred structure, which are many in number, princes and princesses of the blood being interred here, as well as kings and queens; with this difference, that the tombs of the latter are supported by elephants, and adorned with crowns and escutcheons. The cloister belongs to the order of St. Jerom, capable of holding two hundred monks, who have very spacious and airy apartments, which look either upon the sea, or upon beautiful orange gardens, that equally charm the sight and smell. The revenue of this convent amounts to about eight thousand ducats; and besides those vast and elegant gardens, that serve for pleasure and amusement, there is a very large park, capable of supplying them with corn, wine, and fruits of every kind. This park is compleatly walled round; and not only the church and convent, but every building dependant on them, is of hewn stone. There is in its vicinity another building, large, neat and wonderfully convenient, into which are received all such gentlemen as have spent their lives in the king's service, without acquiring wherewith to maintain themselves. At their admittance they receive the order of Christ, which is the most noble in Portugal; and, during the remainder of their lives, enjoy every thing that can render their decline comfortable; a good table, pleasant apartments, suitable diversions, cheerful conversation, with strict attendance; and in case of sickness, the assistance of physicians, surgeons, and nurses, all of whom treat them with a respect due to persons honoured with the express protection of the crown, according to the solemn institution of Don Emanuel, whose design it was that they should not be relieved there, but rewarded. Over against the church and cloister, but in the middle of the river, there stands a large square tower, which may be considered as the citadel of Lisbon, as all ships that pass are obliged to salute it, and to produce their bills of health at their arrival, and proper certificates when they depart. The place of arms is extremely well fortified, and supplied with artillery. The lower stories of the fort are employed as magazines, and the upper furnish apartments for prisoners of state. The village or town of Bellem has risen from the great resort to the places already described.

- ^a THE new project which the king had formed for going in person to Africa, was frustrated by the breaking out of a famine in his own dominions; by which he was obliged to divide his fleet into small squadrons, in order to send them to the coasts of Africa, Sicily, Sardinia, France, Great Britain, Germany, and the north, to bring in supplies of corn, without which his people must have been famished ¹. This misfortune did not hinder him from sending some missionaries over to Congo, with instructions to civilize the people, and to bring them as much as possible to relish their own manners and way of living; and to engage the king to send over some of his sons to be educated at Lisbon, that by extending these notions, their commerce with that kingdom, which was very beneficial, might be increased. By the return of Vasco de Gama, who had been sent again into the Indies, with a very rich cargo to Lisbon, an end was put to all the objections and suspicions concerning that trade: the importance of which was now become conspicuous even to the meanest understanding ^m. Amongst men of family and parts the spirit of discovery prevailed rather too strongly. About two years before Gaspar Cotereal, a young gentleman of birth and genius, fitted out a ship at his own expence, which he commanded in person; and that he might not be reproached with thrusting his sickle into another man's harvest, bent his course to North America; and sailing along the coast, which he found inhabited by a barbarous people, but very pleasant, and capable of great improvements, he bestowed upon it the name of Greenland: and returning home, fitted out another vessel, with an intent to settle there, but was never heard of more. His brother Michael went in search of him, and had the like fate; and this year a third brother would have taken the same route, if the king had not interposed. From these brothers those coasts are entitled Tierre de Cotereal. The king had directed Don Juan de Meneses and the count de Tarouca to reduce the fortrefs of Alcaçer-quivir, which the king of Fez had augmented, with a view to bridle Arzila; and they attempted it, and shewed in that attempt all the courage and skill possible, but without effect; for in truth their force bore no proportion to the undertaking. At home Don Emanuel called an assembly of the states at Lisbon; where, notwithstanding affairs were but in an untoward situation, yet their desire of obliging that monarch was so strong, that they granted him all he demanded; together with a free gift of fifty thousand cruzadoes for the war in Africa: they likewise acknowledged Don Juan in quality of heir apparent ⁿ. On the fourth of October the queen was delivered of the infant Isabella, afterwards empress and queen of Castile and Arragon ^o. As soon as the states separated, the king went to Tomar, where he held a chapter of the order of Christ, and reformed many abuses. A. D. 1503.

- Don Emanuel* was extremely affected by the death of his nephew the constable, who left behind him an only daughter, who married into the house of Villa Real: but this loss did not affect the public so much as that of the queen's mother, Donna Isabella of Castile ^p: for Don Emanuel being well apprised of the character of the archduke Philip, and of those about him, began to entertain so slender an opinion of his friendship, that he gave orders for repairing all the strong places on the frontiers towards Castile. It is not, however, certain, that he carried his suspicion of this prince so high, as to enter into any negotiation with Don Ferdinand, king of Arragon, in order to a marriage between him and the unfortunate Donna Joanna, who had formerly born the title of queen of Castile. In Africa Don Juan Meneses forced the Moorish port at the mouth of the river Larache, carried out ships that lay therein, which, with other excursions by land, very deservedly raised his character; but did not much advance the design of Don Emanuel, or any other solid and valuable purpose. The inclemency of the season was rather more remarkable this year than the last; more especially at the entrance of the autumn, when several shocks of an earthquake were felt with such violence, that the people abandoned the towns and fled into the mountains; where being saluted with the same terrors, they descended into the plains, and remained under tents and cabins till the approach of winter. On the last day of the year, the queen was delivered of the infant Donna Beatrix, who became afterwards duchess of Savoy ^q. 1504.

- ^f As the situation of things in India required a superior force, the king caused a better fleet, and a greater number of troops to be sent thither under the command of Don Francisco de Almada; than at any time before; and if it had not been for his consummate prudence in this respect, it is highly probable the Portuguese had been beat out almost as soon as they had entered into India. For the Mohammedan princes there, and particularly the king of Aben, who pretended to be descended from their prophet, applied themselves to Campson, soltan of the Mamalukes in Egypt, requesting him to protect them against the Christians. At the same time there were at the court of the soltan ambassadors from the republic of Venice, who likewife prompted him to drive the Portuguese out of the Indies; and who, to render this the more practicable, supplied him with engineers to cast cannon, and to build ships in the ports of the Red Sea. By their advice also the sultan sent a monk, whose name was Maurus, with letters to the Pope, then Julius the second, complaining bitterly of the conquest of Granada, by Don Ferdinand, and the expedition of Don Emanuel into Africa and the Indies, threatening to make reprisals on the Christians, and intimating, that unless he had satisfaction, he might not find himself safe even at Rome. The Pope sent copies of these letters to Lisbon and to Madrid; but neither of the kings seemed to be much affected: on the contrary, they exhorted his holiness to do his duty, and publish a crusade, which would infallibly furnish a number of men sufficient to defend him against all his enemies. In the assembly of the states held this year many good laws were made for encouraging industry and frugality, and for preserving equality among the people. Amongst these there was one very remarkable: the king forbade hospitaliers to purchase lands without licence, under severe penalties; because it was discovered that taking advantage of people's necessities, they purchased on every side, and as they had no power of selling, were amassing vast estates. About this time arrived from the Indies, Duarte Pacheco, who had performed there actions almost beyond the power or the belief of man. The king, to shew him how much he esteemed virtue, did him the highest honours, and not only caused a thanksgiving to be celebrated for his victories, but made him walk by his side to church, upon that occasion. After this, understanding that honour was all that he had brought with him from the Indies, he appointed him governor of the castle St. George del Mina, upon the coast of Guiney; where, performing his duty exactly, some envious persons accused him of such atrocious crimes, that he was ordered home in irons, long confined, at last tried, and acquitted; and left innocent and indigent to the contemplation of that antient maxim, Virtue is its own reward. So easily are even the best princes misled by flatterers. While the king fled from place to place for fear of the plague, which was brought into Portugal by the Pope's ambassador, some excursions were made in Barbary, but of no great consequence; from whence the king was more and more confirmed in his opinion, that his great design could not be carried into execution but by transporting a considerable force, and making a considerable conquest at once, towards the expence of which he had received a bull of crusade.

A. D. 1505.

Dangerous sedition at Lisbon.

THE court being at Abrantes to avoid the infection, there happened a dismal misfortune at Lisbon, where some zealous persons observing in a church that the glass which covered a hole in the side of a crucifix seemed to shine, cried out, "A miracle!" A Jew, who had been but lately converted, happened unluckily to say, it was the reflection of the sun beams, which fell from an opposite window. This made a prodigious disturbance, and two seditious monks exciting the people to take vengeance of the Jews, they murdered about five hundred of them that day. The men from on board some French and Dutch ships in the river landed and joined the mob, and bringing with them a new spirit of devotion, which directed them to the richest houses, without making any distinction of Jew or Christian, murdering and plundering without mercy. A recruit of villains of the same stamp out of the villages, entered Lisbon, and committed the most horrid outrages during the third day; so that in the whole there perished upwards of two thousand persons, the most part Jews. The king being informed of this, sent commissioners, with a corps of troops to support them. On a strict enquiry the magistrates were deposed, such of the ringleaders as could be found hanged, the two monks degraded and burnt, and the city deprived of all its privileges. As for the French and Dutch, who had been the most active, as soon as they had loaded their ships with plunder, they sailed away, and thereby escaped the due reward of so infamous an action. While their majesties were at Abrantes, the queen was delivered of the infant Don Lewis. The king being informed of the arrival of the archduke Philip in Spain, sent to compliment him, which was very well received: and in Africa, the Portuguese commanders, who began to be as great proficient in intrigue as the Moors themselves, surprised the port of Saffi, which they kept and fortified, esteeming it a very considerable conquest.

Affairs in dispute with Castile, left to the determination of commissioners on both sides.

By the king's great application to whatever regarded the extension of his power in the Indies, his influence in Congo, and the commerce of his subjects in Guiney, immense wealth was brought into Portugal, and the port of Lisbon grew one of the most considerable in Europe, and this, notwithstanding the plague still prevailed. The king and court remained at Abrantes: there, on the fifth of July, the queen brought into the world the infant Don Ferdinand. Some disputes having arisen with the crown of Castile, in relation to their conquests in Africa, Don Emanuel applied himself to his father-in-law, to prevent things from coming to extre-

a. mities, and offering to leave all points in dispute to be settled by their commissaries, which was accepted. The prince of Mequinez being driven out of his dominions, fled for shelter to Don Emanuel, and promised to put the strong city of Azemor into his hands, if he would intrust him with a proper force. The king consented to this, and embarked four thousand horse, and two thousand foot for this expedition, which, however, came to nothing, and which some also place in the succeeding year. It had, however, one good effect, which was, that the king determined with himself not to confide any more in such renegadoes; and indeed; hitherto, all the conquests he had made in Barbary had been so expensive, that if the nation had not been enriched in another manner than formerly, they must have been abandoned ².

b. As the famous Albuquerque was now in the Indies, the concerns of the Portuguese went to their wish, and the advantages derived from thence enabled Don Emanuel to gratify his passion for building, and indeed for every other branch of magnificence ³. At the same time, however, he was very careful in sending over annual supplies, well knowing how many and how powerful enemies he had to withstand, since it may be truly affirmed, that the Mohammedans were more firmly united, and much more formidable in those parts at this juncture, than they have been at any time since; and that this power of theirs was entirely broke and defeated by the Portuguese, without the assistance of any European ally, and when there were no Christians but themselves in the Indies. The commissaries that had been appointed to treat with the Castilians came at last to this agreement, that Velez de la Gomera should be their common frontier; and that all the country eastward should be considered as appertaining to the crown of Castile; while the same right was to be acknowledged in the crown of Portugal; as to the countries lying west. But while they were settling these imaginary bounds of empire, the king of Fez, at the head of upwards of one hundred thousand men; invested Arzila; and though Vasco Coutigno, count of Borba, made a gallant defence, and gave immediate notice of his danger to the Portuguese admiral, and to the governor of Tangier, yet he found it absolutely necessary for his own preservation to abandon the town, and to retire with the remains of his garrison into the castle: the news of which affected Don Emanuel to such a degree, that he ordered an army to assemble in Algarve, to which kingdom he posted in person, and directed as many ships as could be got ready to be sent thither from Lisbon. All his endeavours, and all his expedition, however, had proved ineffectual; if Don Ferdinand of Arragon had not employed the whole force he had in Africa, under the command of the famous Don Pedro Navarro, for the assistance of the Portuguese, who, by this timely support, were so much encouraged, and behaved themselves so gallantly; that they constrained the king of Fez to set fire to his new conquest; and to retire with his army, which had suffered prodigiously during the course of the siege. This welcome news reached Don Emanuel at Tavira, where in a very short space he had assembled twenty thousand men, and was on the very point of embarking; but the Portuguese nobility representing to him the impropriety of such an expedition, in the present circumstances of his kingdom, he was prevailed upon to lay it aside, chiefly from the apprehension that those who gave him this advice in Europe might make him repent the not following it, if he carried them against their wills into Africa ^b.

c. Don Ferdinand Coutigno, a nobleman of great personal merit, was sent with fifteen sail of large ships into the Indies, with orders to regulate all disputes between Almeyda and Albuquerque; to send the former home, and to put the latter into full possession of the supreme power in those parts, the factions amongst the Portuguese having already produced great inconveniences ^c. On the twenty-third of April, the queen was delivered at Evora of the infant Don Alonso ^d. The war in Africa still continued, though the Portuguese writers are silent upon it; and the king of Fez, having raised another formidable army, disposed every thing for the siege of Arzila in such a manner, that the place had very probably been taken, if the count de Borba had not very wisely had recourse to those who were nearest him for their assistance. The town of Xerez sent him three hundred cross bow-men; arms, ammunition, and provision in plenty came from the city of Seville; and Michael Soler, admiral of Arragon, hastened thither with a small squadron of gallies, upon which the king of Fez finding the enterprize more difficult than he had conceived, retired and dismissed his forces ^e. There was at this time a French corsair, whose name was Mondragon, who with a squadron of four sail of stout ships, took, without much ceremony; whatever vessels came in his way, and amongst others made free with a Portuguese Indiaman; very richly laden. The king complained of this to Lewis the twelfth, then engaged in the league of Cambray against the Venetians, and not receiving such an answer as he expected, ordered Duarte Pacheco with six ships to go in search of the corsair, with whom he came up off Cape Finisterre. Mondragon, whose trade was fighting, behaved very gallantly; but Pacheco having sunk his own ship, and taken him prisoner, soon made himself master of the other three, and returned to Lisbon in triumph, with the pirate in chains. Don Emanuel, however, having received full satisfaction, and having taken an oath of Mondragon to respect the Portuguese flag for the future, set him at liberty: but what reward Pacheco had for this gallant service does not appear. This year Luis de Camoens, the prince of Portuguese poets, was born ^f.

An inconsiderate jealousy hinders the catholic king from deposing the monarch of Fez.

A. D. 1510.

THE affairs of India and Africa entirely occupied the mind of Don Emanuel, as indeed, considering the posture in which they were, they very well might, since Albuquerque, though a viceroy only of the Portuguese monarch, had a mind capable of as great projects as any of the ancient conquerors; and with a very inconsiderable force had extended the Portuguese empire from the streights of Babelmandel to those of Molacca. From hence it is certain, that prodigious advantages accrued to Portugal; but it is no less certain, that it cost infinite pains to Don Emanuel to supply annual squadrons and armies to maintain and preserve those conquests. On the other hand, in Africa the Portuguese had to deal with a very great monarch, or, to speak with greater propriety, with the whole Moorish nation, who, if it had not been for the feuds and factions amongst themselves, might easily have dispossessed them of the places they held upon the coast, and have afterwards found them sufficient employment at home. As it was, the Christians, if they had not imitated the conduct of the Moors, might have done much more than they did; and yet what they did was very amazing, and was purely the effects of their troops being better disciplined, and better commanded than those of the infidels. Hence, in the space of two years, the attempts made to recover Safia, Tangier, and Arzila, though made with forces out of comparison greater than those of the Portuguese, all miscarried, and served only to raise the credit of the Portuguese governors ^e. In the midst of this success, however, it was discovered, that the king Don Ferdinand of Arragon, and regent of Castile, had great designs upon that country; and, with a view to carry these into execution, was assembling a great fleet and army at Malaga. The design was indeed worthy of the vast talents of that able prince, who had formed a project for deposing the king of Fez, and making the empire of Morocco tributary to him, which was discovered and defeated by the jealousy of the Portuguese. Their historians in general fall in with the prejudices of their monarch, and forgetting the succours so generously given by Ferdinand, and without which, at this time, they had not preserved a foot of land in Africa, exclaim against his perfidy in forming a scheme of conquest within the bounds assigned to Portugal, as if it would not have been infinitely more for their interest to have had for their neighbour, a prince tributary to their king's father-in-law, than a potent monarch, whom, without assistance, they were unable to oppose. Ferdinand finding his project discovered, and Don Emanuel highly offended, yielded to the solicitations of his own nobility, who earnestly dissuaded him from this expedition ^d. He then sent ambassadors into Portugal, to press Don Emanuel to enter into a league against the French king, which, however, he very wisely declined, as having no quarrel with that prince, and a great trade with his subjects; and for this reason, he received the same year into his ports a squadron of French gallies, and supplied them with all necessaries ⁱ. As from the beginning of his reign he had maintained a close correspondence with England, and as Henry the eighth and himself had married two sisters, that monarch thought fit to send him the ensigns of the garter, unto which he had been elected the year before ^k: but it is not clear at what time he was installed.

Duke of Bragança's expedition into

On the last of January, the queen Donna Maria was delivered at Lisbon of the infant Don Henry, who in process of time became a cardinal, and at length the last king of Portugal of this family. It was observed, that at the time of his birth there fell a large and deep snow, a thing in Portugal very unusual. The king of Congo, upon whom the Portuguese had bestowed the name of Don Alonso, and who with great piety and industry had laboured the conversion of his subjects, sent over his son Don Henry, his brother Don Emanuel, and several of the young nobility of his kingdom, to be educated in Portugal; as also his cousin Don Pedro, a person more in years, and of riper judgment, who was to go in quality of his ambassador to Rome ^m. In Barbary the war was still carried on with various success, and great effusion of blood on both sides, though at Fez and at Lisbon they meditated putting an end to this war of excursion, which served only to ruin the territories and destroy the subjects of either crown ⁿ.

As the preceding cold season had purged the air, and entirely freed Portugal from any epidemic disease, the king applied himself with great diligence to restore and repeople the a cities, towns, and villages that were most decayed, which he did by granting large privileges to the inhabitants, and such as should become so. He sent Don Pedro, the ambassador of the king of Congo, to Rome, and with him the black prince, Don Henry, with a very handsome retinue, that the Pope might be sensible of the honour paid him by this African prince. But the great business of this year was the assembling a fleet and army, to be transported to Barbary: the former was very numerous; and the latter consisted of eighteen thousand foot, and two thousand six hundred horse: the whole commanded by Don Diego duke of Bragança, who had orders to reduce the city of Azamor, and the country round it. He arrived before the place towards the end of August, reduced it in one day, and having put the affairs of the Portuguese in that part of the world into perfect order, returned again into Portugal, where he was very kindly received by the king, though many blamed him for not doing more; but the duke's sentiment was, that he who did what he was directed to do always did enough. He was likewise persuaded, that to march to Morocco, as he was advised, might not have been very practicable, considering how far the season was advanced; and as the only thing that could render it so was the intestine troubles amongst the Moors, he suspected that such a march might serve to unite them; and as soon as this was done, he knew very well that himself and his army must be reduced to great extremity, and perhaps might find it impracticable to fight their way back.

A. D. 1513.

It appeared to Don Emanuel a fit thing to send the first-fruits of the Indies to the Pope. Leo the tenth was then seated on the pontifical throne, and being himself the most magnificent prince of his time, the Portuguese monarch was very careful in the contrivance of this embassy; so that it might not barely raise the admiration, but strike the whole city of Rome with astonishment. Tristan da Cunha, a man of great quality and vast fortune, was at the head of this legation, and with him were conjoined Diego Pacheco, and Juan de Faria, two eminent civilians, very eloquent, and perfectly versed in the arts of negotiation. He followed in this respect the example of his predecessor Don John, who never failed to join a person of capacity and experience with the man of rank and parade; and the propriety of this caution never appeared more evidently than in the very case before us. For Tristan da Cunha conducted the pomp of his entry so handsomely, and the two lawyers managed their conferences with such dexterity, that they brought a bull from the Pope, which left the clergy in a manner at the king's mercy; insomuch that they exclaimed his holiness had been surprized and over-reached: but the king managed prudently, and instead of carrying things to extremities, demanded one hundred and fifty thousand cruzadoes in three years: to which the ecclesiastics submitted, and the king had the honour of obliging those whom he might have oppressed. The king shewed his magnanimity and justice in particular: the empire of Abyssinia, or Ethiopia, was then governed by a young prince whose name was David, under the tutelage of his grand-mother Helena, a princess of great wisdom and spirit; they sent one Matthew, an Armenian, with the title of ambassador, to Albuquerque, viceroy of the Indies, and desired that he would find him a passage in an honourable manner with their letters to the court of Portugal, which he did accordingly; but the captain with whom the ambassador sailed, having a pique at Albuquerque, treated him with the utmost contempt and ill usage, because he would not produce to him the letters from the emperor and empress, and laboured to represent him as an adventurer and an impostor. But when Matthew arrived at Lisbon, he not only produced Albuquerque's letters, but authentic credentials, which he kept concealed in a hollow cane; and the presents sent by their Ethiopian majesties, which consisted of some medals, and a crucifix in a gold box. On the whole, Don Emanuel was so well satisfied, that he caused the captain and some other officers to be put in irons, and would have punished them more severely, if the ambassador, towards whom they had behaved so ill, had not interposed in their behalf. This year likewise the Portuguese arms were wonderfully successful in Barbary; where, with the assistance of the Moors who adhered to them, they made themselves masters of several considerable places, routed the armies of the kings of Fez and Mequinez in the field, and raised the glory of Don Emanuel there, as it was already raised every where else, much beyond that of his predecessors. So soon does a small kingdom come to make a figure, when governed by a wise prince.

The wealth that flowed in annually not only from the Indies, but from the commerce which their intercourse with the Indies brought to the port of Lisbon, began to change the condition of Don Emanuel's subjects of all ranks, and to introduce gradually all the vices derived from opulence ill applied. Those who had been long out of the kingdom, and by mere dint of military discipline cut out for themselves honours and fortunes with their swords, were not indeed infected with idleness and luxury ; but a spirit of arrogance and rapine had spread amongst them to a very high degree. Some advantage they had gained over the Moors upon the coast Ataida ; and Sousa formed a project of taking Morocco, a place of great extent, well fortified, and with a better garrison than they had an army. The consequence of this expedition might have been easily foreseen : they were repulsed with loss, and retired, not without some difficulty. Their historians indeed represent the Moors as trembling in the pursuit of a flying enemy, which is plainly the language of partiality ^a. This was not the only abortive enterprize even on that side ; for the king being informed that it would be of great consequence to have a strong fortress at the mouth of the river Mamora, equipped a fleet of two hundred sail, laden with all the materials for erecting such a fortification, with several thousand workmen, and a good escort, under the command of Don Pedro Noroño. The king of Fez, apprehending the mischiefs that must attend such a new establishment, marched with a numerous army to oppose them ; but that it consisted of fourscore thousand men, as the most moderate of the Portuguese writers assert, is not very probable. However, as the best part of Don Pedro's forces consisted of volunteers, who quitted the pleasures of Lisbon, and other great cities, to make a military tour, they were quickly tired of the hardships they underwent, and excessively harrassed by the continual attacks of the infidels ; so that at length they were disposed to mutiny : of which the king having an account, sent Don Pedro orders to abandon the half-built fortress, and to make the best retreat he could ; which the Portuguese authors own was attended with a considerable loss of men, and of credit, as well as the entire disappointment of the project, which mortified the king extremely ^w ; for he was exceedingly tender in these points, and bore such reverses but indifferently.

Is deceived into disgracing the famous Albuquerque, who thereupon broke his heart.

A. D. 1515.

YET even this was not the most sensible mortification of the year ; the enemies of the famous Albuquerque, after long endeavouring, at length compleated his disgrace. They insinuated, that the title of Great, which his actions had acquired, was not to be endured in a subject : they magnified the reverence paid him by the most potent monarchs of the East : they hinted, that the fame of Albuquerque already surpassed that of Emanuel : they gave the king to understand, that authority might be easily brought to follow fame. The consequence was, that he appointed him a successor in a manner that was far enough from being agreeable ; and this broke the heart of a hero, whom, without injury to the Greek conqueror, the Portuguese had compared to Alexander. In his last moments he recommended his natural son to his master, who by his kindness and gratitude towards him, confessed that he made some atonement at the same time for his weakness. The monarchs of the East, from a true spirit of greatness, did honour to the memory of Albuquerque by public mourning, and taught his countrymen to know what a victim had been offered to envy ^x. On the seventh of September the king's family was increased by the birth of the infant Don Duarte ; and the queen endeared herself to the people by distributing large sums to the poor upon this occasion ^y.

So much displeased with the disappointments in Africa as to think of abandoning it.

By the death of his catholic majesty Don Ferdinand, the court of Portugal was thrown into mourning. The king immediately sent an ambassador into Castile, to compliment the queen, Donna Germana, and to console her for the loss of her husband ; which minister was also directed to confer with cardinal Ximenes, of whose friendship the king had received many proofs ^z. The king sent likewise ambassadors into Flanders and Germany, to compliment the archduke Charles, and to offer him his daughter Donna Isabella ; and to pay the like respects to his grandfather the emperor Maximilian, with whose daughter, the princess Leonora, he proposed a match for the prince of Portugal, Don John ^a. In Africa the war still continued : the Moors formed a very right judgment of their affairs, which induced the kings of Fez and Mequinez to assemble great armies, and having joined them, to attempt the conquest of Arzila. Coutigno, son to the count of Borba, the first Portuguese governor of that city and fortress, defended it very bravely, till, by dispatching expresses on every side, he procured such reinforcements as rendered taking the place impracticable : upon which the Moors raised the siege. The alarm this gave in Portugal, and the necessity there was of accepting the assistance of the Castilians, displeased Don Emanuel ; who was become sick of seeing all the treasures of the Indies buried in this war of Afric, from whence there resulted nothing. His disgust was increased by the revolt of a great part of the Moors, who had submitted to him ; against whom he sent Alvaro Ataida, a very brave man, who, with the far greater part of his forces, were cut to pieces in this expedition. This soured the king to such a degree, that he was on the point of forming a resolution of abandoning the affairs of Barbary entirely ; but it happened that Jehabentafus, the most considerable of the Moors that had embraced the Por-

^a Portuguese interests, was then at Lisbon. He went to the king, and told him, that it was both cheaper, and more advantageous to him, to manage a war on the other side of the sea than in his own dominions; that without doubt his countrymen had been guilty of some perfidy; but that it was also possible the Portuguese had been guilty of oppression: that his majesty had nothing to do but to appoint another general, with whom he would go over; and restore things to a perfect state of quiet^b. The king thereupon named Pedro Mascarenhas, with whom went the Moor, who performed punctually, and with great honour, all that he had promised. The great progress of the Portuguese arms, more especially under the direction of Albuquerque, had taught the Persians to court the friendship of Don Emanuel; who, by the advice of that great and wise man, had sent an ambassador thither; and this year the shah sent a minister into Portugal, to signify how much he esteemed the friendship of Don Emanuel, and how willing he was to enter into the closest engagements against the Turks, whom they regarded as their common enemy^c. This would have been at any time pleasing to Don Emanuel; but was particularly so at this juncture, on the account of the prodigious force with which the sultan of Egypt was preparing to attack the Portuguese settlements in the Indies, by land and sea, of which the king had received notice from the knights of Rhodes; as also that the Mameluke fleet and army was well supplied with Italian gunners and engineers. It was therefore of very great consequence to hinder the shah from entering into this confederacy, and of still greater to engage him in an alliance from whence many advantages might result. Add to all this, that the very appearance of the Persian ambassador at Lisbon did not a little raise the credit of Don Emanuel throughout all Europe. On the seventh of September the queen Donna Maria was delivered of the infant Don Antonio; but with such difficulty, that she fell into a weak and languishing condition, which baffled the art of her physicians; and the child also proved weak and sickly, and did not long survive^d. A. D. 1516.

DONNA Maria queen of Portugal, having lingered to the seventh of March with an incurable imposthume in the bowels, deceased, to the great grief not only of the king, and of her family, but of the people of Portugal in general, who admired her virtues, and who adored her humility^e. The king was so much afflicted that for some days he gave no audiences. At length the urgency of affairs requiring it, he returned to the management of business, and found in application that ease which he had sought in vain from a retreat. Human policy can never see far, and is sometimes very short-sighted. The empire which had been the object of Don Emanuel's jealousy but a year before, now alarmed him by its fall. A revolution of this kind with respect to a prince, would not have been without example; but in regard to a nation it was very extraordinary. Selim, emperor of the Turks, in one battle broke the power, and in a short time after utterly subverted the government of the Mamelukes; and thereby added the famous and fertile kingdom of Egypt to the rest of his dominions. This astonished the rest of the princes of Europe; but it alarmed Don Emanuel. He saw the consequences, and remonstrated to Pope Leo the tenth, how much it was his duty to compose all quarrels in Christendom, in order to consider of the most effectual methods for reducing the power of the infidels. The Pope accepted his advice kindly; and made some efforts in the pursuit of it: but other kings were not so easily awakened: they just opened their eyes to look about them, and then sunk into their lethargy. Don Emanuel, who was in earnest, and who had actually begun to prepare both a fleet and an army, when he saw it could not be used against the Turks, sent it under the command of Don Diego Lopez de Siqueira, to act against the Moors in Barbary. His design was to take the city of Targa, which might have been very useful as a place of arms, in carrying on the war against the king of Fez; but Don Diego differing with the governor of Ceuta, who was to have assisted him, the enterprize came to nothing, and Siqueira soon after returned to Portugal. Things wore a better aspect in the Indies, where this year they opened a passage to China from Malacca, and gained some advantages over the king of Bantam, in the isle of Java; but their principal settlement of Goa had been in great danger, and the vices and follies of those who succeeded him, had almost overturned the magnificent fabric raised by the virtues of the great Albuquerque^f. 1517.

THE war in Barbary was still carried on with little success, and with little hopes. Expedition after expedition, in which sometimes the Portuguese were victorious, and sometimes they met with the worst, and these alternatives sometimes happened more than once in the same campaign. Don Emanuel having carefully enquired into the reason of this, discovered the cause of it so plainly, that it left him no room to doubt, that, humanly speaking, it could never be otherwise. Intestine divisions amongst the Moors gave both subjects and success to the Por- Has thoughts of abdicating in favour of the prince, but wisely alters his mind.

líguese; and on the other hand, envy and jealousy amongst the Portuguese governors afforded the Moors in their turn opportunities to triumph. The king, after mature deliberation, having nothing but the glory of his crown and the good of his subjects at heart, inclined to abdicate the throne of Portugal in favour of his son, reserving only Algarve to himself, with the revenues of the mastership of one of the religious orders, and from thence to pass over into Africa with a complete army, concluding that his presence would put an end to all disputes, and that the remainder of his life could not be better employed than in making a thorough conquest of what some have stiled the African Algarve; in consequence of which some of the kings of Portugal have stiled themselves monarchs of the Algarves, in the plural number. But while the king meditated this great and disinterested design, some whispers of it flew about, which were quickly attended with consequences that obliged him to change his sentiments. For many of the nobility began to worship the rising sun; and which was still worse, laboured to give him ill impressions of his father, whose magnificence was now treated as dissipation; whose easiness of access was stiled mean condescension; and whose great attention to trade was represented as stooping much below his dignity. But above all, his complacency in some instances to the clergy, and to the people in abolishing taxes that were thought too hard, were insolently and foolishly called betraying the prerogative; for the king had very wisely procured all the formalities of law in support of these impositions, and very prudently took them away when the people had recourse to his prerogative for their relief. The prince had parts and probity, but he was very young; and stories of absolute power are apt to tickle the ears of young men^a. Don Emanuel quickly saw this, and immediately resolved not to deliver himself up to distress, or his subjects to oppression; but he kept this resolution as a secret of state. He saw that, to support himself upon the throne, it was become necessary to share it with a princess equal to him in birth; and therefore he directed Don Alvaro de Costa, whom he sent to compliment Don Carlos on his arrival in Castile, to negotiate for him a match with the infanta Donna Leonora his sister, which was concluded with great privacy: and the new queen being conducted into Portugal by the duke of Alba, the king was married to her at Crato, on the twenty-fourth of November, and went from thence to Almerin; the plague then raging at Lisbon^b. There, on the feast of St. Andrew, he was with great solemnity invested with the order of the Golden Fleece^c, as a mark of his brother-in-law's esteem; and there certainly never was a marriage of this kind more convenient, at the time it was made, for the interest of both kingdoms, or that had better effects for the time it lasted.

His consummate policy in the management of affairs, so as never to forfeit the love of his people.

AFFAIRS in the Indies not going entirely to the king's satisfaction, he resolved to send thither George Albuquerque, with a fleet of sixteen sail; and as the solemnity of his marriage, and the supplies sent to Barbary, had exhausted his treasure, he imposed a tax upon corn, assigning the necessity he was in, and the inexpediency of holding an assembly of the states while the country was infected as the motives, with which the better part of his subjects were satisfied. But the principal magistrate of Evora, a man no way considerable for birth or fortune, obstinately opposed it: not, as he said, for want of duty to the king, or because he thought his reasons ill founded, but to prevent the consequence of such a precedent. The king sent for him, tried the force of expostulation and promises: when these proved ineffectual, he confined him in his own house; but after a few days he sent for him, commended him, and abolished the tax^d. There had been great disputes with the crown of Castile about the limits of their discoveries, which had been partly settled by treaties, and partly by bulls from Rome, as we have shewn elsewhere, and upon which it would be improper, as well as tedious, to dwell here. But notwithstanding this there had been some years before several attempts made by the subjects of Castile to settle in the Brazils; of which complaint being made, it was immediately corrected by cardinal Ximenes; for that great statesman held good faith to be the first maxim in sound policy^e. At this time Ferdinand Magellan and Ruy Falero quitted the service of Portugal, and went to Don Carlos, to whom they offered the discovery of a new passage to the Molucca islands, which they positively asserted lay without the bounds granted to Don Emanuel, and consequently within those assigned to the crown of Castile. The king's ambassador, Alvaro de Costa, had notice of this, and had for a time so much interest as to prevent the acceptance of this proposition; but at length the promises of Magellan wrought so effectually on the avarice of the ministers, who had appetite to wealth beyond all things, that a small squadron was ordered for this service, on board of which Magellan sailed from Seville in the beginning of August, having rejected all the offers made him by da Costa to return to Portugal, as having the gratification of his resentment in view, which resentment rose from Don Emanuel's refusing to raise his salary in the Indies nine shillings a month. So dangerous it is to a quarrel for little things with men of great parts^m. The nobility, who had declared themselves so early, found themselves exposed to the king's indignation, without either shelter or defence; for on the one side the confusions in Castile left them no place of retreat: and on the other the government, civil and military, was so exact, that all were steady to the king, who were in his service, because they knew that the best part of the emoluments they drew from thence were not national establishments, but flowed purely from his bounty. In regard to the former, he was close and reserved, because the salaries once stated and settled, in a certain way, became a charge upon the crown, and were paid out of the ordinary revenues; but easy and beneficent in respect to the other, as being disbursed by himself out of certain privileges, which he had reserved in the commerce to the Indies. He governed, therefore, with an authority, the plenty of which was so much the greater, as it was not either seen or felt; the king's good fortune being so extraordinary, that his own and his subjects affairs were continually improving; and as this proceeded apparently from the measures of his government, the far greater part of those who lived under it were thoroughly, and with good reason, persuaded that it was incomparably wise and justⁿ. In Africa only affairs went not entirely to the mind of Emanuel; and yet, even in Africa, things began to grow better than they did. The Portuguese cavalry equalled the Moors in expedition, and excelled them in discipline; and their infantry were always incomparably better. Their government also was so much better and milder than the Moors; that the more industrious part of that nation willingly accepted of their protection; and those who growing rich under it, had out of wantonness revolted, were so humbled by repeated defeats, that their very chieftains, who had excited them to this act of ambition, were constrained out of regard to their own safety to persuade them to submission, to charge themselves with the negotiation and treaty, and to give hostages out of their own families for the due observance of it; so that, on the whole, things had a fairer prospect on this side, than they had hitherto worn from the commencement of this reign^o.

By this time the harmony of the royal family was entirely restored; for Don Lewis de Silveira, who was in great credit with the prince, and who had been the principal agent of the young nobility, in filling his head with false maxims, being banished, Don Juan found it expedient to conform to his father's will; and being treated with great kindness by the new queen, and perceiving that after a short coldness his father was disposed to forget what was passed, he altered his conduct entirely, and instead of affecting the government, appeared desirous of learning from the king what it was to govern. On the eighteenth of February the queen was delivered of a prince, whom, in honour of her brother, now become emperor, she, with the king's consent, caused to be baptized by the name of Carlos, but he died in the succeeding year^p. The rebellion of the commons in Castile was now at its height; and as some persons of quality, and many of the clergy, had embarked on the side of the people, they judged it expedient to send the dean of Avila to Lisbon, with an offer of the crowns of Castile and Leon to Don Emanuel. The king gave him several audiences, received his propositions favourably, and heard all he had to say. He then told him, that he had managed a bad cause in the best manner: that he believed it might be in the power of his party to put many great cities and strong places into his hands, and to enable him to raise a numerous army; but he assured him that this was no temptation to injure a neighbouring prince absent, and his brother-in-law: that these very propositions shewed they were rebels; and that they had taken arms, not to protect their own, but to overturn their sovereign's rights. However, as he apprehended they might be driven by necessity beyond what they originally intended, he was willing to interpose his good offices to procure for them what they had any title to demand; and that if any of their chiefs would lay down their arms, and retire into his dominions, he would grant them his protection till he could procure them a pardon. This answer, though it was not very acceptable, was in appearance well received by the malcontents^q. Cardinal Adrian, and the lords of the king's party made their applications to Don Emanuel, who granted them ammunition, artillery, provisions, and a corps of auxiliary troops, for suppressing the rebellion, advising them not to lessen the king's authority by any ill-judged treaty, nor to preclude his mercy by any violent proceedings against their fellow-subjects. This was very kindly taken by the emperor Charles, notwithstanding the king of Portugal kept his word to the malcontents, receiving many of them, and by his example his son did the same, even Maria de Padilla, who had been the very soul of the revolt; but without affording them any countenance or assistance^r.

On the return of the emperor Charles into Spain, Don Emanuel sent a minister to compliment him upon his new dignity, and to inform him of his design to build a new fortress in Africa, that he might not take umbrage at it. The emperor assured him, that he entirely approved his project, and that if it was any-way inconvenient for him to carry it into execution, he would do it himself with his leave^a. Don Emanuel upon this sent a squadron of eight sail to examine the spot where it was intended his fort should be; and received as favourable a report as he could desire; notwithstanding which some unforeseen accidents intervening, there was nothing more done in this affair. The truth is, the clergy about this time had gained a great ascendancy over the king, and by drawing false consequences from true divinity, had perplexed him extremely. They told him that the Pope's bulls could only exempt him from papal censures; but that revenues once consecrated to sacred uses could not lawfully be applied to any other; and this they assured him was the reason that all his attempts in Africa had hitherto proved unsuccessful, the money levied upon the clergy having been chiefly employed in that service; and this it was that occasioned some stop in the dispositions he intended to have made^b. In the mean time, Mohammed king of Fez, who saw a great part of his territories taken from him; and the power of the Christians daily increasing, was continually in the field, and no less active in his intrigues; sometimes regaining the Moorish tribes, who had revolted to the Portuguese; and at others, rendering those suspicious in the eyes of their new friends, whom he could not debauch^c. This very year there happened several instances of this sort; but upon the whole there was nothing done of any great importance to either party, since the Moors were not able to recover any of their fortresses out of the hands of the Christians: and on the other hand, the Portuguese had much ado to maintain the ground they had gained, and to recover several little Moorish clans who had revolted from them in the spring. But the greatest mischief they met with, was the death of Jehabentasuf, the most able and the most faithful Moor who had embraced their interest. The king of Fez, notwithstanding their long acquaintance and friendship, had found means to create a jealousy of him in Don Nugno de Mascarenbas; which the Moor no sooner perceived than he acquainted Don Emanuel with it, and desired that the strictest enquiry might be made into his conduct; but the king, who was grown extremely cautious since the affair of Albuquerque, transmitted his letter to Mascarenbas, and ordered him not to give so worthy a man any offence. As this justified the governor in trusting him, he made no scruple of doing it, and Jehabentasuf, either by force or persuasion, brought back all but one tribe of the revolted Moors. At length a conference was demanded by their chiefs; to which he went with three of his officers, and was by them most perfidiously murdered as he sat at table, to the great sorrow and irreparable misfortune of the Portuguese^d.

penetrating
into Ethiopia.

THE king flattered himself this year with having found out the means of gaining some degree of certainty, in respect to the only part of his oriental discoveries, which even till this time was not thoroughly understood. There was one captain Quadrás, who being shipwrecked in the Arabian gulph, fell into the hands of the natives, and having suffered a long and severe imprisonment, acquired their language in such a degree of perfection, that by concealing his country, and pretending great zeal for the Mohammedan religion, he passed through Arabia into Persia, and so to Ormus, where resuming the habit and the manners of a Christian, he was sent home with great recommendations of his knowledge, capacity, and integrity. With this gentleman the king had many conversations, and having learned from him many particulars relating to Ethiopia and Egypt, which he never knew before, he conceived that he was a very fit person to execute a scheme that had long occupied his mind, of discovering a passage by land from the kingdom of Congo into the empire of Abyssinia. His predecessor, king John, arrived at a certainty with respect to a passage to the Indies, by employing men of learning to travel, as well as men of courage to discover by sea; and Don Emanuel had formed to himself great hopes of the advantages that might be derived by opening a correspondence between two Christian potentates, with whom he was in alliance, and who had ports on both sides of Africa. What the nature of his system was is very uncertain; to what height it might have been carried we are likewise ignorant; but the learned bishop of Silves has very truly observed, that it was very judicious, and manifested his perfect skill in the art of making, managing, and completing discoveries. According to his scheme, whatever it was, captain Quadrás was dispatched to Congo, where he safely arrived, and presented letters from Don Emanuel to the king of that country, desiring he would give him proper instructions, and the necessary passports for his journey into Ethiopia. The monarch of Congo received him kindly, and treated him respectfully; but the Portuguese in his court, and about his person, conceiving that Quadrás might acquire great riches by establishing such a correspondence, became envious of him to such a degree, that they insinuated to the king these letters were either forged or obtained from Don Emanuel by surprize, and that he ought to do nothing in an affair of so great a consequence, without obtaining from that prince some more particular and authentic explanation of his ina tention. Captain Quádras, after waiting some time, was obliged to return to Lisbon, where finding the king dead, and his hopes blasted, it made such an impression on his mind, that he shut himself up in a convent, where he spent the remainder of his days in pious meditations ^a.

As the fame of Don Emanuel's greatness, magnificence, and other royal virtues, was diffused throughout Europe, he had always many ambassadors at his court; and amongst these there was one from Charles duke of Savoy, a prince, who, during the war in Italy, had rendered himself more considered and more respected than could have been well imagined from the size of his dominions. The true business of this ambassador was to negotiate a marriage for his master, with the infanta Donna Beatrix, the king's second daughter. Don Emanuel b listened at first to the proposition: but he drew the negociation into some length, sent ministers of his own into Piedmont, and at length, in the spring of this year, consented to the duke's desire, and concluded a marriage. His circumspection in this affair was not so much the effect of policy as of paternal affection. He was desirous his daughter should be as happy in her own dominions as in his; he ordered his ministers, therefore, to study the temper of the duke; to give him an exact account of the disposition of his court, of his family, and manner of living; and having received satisfaction in these points, he gave the infanta one hundred and fifty thousand crowns, and a great many fine jewels. While every thing was preparing for this wedding, the queen was delivered at Lisbon, on the eighteenth of June, of the infanta Donna Maria ^c. As the king was naturally magnificent, so he never shewed it more than in the squadron appointed to carry the infanta to her husband's dominions. It consisted of eighteen sail of the largest ships that had been seen in Portugal. She was attended by many of the nobility of the first quality; and Martin da Costa, archbishop of Lisbon, accompanied her in a new ship, built and equipped at his own expence, and which was not at all inferior to any in the fleet. She sailed from the river of Lisbon on the ninth of August ^d; and arrived towards the end of September in the port of Villa-Franca, in the county of Nice, where she was received by the duke and his court ^e. In their return, the fleet touched at Ceuta, where the archbishop of Lisbon breathed his last. About this time the Venetians sent a solemn embassy to Don Emanuel, to desire of him several favours; but the principal design of it was to make a contract for all the spices that came from the East Indies, that they might d manage that trade throughout all Europe, as they had formerly done. The king received these ministers very politely, treated them kindly, and granted them all their other requests; but declined entering into the contract for spices, as conceiving it unreasonable that they should reap the profit of the risks and dangers to which his subjects were exposed ^b.

SOME military expeditions there were this year in Barbary, but of no great consequence; Dreadful which was chiefly owing to a grievous famine, occasioned by a great drought in the spring. famine in This oppressed the Moors to such a degree, that they pretended to be generally inclined to Barbary embrace the Christian religion, and offered to become slaves to those who would instruct them. Don Emanuel's piety was so great, that he would willingly have accepted this proposition, and have contributed all in his power towards their subsistence; but his subjects absolutely refused to receive them, from an apprehension that it was rather bread than instruction they sought; and that it might be extremely dangerous to admit such numbers, as upon the least encouragement would have taken this method to prevent starving. Besides, the harvest had been but very indifferent in Portugal; and they were afraid of heightening that scarcity they already felt, into the same evil from which these poor wretches sought to be delivered. However, from his own tenderness of heart, the king gave them great supplies, and neglected nothing that might make their conversion numerous and sincere ^e. Their corsairs being at this juncture very troublesome, and there being a strong suspicion that the ships of other nations dealt in the same trade of piracy, and sold their prizes to the Moors, the king caused a strong squadron to be fitted out, which he sent to cruise in the strait of Gibraltar and upon the coast of Africa, with strict orders to take the vessels of all nations by whom any prizes had been f made from his subjects; which had so good an effect, that in the space of a few months those seas were entirely clear. He also gave instructions for visiting and repairing the fortifications of all the places he possessed in that country, paid the arrears due to the garrisons, and caused the magazines to be filled, that they might be in a better condition to resist the efforts of their enemies, and to protect such of the Moors as continued to acknowledge him for their sovereign. It may be he had also greater designs in his intention, which were prevented from disclosing themselves by his unexpected death ^d.

Unexpected
Emanuel.

THE temper, regularity, and excellent constitution of Don Emanuel, seemed to promise a florid old age; the rather, because as yet he was unattacked by infirmities, and so constant and exact in his diet and exercise, that his subjects flattered themselves he had still many years to reign. However, in the beginning of the winter an epidemic fever prevailed in Lisbon, which, either through the constitution of the air, or the unskilful management of the physicians, commonly terminated in a lethargy, which proved mortal. The king was seized with this fever in the beginning of September, and died of it upon the thirteenth. He was assisted in his last moments by some of the most eminent persons amongst the clergy, and died with all possible marks of piety and firmness. Such was the end of Don Emanuel, in the fifty-third year of his life, and in the twenty-seventh of his reign^c. He directed that his corpse should be interred in the royal monastery of Bethlehem, which he intended should become the burying-places of the princes of his line^f. He was universally lamented by his subjects, and with great reason. He completed what his predecessors had begun; reduced the government of Portugal into a regular system, which moved uniformly, and without interruption, as the great wheel of the finances turned steadily, and without interruption. He kept war and discord at a distance: he communicated by his own example a placid and chearful disposition to his subjects: and might justly boast, that he had banished poverty and sorrow out of his dominions. But what contributed above all to endear him to all ranks and ages, was the indefatigable pains he took to procure them ease and satisfaction, and the sincere joy he expressed in contemplating the success with which his endeavours were attended. In a word, from his accession to his demise he was always, and in all instances, the parent of his people; just without severity; affable without affectation; compassionate without weakness; and pious without any tincture of hypocrisy (D).

HE was justly stiled the Fortunate; but his good fortune was the effects of the divine blessing on his great wisdom, and the good ends to which it was directed. He promoted and employed the worthiest men his country produced: the intrepidity of Vasco de Gama, the steady courage of Duarte Pacheco, the noble spirit of Francisco Almeyda, the vast abilities of the incomparable Albuquerque, were all called forth to action by his discernment. He saw the discovery, and he saw the empire of the Indies carried to the greatest height: he reaped the fruits of that spirit of commerce and navigation, the expectation of which only had been the delight of his predecessor. He did much, though he did not all he proposed in Africa. He made that country a nursery for officers and soldiers: he broke the spirit of the Moors, by inflicting on them the miseries that Portugal and Spain had felt from them in former ages. He raised the naval power of his kingdom not only beyond what it was, and beyond expectation, but even to a degree that, till it was visible, had been held impossible. He was respected, and formidable to his neighbours, without injuring them. His friendship was courted as an honour, and not from a principle of fear. His magnificence carried utility with it; and the splendor of his buildings and establishments of every kind, bore at once the marks of his magnanimity and generosity. Amongst these were reckoned thirteen monasteries in Portugal, besides those

(D) Don Emanuel was in point of stature rather above the ordinary size, but somewhat lean; his forehead high; his hair of a dark brown; his eyes blue, and remarkably soft and pleasant. His arms, like those of the Persian emperor Darius, so long, that when he stood upright his fingers reached below his knees. He performed all his exercises gracefully, and with much agility. He was very knowing in astronomy, geography, and navigation; and though he seemed to spend a great deal of time in diversion, yet while he appeared to be only occupied about these, he did a great deal of business. It was a maxim of his, that to hear truth and to obtain the best advice, the surest way was to ask and to receive answers on the sudden. He did not affect to be thought a great politician, and perhaps this shewed that he was so. The troubles that his predecessors met with, came either from Rome or from Castile. He met with no vexation from either quarter. The presents he received from India, when they had been sufficiently stared at in Lisbon, he sent to Rome, accompanied with more solid presents. Methods by which he obtained bulls for reforming and taxing his clergy, very little to their satisfaction, but which, however, kept them humble and quiet. In regard to Castile, he was always courted by its sovereigns, and yet put no great confidence in their friendship, which, however, he retained during his whole reign, partly from the ties of alliance, and partly from the respect due to his great power. In point of justice, he was not either remiss or inexorable. He was told one night, when he was on the point of going to bed, that a lady pressed earnestly for an audience; upon which he dressed himself, and ordered her to be admitted. "If my husband, sir," said she at her first entrance into the room, "had caught me in the act of adultery with any man, would you not have pardoned him if he had killed me?" "I certainly should, madam," returned the king. "Then I," replied the lady, "claim the same indulgence. I found my husband at his country-house in the arms of my slave, and in the heat of my resentment I dispatched them both with the single stroke of a dagger." "So far as in me lies," added the king, "your offence shall be remitted." He kept his word, and sent her a pardon the next day. There was no court in Europe more gallant or more polite than his, without being at all dissolute; for in this he was extremely correct, laying it down as a rule of great consequence, that where women were conspicuous for their virtue, men would be always distinguished by a true spirit of honour.

- a in Asia, Africa, and America. Eight great churches, the hospital of Lisbon, five palaces, upwards of twenty fortresses, exclusive of lesser castles, and several bridges, moles, fountains, and other public works, were begun and finished by him. He dedicated the hundredth penny of all his revenues to pious uses: he gave proper appointments to one hundred knights who served in Africa; and he made this service the road to preferment. He created a king at arms: and as he had reduced the laws, so he likewise brought the system of nobility into perfect order. He caused Edward Galvam and Roderic de l'ina to reduce the ancient chronicles into some tolerable method. He loved and encouraged the sciences chiefly by shewing a singular respect for those who excelled in them. He was a great reformer of his clergy; not by intruding into ecclesiastical affairs, or making strict regulations, but by paying a just deference to learning and merit, and raising none who were defective in either. He brought this
- b so far, that the great officers of state, and the great prelates were equally the ornaments of his court; and he would often say, that the prosperity of a state depended on paying an equal regard to nobility of blood and nobility of mind. As an instance of this he wore mourning for the great officers who died in his service, and kept his chamber three days upon the death of the best pilot in his dominions. One of his courtiers told him that would not recal him. "It is true, said Emanuel, and it is because I know his loss is irreparable that I mourn." He had faults, but they were not considerable either in their nature or in their number; and which is more, they were the excesses of his virtue. His own candour made him think all men candid; by this he was sometimes deceived, but he quickly perceived it, owned it, bewailed it, and
- c atoned for it. He had a familiarity which some of his courtiers thought incompatible with his rank. As for instance, he was pleased in hearing the children examined at church, and frequently asked them questions himself. It may be he had more religion and less pride than those who censured him. He loved music and dancing, and would often pass the whole night at a ball; but it was privately, and in his own family. He had set hours for business, which he never neglected; but this was for business that could be done at those hours; when any thing happened unexpectedly, he dispatched it where-ever he was, or however engaged. He loved rural sports, and manly exercises, and he spent much time in them; but it was not thrown away. He would sometimes say to one minister, sometimes to another, "Come, we are
- d "alone, have you any thing to say." When they came in from hunting, or from tennis, when he found proper persons about him, he would tell them, "Now we are fatigued with "play, let us divert ourselves a little with business." These appeared great things to some, and trifles to others. The reader will think of them as he pleases ^z.

S E C T. VI.

The reigns of John III. Sebastian, and Henry.

- e AT the time of his father's demise, John prince of Portugal was in the twentieth year of his ^{Accession of} age. By the advice of his council he retarded his proclamation to the sixth day after his ^{king John III.} father's death; whereas till that time it had been always on the third. But when it was performed, it was with very great magnificence; almost all the nobility and prelates of the kingdom assisting, and all the king's brethren being present. The cardinal Alonso administered the oath to the king, and the infant Don Lewis, duke of Beja, was the first nobleman who did homage ^a. He recalled immediately Don Lewis Silveyra, whom his father had banished, and received him again into his favour, but in conjunction with Don Antonio de Ataida, who was a man of a very different character. Don Lewis had wit, learning, and spirit; was a very accomplished nobleman, and in all respects an ornament to the court. Don Antonio, with all
- f the good breeding of a courtier, and with the abilities of a great statesman, had clean hands, and an upright heart. They shared the confidence of the king for a time: but as he grew older he bestowed it entirely on Don Antonio ^b. One of his first acts of government was to send Don Juan Silveyra to the court of France, to expostulate roundly about the depredations committed by some ships that bore the French flag, and the attempts made to interfere with his colonies and conquests by others. He sent likewise an ambassador to compliment cardinal Adrian upon his advancement to the papacy, to offer him a squadron to carry him to Italy, and to desire a dispensation for his brother Don Lewis to hold the priory of Crato, which he had be-flowed upon him. But the ambassador came too late, for the Pope was already gone^c. There had been in his father's life-time a treaty of marriage between the infant Don Ferdinand and Donna Maria Coutinho, which had been delayed on account of her youth, and which her father, the count de Marialva, desired might be now celebrated. But the marquis de Las Torres, son to Don George, duke of Coimbra, interposed, and affirmed, that there was a contract between him and the young lady. This she solemnly denied, and the king thereupon committed the marquis, and consented to his brother's marriage: upon which Don George retired from court in discontent^d. As the council were unanimously of opinion, that the king ought to think of a fit marriage, the duke of Bragança proposed that he should espouse his mother-in-law, Donna Lenora, who was immensely rich, and to whom his father had left a large jointure; and as strange as this proposition might seem, it was supported by a strong party. But the count de Vimioso steadily opposed it; and the city of Lisbon having remonstrated against it, the king declined all thoughts of it; so that in the month of November, when the count de Cabra came from the emperor Charles the fifth, to desire that his sister might have leave to retire into Castile, with her daughter Donna Maria, the king readily granted it with respect to his mother-in-law, though it was with some difficulty he consented to part with his sister, and at length revoked it^e (A).

A very singular instance of the prime minister's disinterestedness and probity.

A. D. 1523.

THE plague being in Portugal, the king was obliged to shift from one province to another, and so was the queen likewise, to whom Don John made a visit at Meija, where he took his leave in public; and that princess set out in the month of May, accompanied by the princes Don Lewis and Don Ferdinand, and continued her journey to Valladolid, and from thence to Medina el Campo, where the emperor then was^f. Don Juan Silveira was received with all possible testimonies of respect in France; but except these, and a smooth answer, he could obtain nothing. The king's favourite, Don Lewis de Silveira, was sent to the court of the emperor where he remained eight months. It was intended that he should have offered the infanta Donna Isabella to that monarch; but one of the ships that Magellan carried to the East Indies returning, the king restrained Don Lewis's negotiation to mere points of ceremony. At his return he found the king at Almeyrin, where entertaining him with his usual familiarity, and forgetting to kiss his hand at his first appearance, he lost his favour; with which he was not much affected, nor did he enter into any intrigues against Don Antonio de Ataida, who became in a manner first minister. There is a passage related of this statesman that ought to be preserved: the lord of Azambuja, a nobleman of one of the

(A) This prince was born at Lisbon, on the sixth of June, 1502; and from the violent storm that happened at his birth, so much the more uncommon, as it fell out in the most serene season of the year, the vulgar figured to themselves perpetual wars abroad, and it may be popular stirrings and commotions at home, whenever he came to reign (1). The palace taking fire while the ceremony of his christening was performing, revived these idle discourses, which passed for oracles, through the superstition of those times. When he was a year old, the king his father caused the nobility to swear to his succession. He was first committed to the care of Gonsalo Figueyra, a citizen of Lisbon; but the queen his mother took upon her the care of his education, and was very solicitous about it herself, admonishing him frequently, that nothing rendered a man so despicable as ignorance; and that at the same time it rendered no man so despicable as a prince, whose authority was best supported by his personal merit. Don Emanuel, his father, who was himself a very learned prince, and who had always persons of distinguished knowledge in his presence, was extremely desirous that his son should be distinguished by his science, and for this purpose fixed upon Don Diego Ortiz, bishop of Tangier, to instruct him in the languages; Lewis Teixeira to acquaint him with the laws, and to give him fit notions of them, and of the principles on which they were made; and one de Torres, who was then famous for his skill in physic and astrology, to give him lights into the superior sciences (2). The prince, however, shewed no inclination to study; and all the pains that his masters took were to very little purpose. When he was about ten years old, he had the misfortune to fall out of a high gallery, by which he was so much stunned, that the surgeons and physicians thought his life in danger: however, he quickly recovered, without suffering any thing more by the accident than having a small scar in his forehead. Not long after, he had a violent fit of sickness, and from the time of his recovery from thence, a very firm and settled state of health (3). His father perceiving that Don Juan had not either taste or application sufficient to render him learned, had recourse to another method of instruction, placing about him noblemen distinguished for wit and parts, and bringing him before he was eleven years of age to the council table. This had a very good effect; he improved daily, listened with attention to debates, and came to entertain very right notions in politics; but at the same time he grew vain, opinionated, and full of presumption (4). His father's second marriage, and the alteration of his behaviour, corrected these defects; so that at the time of the king's demise, Don Juan was infinitely more capable of the administration than most of his father's old ministers ever believed he would have been, and shewed for them all the respect and attention they could desire (5).

a most ancient families in Portugal, partly through his zeal for the public service, was so reduced that he was constrained to sell his lands. The king told Don Antonio that he would do well to buy them, as they lay next his own. "Your majesty," replied the minister, "will do much better to enable him to keep them, since himself, and his ancestors, have been impoverished by the services they have rendered the crown." The king took his advice, and so that noble family was saved from ruin ^g.

In order to restore a right understanding between the crowns of Castile and Portugal, it was absolutely requisite that the dispute about the Moluccas should be adjusted, and for this purpose commissaries were named on both sides, who met, debated, and disagreed; by which the breach was made wider than before, and the emperor actually granted a commission for sending thither another fleet, notwithstanding the Portuguese commissioners, at their departure, had protested against the proceedings of those who assisted at these conferences on the part of Spain. King John upon this sent Don Pedro de Corred and doctor Juan de Faria, his ambassadors to the emperor, to treat of a marriage with his sister the princess Katherine; which these ministers not only concluded, but also by the loan of a considerable sum of money for the Italian expedition, obtained a convention, by which all points in dispute in regard to the Moluccas were to be suspended, till this money should be repaid; and thus this troublesome affair was laid asleep. As to the marriage, it was agreed, that the emperor should be at the expence of his sister's journey, but that the king of Portugal should pay for the dispensation; that the princess should have two hundred thousand crowns, exclusive of her jewels, and an annuity of five thousand crowns per annum. These points being settled, she was conducted with great solemnity to the frontiers of Portugal, received there by the king's brothers, and upon her arrival at Crato, the marriage was celebrated with all the magnificence possible ^h. This year the king found it necessary to send Vasco de Gama, count of Videguira, to the Indies, which he discovered, where, old and infirm as he was, he settled all things to the general satisfaction of the Portuguese and the natives; and soon after expired at Goa, universally regretted by both ⁱ. The Portuguese still continued their expeditions in Africa; but the cherifs extended their empire in that country notwithstanding, and revived thereby the credit and power of the Moors. A. D. 1524.

THE emperor Don Carlos, perceiving that little or no advantage would arise from the negotiation he had been long carrying on in England, resolved at length to send ambassadors into Portugal to demand the infant Donna Isabella. It was not long before the treaty was concluded, by which the emperor charged himself with the expences of the dispensation; the king promised to defray those of the journey, and the fortune was fixed at a million of ducats, nine hundred thousand to be paid in money, and the rest to be bestowed in jewels. This marriage was celebrated in the month of November by proxy, and in the spring the infanta set out for Castile ^k; the Portuguese noblemen who accompanied her, having orders to take possession of certain lands, which the emperor was content to give in mortgage for his sister's fortune that was not yet paid. About this time arrived an ambassador from Ethiopia, sent by the emperor David, who governed that country, now stiled by the Portuguese the Grand Negus, and who had formerly made such a noise in the world by the title of Prester John. This ambassador, who did not make any great figure, proceeded afterwards to Rome, in order to pay his master's homage to the Pope, or at least it was so given out ^l. At this juncture the affairs in the Indies were in a very flourishing condition, and the vast treasures they brought into the kingdom occasioned a great resort of strangers. This, with some insolent actions of the Jews, either really committed, or boldly invented, and confidently maintained, gave the clergy an opportunity of pressing the king to introduce the inquisition ^m, which at length they obtained; and it happened luckily for them, that soon after the holy office was established a great famine ceased, which the priests persuaded the people was the peculiar blessing of Heaven on this pious action. It was not long, however, before the bulk of the nation saw what a blessing this was, but their penetration came a little too late; for by this time the authority of that inexorable tribunal was risen to such a height, that it was equally unsafe and ineffectual to aim at disclosing the miseries and inconveniencies that had attended it. Some indeed place this event ten years later, and found their calculation upon the bull granted by Pope Paul the third, for establishing the holy office at Evora; which very possibly might be, and yet the tribunal might have been brought in by the king and clergy before, who now applied to the holy see to still the murmurs that were raised against it, by this authentic act of approbation (B).

(B) There is something very dark in the introduction of the inquisition into Portugal, so that even the most intelligent authors are far from being well agreed either as to the time or manner of it. But if any credit be due to a certain relation, we may, notwithstanding, have a pretty good account of this perplexed affair,

THE Moors began at this time to reduce some of the Portuguese garrisons in Africa, and to extend their power very considerably. The Turks also sent the famous Barbarossa to give the Christians all the trouble in his power, who having overturned the king of Tunis, became very formidable. This induced the emperor Charles the fifth to make an expedition for the restitution of that city to its old monarch; in which he desired and received the assistance of Portugal: the king sending two or three very large ships, and a numerous squadron besides, under the command of Don Antonio Saldagna, with whom went privately the infant Don Lewis, who was received at Barcelona by the emperor with all possible marks of esteem and regard; and the king likewise sent after him an hundred thousand ducats for the expences of the campaign: in which he distinguished himself exceedingly, and in a short time became the delight of the whole army. In the main, however, this was no great benefit to the Portuguese; for, by employing the greatest part of their strength on that side, they left their own conquests open to an enemy that never let slip any advantage; neither does it appear that the Castilians, after they had carried their point, were in any condition to assist the governors who held places for the king of Portugal, and consequently, whatever glory might be gained by this transaction, there was little or no profit resulted from it, but rather the contrary; and it was not long before they were made very sensible of this, as well as of the difficulty and expence of supporting a war at so great a distance, and with such an inequality of forces; more especially as they were obliged to make their utmost efforts for the preservation of their acquisitions in the Indies.

SOLYMAN the second, emperor of the Turks, being solicited by the Mohammedan princes in the Indies, resolved to take up the quarrel against the Portuguese, as lord of Egypt, where the Mamelukes had dropped it, and accordingly sent orders to the bashaw who governed for him there, to employ his whole strength against the Christians; which he did, and sailed out of the Red Sea with a greater naval force than the Mohammedans had ever employed before, having four thousand janissaries, and sixteen thousand other land troops on board. Yet the courage of the Portuguese soldiers, and the conduct of their officers, taking the advantage of the insult, cruelty, and perfidiousness of the Turkish general, defeated all this mighty force, and saved their empire from that ruin with which it was threatened. In Africa also the king of Fez was baffled before the town of Safi, and fresh quarrels breaking out amongst the Moorish princes, gave great and unexpected relief to the Christians in those parts, who were in a manner quite exhausted by the long continuance of a defensive war; and had even sunk under the last attack, if they had not twice received timely supplies from the island of Madeira. But whenever the cherifs quarrelled with each other, one party was sure to have recourse to the Portuguese, who, by sending them a small supply, preserved quiet to themselves, and had the satisfaction of seeing their enemies employed in destroying each other. Yet in the end even this had affair (6). It is said that a certain monk, one Juan Perez de Saavedra, a native of Cordova, feigned himself cardinal legate for Paul the third, brought a bull from Rome, appointing certain inquisitors into heresy, and other dangerous opinions, which instrument, besides all exterior marks of authenticity, was drawn up with all the care and caution imaginable, and executed by those to whom it was directed with equal vigour and vigilance (7). However, some suspicions arising, upon a strict enquiry, this bull was found to be forged and counterfeit: for publishing of which the monk was condemned to spend the remainder of his days in the galleys; but by the interposition of the Pope, after some years released (8). The inquisitors, however, went on in the discharge of their offices, as if the authority by which they were appointed had been the best founded in the world; and the king was persuaded that this was so much for his service, for the benefit of the church, and the welfare of the people, that he not only acquiesced but actually procured a new bull from Rome for the establishment of the holy office (9). It appeared, however, in a very short space of time, that the post of first inquisitor was of such consequence, that it could not be put into better hands than those of the cardinal infant Don Henry; and indeed it has been ever since held the highest ecclesiastical promotion in this kingdom (1). To prevent opposition, the power of the inquisitors was somewhat qualified in Portugal. They were not to imprison bishops upon suspicion of heresy; or to proceed to the conviction of any charged with that crime, without the consent or concurrence of the bishop in whose diocese the person accused of heresy resided. But the inquisitors, who have the strongest aversion in the world to restraints, have explained away both these clauses in a very plausible manner. They confess they have no authority to send any prelate to prison; but that this does not hinder their confining him to his own house. Upon convictions, they demand the consent and concurrence of the diocesan; but as they seldom vouchsafe to give him sufficient lights, this is commonly refused: however, the having demanded it, is in the judgment of the holy office, a sufficient act of complaisance; and the refusal, a sufficient provocation to proceed without it, which without any farther ceremony they do (2). We shall have occasion to touch this subject more than once hereafter, and shall not therefore pursue it any farther here.

bad consequences, for on one hand it kept up a martial spirit amongst the Moors, and on the other it made them acquainted with the Portuguese discipline; so that after every short interval of repose, they not only found them as much enemies as before, but likewise more formidable through constant exercise, and these accidental improvements.

WHATEVER pleasure king John might take in the prospect of foreign affairs, it was much qualified by disagreeable events at home. Don Philip, who was the heir apparent of his dominions, died at six years of age at Lisbon, and his mind was scarce composed, before the empress Isabella, his sister, finished her days at Toledo^p. The next year was big with more black events, since death bereaved him of his son Don Antonio, and of his brothers Don Alonso and Don Duarte, which renewed his grief for the infant Don Ferdinand, and his two sons, who died some years before^q. These disasters rendered him not a little melancholy, and this was heightened by an act of treachery, of which the king was so much the more sensible, as flowing from a person whom he could never have suspected. This was Don Michael de Silva, bishop of Viseo, brother to the count of Portalegre, and secretary of his cabinet, who having privately negotiated at Rome for a cardinal's hat, on condition of revealing his master's secrets, stole from him some papers of great importance, and then privately withdrew to Rome; where, for this infamous action, he was received with the greatest joy, and, according to the Pope's promise, admitted into the college. The king, as it might be well expected, resented this highly, caused him to be out-lawed as a traitor, deprived him of his honours and benefices, and forbid all his subjects to hold any correspondence with him on pain of his highest displeasure; which fell upon his brother Don George, count Portalegre, who ventured to write him a letter, for which he was sent prisoner to the tower of Bellem, where he remained till the infanta Donna Maria prevailed on the king to release him, and even then he was banished to Arzila: where, by his gallant behaviour against the Moors, he at length effaced the memory of this miscarriage, and recovered his sovereign's favour, who, in the course of his reign, had never proceeded with the like severity against any of the nobility^r; but, however, it had a good effect.

As the emperor was very solicitous to conciliate the close alliance between the two crowns, another marriage between his son, the infant Don Philip, and the infanta Donna Maria, daughter to king John, was proposed, and well received by the court of Portugal: the terms were quickly adjusted, and the princess married by proxy. She did not, however, set out for Spain till some months after, shewed a visible reluctance at quitting her own country and family, who made her the like returns of tenderness^s. The king had a natural son, Don Duarte, archbishop of Braga, whose mother was Donna Isabella Nugnez, daughter to the alcaide of Lisbon: he caused him now to appear for the first time at court, caressed him extremely, and seemed to expect the like regard should be paid him by the rest of the royal family. This young prelate, who was between twenty and thirty, was distinguished by his learning and piety, and his great knowledge in, and application to the Portuguese history, which rendered his father inconsolable for his loss, which happened by sudden death not long after^t. In the Indies things were carried with a high hand: Don Juan was very circumspect in the choice of the officers he sent thither, supported them thoroughly, and rewarded them amply. In Africa he contented himself with keeping on the defensive, in which, though his subjects did wonders, yet their force gradually declined, and he saw himself at length under a necessity of constructing at a great expence a new citadel at Alcazar, to which he was desirous the emperor should contribute, as that fortress was like to be of more consequence to Andalusia than even Portugal or Algarve. When the Portuguese minister stated this to the emperor, he very readily admitted the fact, and as cheerfully complied with what king John desired, who also accepted of the order of the Golden Fleece, which hitherto for certain reasons he had declined^u, and as the emperor had revived this order, he was the more obliged.

THIS good correspondence, however, between the two crowns, did not in the least abate king John's attention to his just rights, or render him in the least passive when they were violated. He understood that there was one Antonio de Pesquera, a merchant at St. Lucar, who carried on privately a great trade to Guiney and the Brazils, upon which he gave orders to Vasco Lorenzo to keep an eye upon him; and accordingly Pesquera having fitted out his vessel for a new voyage, Vasco came up with, and took him in the height of the Canaries. Of this the arch-duke Maximilian, who was regent of Spain, complained very loudly, as Pesquera was taken within the dominions of the crown of Castile, and before he had engaged in any illicit trade; and therefore, upon the first application of the Imperial minister, the king ordered him to be set at liberty, and his own officer to be sent to prison: but he ordered his ambassador to tell the arch-duke, that he did not do this because he thought Pesquera innocent, or his own officer at all to blame, but that he might shew him how exactly he complied with treaties, and the manner in which he expected they should be complied with ^w. Don George, the son of king John the second, after having lived upon bad terms with the court from the beginning of his reign, returned thither now of his own accord, and though seventy years of age, fell violently in love with Donna Maria Manuel, one of the queen's maids of honour, whom he would have married, if, at the request of his son, the king had not interposed, and prevented it: upon which he once more withdrew from the court in discontent ^x. The king, finding that wealth and indolence had rendered the kingdom in some measure defenceless, very wisely established a militia, appointing, that every man of such an estate should keep, or at least be ready to find, a foot soldier with the usual weapons, whenever he was called upon: that he who had double that estate, should provide a musqueteer; ^y and he who had thrice that income, a trooper. By another law, he restrained the breeding of mules, that he might be the better able to remount his cavalry, and prevent that fine breed of horses, for which his dominions had been famous, from being lost or injured. He gave rewards for hunting wolves, as well for the sake of destroying those ravenous creatures, as to revive an active and manly spirit amongst the common people: but another regulation he made at the same time, though nothing could be better intended, had consequences of the most pernicious kind ^z. The king had hitherto had an eye to all business himself, and had shewn great sagacity in the choice of ministers, but as he could not do every thing at once, there wanted not some complaints that affairs were not dispatched, which put the king upon imitating the practice in Castile, leaving most of the affairs of government to council, and dividing that council into boards, or committees, for different purposes. To which an able and honest Portuguese historian attributes the declension of the kingdom; for irresolution, feuds, and perhaps corruption, crept into these boards; and if affairs went slowly before, they now either went not at all, or went so fast that justice could not keep pace with them. The king perceived it too soon for himself, and too late for his subjects, as we shall see hereafter ^a.

Marriage concluded between the prince of Portugal, and the infanta Donna Joanna. On the death of Pope Paul the third, the king sent orders to his minister at Rome to employ every method practicable for raising his brother cardinal Henry to the papal throne, and he demanded likewise the assistance of the emperor and the French king, to which he thought himself well intitled, by his near relation to the one, and the alliance that had so long subsisted with the other. He was promised, and deceived by both ^a. Cardinal de Monte was chosen, and assumed the name of Julius the third ^b. The copper money in Portugal being intrinsically of a higher value than what it was coined for, it was gradually carried out of the kingdom; upon which one of the new councils devised a large new copper coinage under the intrinsic value, which was thereupon counterfeited abroad, vast quantities of it brought in, and silver and gold carried away ^c. It is possible the king did not fully understand this matter, but his good sense should have engaged him to enquire, and his interest inclined him to listen to those who did. The Spanish and Portuguese coasts were at this time miserably infested by pirates under Turkish and French colours: to remedy which, king John determined to fit out guard-ships; but considering with himself that these might prove little better, if not under due regulations, he concerted measures with the emperor, who also fitted out others, and the instructions of their officers being reciprocally exchanged, it was impossible for them to find their account in any thing but doing their duty. The prince Don Juan being now near man's estate, it was thought highly expedient that he should marry, and the princess fixed upon was the princess Donna Joanna, daughter to the emperor, niece to the king of Portugal by the mother, and to the queen by the father's side. The treaty was quickly concluded; the portion fixed at three hundred and fifty thousand ducats; the duke of Aveyro and the bishop of Coimbra were sent to receive her on the frontiers towards the end of November. She was met by the king soon after she entered his dominions, and by him conducted to Lisbon, where the marriage was solemnized with a degree of splendor, and with such testimonies of public joy as had been scarce seen in Portugal before ^d.

The unfortunate death of the prince of Portugal, and birth of Don Sebastian. As the king apprehended domestic affairs to be now in a great measure settled, he applied himself with vigilance to those at a distance, sending to the Indies several young men of birth and spirit, with reasonable appointments for their subsistence, and promises sufficient to entertain their hopes. Amongst these was Camoens, the famous poet, who celebrated the behaviour of others, and was no way inferior to them in his own. In Barbary the Moors gained ground; for the king apprehending the projects of his predecessors impracticable, bea gan to bound his own to the preservation of the fortresses upon the coast, which, though not pleasing to the generality of his subjects, was perhaps a measure necessary to his affairs, since the expence of men and of money was too great to be borne by the kingdom of Portugal, even in its most flourishing state. The joy expressed on the prince's marriage had been heightened by his consort's pregnancy; but it was quickly turned into mourning. He became so uxorious, that it was visibly detrimental to his health, upon which, under pretence of tenderness for that of his consort, she was removed into the queen's apartment. The remedy was applied too late, the slow fever which had seized the prince, augmented in such a manner as to carry him off on the second of January, in the seventeenth year of his age^c. He was remarkably handsome in his person, of sprightly parts, which made him uneasy under the tuition of Don Pedro Mascarenbas, one of the worthiest and wisest men of that age; who, to gratify the prince, was made viceroy of the Indies, and forced to go thither against his will. Don Juan, if he had remained under his care, might probably have lived to ascend the throne. To conceal the knowledge of his death from the princess, the king visited her out of mourning. She was delivered on the feast of St. Sebastian of a son, to whom that name was given, in honour of the saint^f. After she recovered her health, she appeared inconsolable for the death of the prince; notwithstanding which, she quitted Portugal in the month of April, in order to assume the regency of Spain^e, and the care of the infant Don Carlos, upon the departure of his father, prince Philip, who was on the point of sailing to Flanders, to facilitate the negociation of his marriage with queen Mary. Don Pedro d'Acunba, having a squadron of five ships and four gallies on the coast of Algarve, received intelligence that Hamet Arraez, a famous Mohammedan corsair, was in the bay of Tavira, with four gallies, upon which he sailed thither immediately to attack him; but the wind failing, his ships were of no use: however, he very gallantly fell upon the enemy, notwithstanding they were double his number. The two admirals engaged with great fury; at first the Portuguese had the worst, but the Turk boarding them, was taken; the other gallies sunk one of the infidels and took two, upon which the rest fled. Don Pedro returned victorious to Lisbon; and by the exchange of the corsair, preserved the life of captain Peter Paul, a Mohammedan convert, whom the Turks had otherwise destined to the most exquisite tortures^h.

THE king exerted himself with great spirit in the settlement of Brazil, which he brought into a very good state; caused several strong towns to be erected there, and took all possible methods to encourage the conversion of the natives to christianity. In this it is said, they met with great difficulty; and the writers of those times describe the Brazilians as the most obstinate, barbarous, and bloody of all the natives then discovered in America; notwithstanding which, it is very certain that the Portuguese were forced to be at great pains to prevent other Europeans from settling amongst or trading with them, whence it may be suspected, that those accounts were at least a little exaggerated. The grief of the kingdom for the loss of the prince was renewed by the death of the infant Don Lewis, duke of Beja, on the twenty-seventh of November. He was commonly stiled the delight of Portugal; and a very impartial historian assures us, that for piety, learning, sagacity, courage, and generosity, he was not exceeded by any prince of his timeⁱ. The disputes amongst the nobility about precedence, were frequently attended with very untoward consequences, which obliged the king to take a resolution of settling them, once for all, which he did, by established rules, that have subsisted ever since, and have in a great measure prevented the revival of such altercations. He restored the lustre of the university of Coimbra, and brought several professors thither from Paris. He had other great designs in his head, particularly with regard to reformation, which he had pushed very far with respect to religious persons of both sexes; but upon a close inspection into affairs, he found his subjects in general to have been so much injured by his leaving their concerns to the inspection of his council, that it affected him to a very great degree; so that he was seized with a kind of apoplexy, from which he recovered only so long as to make the necessary preparations for a christian death, to which, with great calmness and resignation, he submitted, June the sixth, or as others say, June the eleventh, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign, to the great regret, and to the irretrievable misfortune of his people. His corpse was interred with prodigious pomp in the royal monastery of Bellem, to which he had been a great benefactor, and^k dutifully accomplished all his father left undone (C).

(C) This monarch was in his person of a middle size, somewhat inclined to fatness; his eyes were of a lovely blue; and his countenance so majestic and serene, as to excite affection and respect in all who came near him.

Don Sebastian.

By this unexpected and unfortunate death of so great a monarch, the crown of Portugal devolved on the head of Sebastian, a child of three years old. The regency, pursuant to the king's will, remained in the queen his grand-mother, who exercised it with great circumspection and moderation¹. The Moors supposing, that under a minority they might be able to dispossess the Christians of the fortresses they yet held, they laid siege in the first place to Masagnan. The queen regent, alarmed at this, sent such speedy succours, and promised such rewards to those who should do their duty, that notwithstanding the Moors brought fourscore thousand men before the place, they were at length constrained to raise the siege. This was at first magnified as a high proof of the queen's wisdom and capacity; but by degrees the natural aversion of the Portuguese to be governed by a woman, and perhaps also by a Castilian, appeared so visibly, that of her own accord she quitted the administration, and retired into a convent, devolving the power and title of regent upon the cardinal infant Don Henry, who it was thought did not dislike the queen's resolution^m. He presently appointed Don Alexius de Meneses the king's governor, and Gonsales de Camera, and two other priests for his preceptors, being content to apply himself wholly to affairs of state; in which, though he was very profound, yet he had an invincible love for peace, and a noble spirit of equity and justice. By this means the nation in general, and the city of Lisbon in particular, increased in wealth, and the people became every day more and more pleased with the lenity of his administration.

Short account of that young monarch's disposition, and of the errors in his education.

At length the king drawing near the age of fourteen, the cardinal began to prepare all things for delivering up his charge. Authors are very much divided as to the capacity of the young prince his pupil; for some represent him as a prodigy in point of capacity and abilities; while others would persuade us that he was either deficient in parts, or at certain times frantic, and deprived of the free use of his senses. What seems to be most certain is, that while a child, he had a very quick capacity, and a very unusual eagerness for learning, which certainly might have been improved, so as to render him a great and good prince; but those him (2). In his youth he spoke very quick, and loved talking a little too much; but before he came to the crown he set himself studiously to correct these and other defects, in which he was peculiarly happy (3). His piety was solid, and free from superstition. He was a great friend to the jesuits, because at the first appearance of that order they were very strict in their morals, and declaimed perpetually against the luxury and intrigues of the monks, who were by no means in the king's good graces; who, following the maxims of his father and grandfather, studied to be well with the court of Rome; and having procured from thence bulls for the reformation of the mendicant orders, he took care they should be thoroughly executed; and though the monks clamoured, it was all in vain, for having the nuncio, the bishop, the jesuits, the nobility, and the people on his side, they were constrained to submit (4). He instituted the council of conscience, in which the sentences of all courts of law were reviewed, that they might be moderated according to equity. He likewise formed the council for the inspection of military orders, and heightened the lustre of that of Christ, in a manner suitable to its dignity (5). His tenderness for his people was so great, that nothing could move him to tax them. When his ministers proposed it, "Let us be first clear," said he, "that raising of money is necessary." When that point was cleared, "Now," says the king, "let us see what expences are unnecessary." So that frugality was the fund that answered all extraordinary demands in his reign (6). He had a great, and even a miraculous memory, insomuch, that upon reading the roll of the students, in the university of Coimbra, he retained it at once, and saluted each of them by their names (7). He rewarded all services with his own hands, and that without delay, but withal moderately; and he used to say upon such occasions, "I would give more, but I "must give to many." He loved to have his nobility about him; but he created no new employments, nor reduced any; yet he did not heap them upon a few persons, for his maxim was, that one public employment, and his own private business, was occupation enough for one man (8). In ceremony he was extremely correct, and carried magnificence to the greatest height, but very rarely and upon extraordinary occasions: at other times he was modest in his garb, and very familiar with those about him. His nobility understood this, and that he looked upon all spectacles as masquerades, where a man was to be careful in acting his part properly, for the entertainment of the people, but was to lay aside his theatrical air with his fine cloaths. He built and endowed several hospitals, some religious houses for women, and finished whatever structures had been begun by his father (9). In the first part of his reign he made so good a choice of ministers, and all things went on so regularly, that he believed they would still proceed in the same manner, though he did not inspect them constantly himself: but there his judgment failed him; and when he saw this, and to how great a degree his subjects were injured by it, the sense of it was so strong, that it affected his health. In one thing he far exceeded all his predecessors; for though he put an end to the feuds that reigned amongst his nobility, reconciled all the great houses, and restrained some of their prerogatives, yet he kept them in the strictest dependency, by paying them all possible respect in public, and being very familiar with them in private (1). By his neighbours he was always courted and revered; for though he loved peace, his troops were kept full and in constant exercise, a strong squadron at sea, and an exchequer never empty; which precautions deterred insults, and in case of accidents procured immediate satisfaction.

a: who had the care of him, ruined the capacity they should have cultivated, and by the violence of their practices in his tender years, produced those inconsistencies in his character that were afterwards ascribed to natural imbecility^a. It will be necessary, however, to explain this more clearly. His governor infused into him an opinion that the distinguishing quality of a king was courage, and courage he represented to him as a contempt of danger, however great, which was to be always surmounted, and never avoided. His preceptors on the other hand, taught him to place all religion in the abhorrence of infidels; so that from the time he approached man's estate, he was in a continual fever, burning on the one hand with a vehement desire of displaying his want of fear, and as earnestly desirous to give the world marks of his implacable hatred to Mohammedism, which he took to be zeal for Christianity. During the time of his minority, the cardinal governed him by the assistance of those who were about him, and who for this reason were suffered to go their own way; but by that time he had governed the kingdom three years in his own name, they exerted their power over him for their own advantage, and not only deprived the cardinal of his confidence, but had the boldness also to propose to him resigning his archbishopric.

Few kingdoms have been more exposed to a spirit of intrigue than this of Portugal, His ministers during the reign of Don Sebastian. His grand-mother queen Katherine, and his great uncle the cardinal, certainly meant well to him and to the state, but not to each other; and therefore while they were employed in destroying each other in the king's good opinion, they threw him into those hands that ruined both him and his kingdom. Martin Gonzalez de Camera, the brother of his preceptor, was his first favourite, and the person who prevailed upon him to discard Alcaçova, who had been long secretary of state; he was a person of great abilities, and, if it had not been for his boundless ambition, very equal to the post he affected of first minister. He bore his disgrace with great firmness, contented himself with publishing through the court what the arts were by which he had been circumvented, and how they might be turned upon their authors^b. He then withdrew, and left his lessons to work, which they did so effectually, that the court was very soon in confusion. Don Alvaro de Castro, a young man of great spirit and courage, possessed himself of the king's favour from the similarity of their tempers. He drew him into Algarve, under pretence of examining the state of the country, the garrison and ports. When he had him there, and had shewn him abundance of things, of which he had no true conception before, he began to talk to him very plainly. He told him he meant well, but he knew nothing; that he was totally governed by the jesuits, who exhausted the treasures of the kingdom in establishments that had a plausible appearance, but which at the bottom were useless, and consequently ruinous, from the want of capacity in those by whom they were directed; and that after all, they were properly the monarchs of Portugal, and he only their minister. The king was astonished at this boldness; but when he recollected and compared facts, he returned to Lisbon, as much an enemy to the jesuits, as he had been before their creature. Alvaro de Castro soon discovered that he wanted political abilities, and that he had taught his master to find this out, upon which he recalled Alcaçova, and brought him again into the council; who in return insinuated to the king, that Alvaro had a mind to pass for the greater hero of the two, which probably would have ruined him if death had not interposed and screened him from disgrace^c.

AFTER this succinct account of the intrigues, we will proceed in the detail of the events that happened under this reign. In India and in Brazil things were well administered, and in general the government was regular throughout all Sebastian's dominions; for as soon as he was past his childhood, he made with his own hands an abridgement of the laws, in the knowledge of which he was very correct, and took care to see them punctually obeyed. He loved war, and had a great propensity to naval affairs; and it was to gratify both at once that he projected an expedition to the Indies; but Alcaçova, who had no inclination to attend him thither, set that aside, and substituted Africa in its stead. When, therefore, he was invited by Philip the second of Spain to concur in the grand alliance against the Turks, he excused himself, under pretence that the plague had made such ravages in his dominions, as, notwithstanding the warmth of his inclinations, put it entirely out of his power. He is also said to have declined marrying the princess Margaret de Valois, sister to Henry the third of France, though the Pope sent a cardinal legate to press it. However, a famous French historian relates the matter otherwise, and much to the honour of Don Sebastian; but the fact is so clearly on the side of the Portuguese and Spanish historians, that it would be unjust to suspect their veracity; more especially, as he soon after made an expedition into Africa hastily, and in a manner by surprise^d. He first sent over Don Antonio, prior of Crato, with some hundreds of soldiers, carried his principal courtiers over with him from a hunting match, and without equipages; then sent for the duke of Aveyro, with such troops and volunteers as he could collect at such short notice; and, when he had them, he spent his time in hunting, and slight excursions, without doing any thing of consequence, unless exposing his person upon all occasions could be so counted; and at length returned to Portugal in the month of November, in such tempestuous weather, that his subjects gave him up for lost, when they were agreeably surprised by his unexpected arrival in the river of Lisbon, which they celebrated with a degree of affection which must have given him great satisfaction.

It might have been reasonably imagined, that this disappointment would have opened the king's eyes, and have shewn him the impossibility of invading Africa with success. It was, however, so far from having any such consequence, that it served only to exasperate his martial humour; so that from the very time he came back he meditated nothing else; and those who had a mind to make their court to him, could not do it any other way than by flattering his appetite for conquest; and, according to the common lot of princes, he found numbers who took this way, without considering whether it would lead either him or them to it. The king was highly delighted by an incident which offered him a pretence for war, though of that he stood in no need. Muley Hamet, king of Fez, Morocco, and Tarudant, had been dispossessed of his dominions by his uncle Muley Moloch. At the beginning of this war Don Sebastian had offered him his troops in Africa, which offer was rejected with contempt; but now being a fugitive; and having demanded succours from Philip the second of Spain, without effect, he had recourse to the king of Portugal; and that he might the more easily prevail, caused the fortrefts of Arzila, which his father had recovered, to be restored to the Portuguese. Don Sebastian was in raptures at this event; he looked upon himself as destined to exceed his predecessors in their conquests, and sent Alcaçova to secure the friendship of king Philip, and to procure an interview between them. In this the minister had all the success he could wish: Philip consented to an alliance, promised the king his daughter, and appointed the place of conference to be Guadalupe. Don Sebastian set out from Lisbon on the twelfth of September, accompanied by the duke of Aveyro, the count of Portalegre, and some other persons of distinction. Philip represented to him fully and fairly the great difficulties of the expedition; but finding his nephew not to be dissuaded, he promised him fifty galleys, and five thousand men; but the Spaniard did still more: he sent Francisco Aldana, an old and experienced officer into Morocco, and at his return ordered him to attend Don Sebastian, and give him an account of the state things were in; which he performed with great fidelity, but without the least effect. The queen dowager and the cardinal, forgetting all former disputes, united in their endeavours to divert the king from an enterprize which was so apparently inconsistent with his true interest, and so incompatible with the present situation of his dominions. He treated them both with so little respect that his grand-mother quickly broke her heart, and the cardinal, to shew his distaste to this measure, retired to Evora, and came no more either to court or to council; and many of the first nobility followed his example, tho' even these sent their brethren or their children to accompany the king.

King Philip and the principal nobility in Spain and Portugal labour to dissuade the expedition.

THE more difficulties appeared, the more the king seemed determined to persist in his design; and as it was impossible to undertake it without money and troops, neither of which could be obtained by ordinary methods, he authorized Alcaçova to take any that he could devise; and as he had a fertile invention, and no other way to maintain himself in that absolute degree of credit which he had with his master, he pushed his contrivances to the utmost. In virtue of a bull of crusade he levied one hundred and fifty thousand ducats on the clergy; he laid a heavy tax upon salt; he augmented the excise; he gave the money of Castile a currency through the dominions of Portugal, and raised it a ninth part of its value; he drew under the title of exemptions, from the Jews, two hundred and twenty thousand ducats; he extorted loans from such as were in easy circumstances, and demanded free gifts from the nobility. He sent into Italy, Germany, and Holland to raise forces, and he drew from different quarters several thousand men, but at a large expence. While these preparations were making, he called an assembly of the nobility, in which he gave them a large account of the motives and end of his expedition; which he concluded by telling them, he meant to let them know his intentions, but not to receive their advice, and so withdrew. This did not hinder his receiving remonstrances from all quarters: the count of Tentugal, his ambassador in Castile, wrote him a long, and very free letter upon this subject; others of the nobility did the same, but in person; but none with so much freedom as Don Juan de Mascarenhas, who had served with great reputation in the Indies: upon which the king got his physicians to certify, that age might make a a man a coward, who was a hero in his youth : upon which Don Juan observed, that the advice he had given proved them to be both liars and fools *. Lastly, king Philip sent the duke de Medina Celi to lay before him the reasons why he thought his design impracticable, and to put him in mind that he had no hand in pushing him upon his own destruction, or in concealing from him the dangers upon which he seemed determined to throw himself and his subjects †, and this to answer no end.

It would lead us much beyond the bounds to which a work of this nature must be confined, if we should enter into all the methods practised on the one hand by the friends of this unfortunate prince to divert him from this design, or, when that appeared impossible, to defeat it, and the contrivances he used to accomplish his desire, and to bring about what strangers and his own subjects daily prophesied would prove his destruction. Let it suffice therefore to say, that in the midst of this struggle Don Sebastian received a letter from Muley Moloch, against whom these preparations were made. In this epistle he explained to him his own rights, and shewed him he had only dispossessed a tyrant and a murderer, who therefore had no title to his friendship or assistance. He next assured him, that he had no reason to be apprehensive either of the power or the neighbourhood of the Portuguese; as a proof of which, and as a mark of his esteem, he was content to make him a present of ten miles of arable ground, round each of the fortresses he possessed in Africa, which were Ceuta, Tangier, Arzila, and Masagan, to be enjoyed by his subjects without molestation or disturbance. At the same time he addressed himself to king Philip, with whom he lived on good terms, to interpose with his nephew, that things might yet be adjusted, without the unnecessary effusion of human blood ‡. Some say that Don Sebastian did not so much as write an answer to this letter; others, that he demanded Tetuan, Larche, and Cape Alguer, as the price of peace, which Muley Moloch treated with disdain. The Portuguese writers complain, that Philip the second did not perform his engagements, though they admit he covered this with very plausible excuses. The truth was, that he thought the Portuguese ministry would have rendered the enterprize abortive, and have laid the blame upon him, and he was inclined to give them an opportunity of doing this, which was their real intention: but Sebastian's obstinacy got the better of all; upon which Philip collected in haste two thousand Castilian foot, and sent them under Alonso Aquilar, an excellent officer, that he might not seem to abandon his nephew §.

d WHEN his preparations were in a manner completed, the king offered the regency to his great uncle cardinal Henry, which he roundly and absolutely refused: he then devolved it upon Don George de Almeida, archbishop of Lisbon, Pedro de Alcaçova, his secretary, Francisco de Saa, and Don Juan de Mascarenhas, notwithstanding the two last had steadily and vehemently opposed this enterprize from the very beginning ¶. He first of all appointed Don Lewis Ataida general and commander in chief, a man of great merit and military skill; but taking offence at the circumspection he used, ordered him to repair to the East Indies, and gave the command to Don Diego de Sousa, a very brave man, but unequal to it in every other respect. On the seventeenth of June, he went in procession to the cathedral, where his standard was blessed by the archbishop; he gave it instantly to Don Lewis de Meneses, with orders to embark the troops as fast as possible: these consisted of nine thousand Portuguese foot; three thousand Germans, which the prince of Orange spared him, under the command of colonel Amberg; seven hundred Italians, under the command of Sir Thomas Stukeley, an English exile, but remarkably brave; the two thousand Castilians before mentioned, and five hundred volunteers, commanded by Don Christopher de Tavora, master of the horse, a man of courage, but without either conduct or experience. His fleet consisted of fifty ships of war, and five galleys; his train of twelve pieces of cannon; his transports and tenders made up near a thousand sail ††. The king had with him Don George of Lancaster, duke of Aveyro, Don John and Don Diego, sons to the duke of Bragança, Don Antonio, prior of Crato, Don Manuel, bishop of Coimbra, Don Arias, bishop of Porto, the count de Vimiezo, Don Juan de Silva, ambassador from king Philip, and many others ‡‡.

f ON the twenty-fourth of June the king Don Sebastian sailed from the bar of Lisbon, with a fair wind, and bore for Lagos bay, in the kingdom of Algarve, where he remained for four days; then he proceeded to Cadiz, where he was magnificently feasted for a week, by the duke de Medina Sidonia, who took the first opportunity, by the command of his master, of renewing his representations to the king on the folly of proceeding further in person †‡. But as soon as the reinforcements were arrived, the king sailed for Tangier, with a good detachment of troops, and ordered Don Diego de Souza to embark the rest, and to decamp them in the neighbourhood of Arzila, where it was three weeks before the king joined them. ^a He met the cherif Muley Hamet at Tangier, with three hundred Moors, who delivered to him his son Muley, a boy of twelve years old, as a hostage, whom he sent to Mafagan under a guard; but the cherif himself accompanied the king to Arzila, where it was resolved in a council of war to reduce Larache: but whether to march thither by land, or to reembark the troops and proceed by sea to that place, admitted a long debate. But at length the march was approved, chiefly by the king's influence, and orders given to advance directly to the river Luco, over which they were to ford. The cherif opposed this; but the king gave him so rude an answer, that he left his presence in discontent. On the twenty-ninth of July the army began its march, and encamped two leagues from Arzila. There Don Francisco Aldana joined them, who presented the king with a letter from the duke of Alba, in which he ^b advised him to think of nothing beyond taking Larache, and a helmet which had been worn by Charles the fifth ^c.

ON the other hand, Muley Moloch having intelligence that the king's fleet was arrived before Arzila, marched from Morocco with sixty thousand horse, and forty thousand foot. In his passage, finding reason to suspect that part of his army were inclined for his competitor, he declared that such as were disposed to join their old master were at liberty to do it, which permission was accepted by some few, and punctually complied with. There was a corps of three thousand horse, of whom he stood likewise in some doubt; he sent these to reconnoitre the enemy, and by that act of confidence he secured them. He was yet under some uneasiness as to his officers; for though he was not afraid of the Portuguese troops, he was very apprehensive of their money, and of the knowledge his competitor had of those who were most like to take it. To guard against this, he changed the disposition of his army entirely, so that none of his officers commanded the corps which had been under their orders; and having new men to deal with, had consequently none whom they could trust. It is wonderful he was able to take these precautions, considering he was so ill of a fever, that he was unable to sit his horse; notwithstanding which, he marched directly towards the Portuguese, and on the third of August encamped within a league of Alcazar-quivir, within sight of the Christian troops, with a full resolution to give them battle, his brother Muley, governor of Fez, commanding under him ^e.

calls a council.

AS soon as the scouts of the Moorish army were perceived, Don Sebastian called a council ^d of war, in which, contrary to custom, there was much order and moderation. The count de Vimioso, and those who out of complaisance to the king had given their opinions for this march, were now for returning. They said the enemy were masters of the ford, and of the river; that there was no forcing them in their posts immediately; and that it was impossible for them to wait a more favourable opportunity, as they had no victuals. The foreign officers, whom they were now glad to hear, had changed their opinion, and were now for fighting; not because they thought it more reasonable than before, but that now it was become necessary. This was vehemently opposed by the cherif, who saw very clearly, that they ran the hazard of being beat, and of losing all, and were not sure of gaining any thing, even if they were victorious; whereas, if they drew down towards the sea, and intrenched, they ^e might be relieved by their fleet, during which space, if Muley Moloch died, he looked upon it as a thing certain that a great part of the army would desert to him, which would render him master of three kingdoms, and of the fate of the Christians also. When he found that the king was bent on fighting, he only desired that he would delay till four o'clock in the afternoon, that, in case things went amiss, they might have some chance of escaping in the night; but even in this he could not prevail, for the king disposed every thing for an engagement the next day, which was the fourth of August; and it was not at all owing to him that he did not begin as soon as it was light. Muley Moloch now so clearly perceived his advantage, that he was inclined to make the Portuguese army prisoners; but finding his strength, and even his life, sinking, he had taken the resolution of fighting that very night, fearing ^f those very events in which his competitor Muley Hamet placed all his hopes; so that after all, if the cherif's advice had been taken, things might have gone otherwise than they did: but the king wanted experience and judgment; the first put it out of his power to act for himself, and the latter hindered him from discerning which of different counsels it was most expedient for him to pursue ^h.

both armies.

THE disposition of the Christian army was very regular and correct, through the care of Aldana, and other old officers: the infantry were disposed in three lines, the battalion of volunteers made the vanguard; colonel Amberg, with his Germans, and Sir Thomas Stukeley with the Italians, were on the right; the Castilian battalions on the left; the Portuguese regiments in the center and in the rear; the cavalry, consisting of about fifteen hundred men, partly on a the right under the command of the duke of Aveyro, to whom the cherif joined himself with his horse; on the left was the standard royal, and the rest of the cavalry, under the command of the duke of Barcelos, eldest son to the duke of Bragança, Don Antonio, prior of Crato, and several persons of great rank. The king took post at first with the volunteers. Muley Moloch disposed his troops also in three lines: the first consisted of the Andaluzian Moors, commanded by three officers who had distinguished themselves in the wars of Granada; the second of renegadoes; and the third of the natives of Fez, Morocco, and Tarudant. They moved in a half-moon, with ten thousand horse on each wing, and the rest in the rear, with orders to extend themselves so as to encompass the Christian army. Muley Moloch, though extremely weak, was taken out of his litter and set on horseback, that he might see how his commands had been obeyed; and being perfectly satisfied with the situation of his troops, he directed the signal of battle to be given, about an hour before noon, by a general discharge of his artillery, which was immediately answered by the Christians, who advanced with the utmost alacrity, and charged with the greatest spirit¹. This was an effect of that generosity natural to noble minds, and all the youth of quality in Portugal were present.

Don Sebastian, in the beginning of the action, received a musket shot in the shoulder, which did not hinder his charging at the head of the horse on the left wing, by whom, by the Castilians, by the volunteers, by the Italians, and by the Germans, the first line of the Moorish infantry was broke, and the second disordered. On this Muley Moloch drew his sword, and would have advanced to encourage his troops, but that his guard prevented him; at which, his emotion of mind was so great, he fell from his horse, and one of his guards having caught him in his arms, conveyed him to his litter, where he immediately expired, and had only time to lay his finger upon his lips to enjoin them silence². Hamet Taba, a renegade, stood by the curtains of his litter, opened them from time to time, and gave out orders as if he had been living. By this time the Moorish horse had quite wheeled round, and charged the Portuguese in the rear; upon which the cavalry in the Moorish left wing made so vigorous an effort that they broke the Portuguese horse on the right, and put them into confusion; and at this time in passing a rivulet the cherif was drowned. The Germans, Italians, and Castilians, did wonders; but the Portuguese foot, as their own writers say, behaved but indifferently. The king had two horses killed under him. George Albuquerque Aldana, all Castilians, were killed by his side. At length he was surrounded by the Moors, who seized his person, stripped him of his sword and arms, and secured him. They immediately fell out amongst themselves, about whose prisoner he was; upon which one of the generals rode in, and crying out, "What, you dogs, when God has given you so glorious a victory, would you cut one another's throats about a prisoner?" at the same time discharging a blow on the head of Don Sebastian, over his right eye, brought him to the ground; when, despairing of ransom, the rest of the Moors killed him. This is by some held the most authentic account³. Others say, that Lewis de Brito meeting the king with his standard wrapped round him, Sebastian cried out, "Hold it fast, let us die upon it:" upon which, charging the Moors, he was seized, rescued by Brito, who was himself taken with the standard, and carried to Fez. He affirmed, that after he was taken he saw the king at a distance unpursued. Don Lewis de Lima afterwards met him making towards the river; and this Emanuel de Sousa says was the last time he was ever seen alive⁴. Of the whole army there were not above fifty escaped. There fell on the field of battle the count of Vimioso, Don Lewis de Coutigno, Don Vasco de Gama, Don Alonso de Norogno, the counts of Redondo, Videguera, and Mira, Don Diego, son to the duke of Bragança, the bishops of Porto and Coimbra, and many others. The young duke of Barcelos, then but twelve years old, and the prior of Crato, were amongst the prisoners⁵. The plunder of the Portuguese camp was a prodigious booty, for all the young lords had piqued themselves upon a very ill-placed magnificence. Muley Hamet, the brother of Muley Moloch, was saluted king by the Moors that very night. The victory, however, cost them dear, for they lost at least eighteen thousand men; and those who fled, when the first line was broke, made their way to Fez, and published that the battle was lost; so that when the news of the victory arrived the next day, it was scarce believed, more especially as those who brought it acknowledged that Muley Moloch was dead, so that it was looked on as an artifice to keep the city quiet; but they were quickly undeceived, and immoderate rejoicings succeeded to ill-grounded apprehensions.

THE day after the battle the cherif ordered all the prisoners to be brought before him : amongst whom was Don Nugno de Mascarenhas, a domestic of the king's, who affirmed he was present at his death : he described the manner of it, and the place where he fell ; upon which proper persons were sent to examine the truth of it, with whom went Sebastian Resende, the king's valet de chambre, who brought back a body which he affirmed to be that of his master, and which was acknowledged for such by most of the prisoners, who saw and examined it. This body, by the cherif's order, was deposited in the house of a Jew at Alcaçar-quivir°. Some time after Philip the second of Spain sent over captain Zuniga, as his minister to the cherif, with whom he made an alliance in his master's name, procured the duke of Barcelos and the Spanish ambassador to be released without ransom ; and the supposed body of Don Sebastian, deposited at Alcaçar-quivir, was likewise given to his Catholic majesty, by whose direction it was sent to Ceuta ; and the governor, having given an authentic receipt for it, transported it from thence to Portugal, where it was interred with the rest of his ancestors in the monastery of Bellem, with all possible solemnity ; and with the like ceremony his obsequies were observed at Madrid (D). This was the end of Don Sebastian, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign ; who, by his obstinate imprudence, sacrificed himself and his subjects ; for he left the kingdom in a most exhausted state, deprived of men, money, and reputation, most of her nobility slain, and scarce an ancient family which had not some member or other in slavery : so that a country, which at the demise of king John was the wonder and envy, became in so short a space of time the object of amazement and pity, to all Europe (E).

P CABRERA, ANTONIO DE HERRERA, SIGUENCA, JUAN DE BAENA,

(D) All the pains taken to authenticate the death of this monarch could not effect it, and plausible answers were given even to those which seemed the most direct proofs. As for instance, it was said that his valet de chambre brought a body to Muley Hamet, and owned it for his master's, that he might stop all farther searches, and facilitate his escape. The nobility of Portugal, who saw and owned this body, are said to have acted from the same motive ; and some of them, after they came back, did acknowledge, that it was so disfigured with wounds and blood, that it was impossible to know it (2). Yet it was this body that king Philip received from the Moors ; it was this body that was delivered to the Portuguese ; it was this body that was interred at Bellem ; and it was upon the supposition of its being the body of Don Sebastian, that Philip the second caused his obsequies to be celebrated at Madrid (3). However, Don Antonio, prior of Crato, always affected to speak doubtfully of this event. In the reign of the king and cardinal Henry, there was a rumour prevailed that Don Sebastian was actually returned into Algarve ; and a person has been named who is said to have carried a message from Don Sebastian to that king, whose ambition is said to have stifled all affection for his nephew (4). Be this as it will, it is very certain that there were several impostors who assumed the name of this prince, as we have shewn in the history of Spain ; and we shall hereafter mention one, with respect to whom it is by no means clear whether he was an impostor or not (5). But though his history be very marvellous, yet there is nothing in it so strange as that there should be still persons in Portugal, and persons in other respects of good sense, who would die martyrs for their opinion, that he is yet miraculously preserved ; and that some time or other he will be again seated on the throne of Portugal. This faction, or sect, call them which you please, are stiled in Portugal Sebastianistas, and though they have not printed any arguments, yet they have written many memoirs, which are handed about, in which they have laboured, with incredible zeal and industry, to support this strange opinion (6).

(E) As to the person of Don Sebastian, he was above the common size, his body well proportioned, his eyes blue, his countenance pleasing and majestic, extremely adroit in his exercises, prodigiously strong, incapable of fear, magnificent, generous, affable, full of justice, piety, and truth. His virtues he owed to nature ; his faults and follies to his education (7). He must have been in all respects an extraordinary person, to have attached in the manner he did a whole nation, not only to his person but to his memory. He had, however, great imperfections ; and amongst these his passion and his obstinacy were by far the greatest. There are certainly great inconsistencies in all the accounts we have of him, and in almost all the considerable branches of those accounts (8). It is not only the Portuguese, but also the Spanish history, in which the beauty of his person is commended ; and yet both seem to admit that it had some singular and surprising defects. His right hand, for instance, was longer than his left ; as he was higher on the left side than on the right. We meet with no particular accounts of mischiefs that befel him, before his expedition to Africa ; and yet it is affirmed that he had upon his body the scars of twenty-five remarkable wounds (9). The current of the best histories make it apparent, that his expedition and his end proceeded intirely from himself. His appetite for glory was so strong, that nothing could restrain him ; his contempt of danger so great, that he wore green armour in the battle of Alcaçar, that he might be the more easily distinguished by friends and foes. But notwithstanding this, some, and particularly Brantome, have laboured to induce the world to believe the king was persuaded, or rather seduced, to invade Africa, by the jesuits, who were in the interests of king Philip. That the jesuits were the authors of the expedition, and of the king's misfortunes, is certainly true in one sense, but not in this (1). They inspired him with the notions that undid him ; but certainly they had not this in view ; for in his first expedition, which was as wild and desperate as the last, it was the pathetic letter of father Gonsalez, of that order, which induced him to return ; and if Philip is to be acquitted of any accusation that was ever

At the time the fleet arrived in Portugal with the melancholy news of the defeat at Alcaçar-quivir, cardinal Henry was at Alcobaçar, of which royal monastery he was abbot: the regency immediately sent him notice of it; upon which he came to Lisbon, where, on the twenty-second of August, in the house of the duke of Bragança, he assumed the title of protector, and on that day sevensnight, having received the news of the king's death, after celebrating mass in the church of the hospital of All Saints, he assumed the crown, being then in the sixty-seventh year of his age^a. He was at this time archbishop of Braga, Lisbon, and Coimbra, from which, and from the abbey of Alcobaçar, though he drew an immense revenue, he was far from being rich: neither was the wealth of these ecclesiastical preferments at any time better bestowed. He was an enemy to pomp, without vices, sincerely pious, and had been hitherto occupied in providing for the education of poor children, relieving the sick and infirm, building hospitals for the aged, giving fortunes to young women disposed to marriage, and encouraging men of letters. This great change in his circumstances made some in his conduct: he shewed that he was not altogether so free from spleen as had been imagined: he removed Alcaçova from his employments, banished Lewis de Silva, and some others who had treated him ill under the reign of his nephew^b. King Philip immediately dispatched Christopher de Moura to compliment him upon his accession, and to sound his inclinations, which he found to be entirely favourable to Katherine dutchess of Bragança. He treated the poor king, however, with civility and respect, and advised him to take every measure he could to make his own life easy. The return of Don Antonio, prior of Crato, did not much contribute to this: he found means to get out of Barbary by pretending to be a poor ecclesiastic, and that he should lose his benefice if he did not return within a limited time: upon which a Jew either paid or became bound for his ransom; on which he set out for Ceuta, and from thence came to Lisbon, where he began to cabal; which provoked the king his uncle extremely, who never had any good opinion of him, and now thought of him daily worse and worse^c. The bulk of the people seemed desirous that Henry should marry, and pressed him to send ambassadors upon that head to the Pope, which for some time he declined: at length they were nominated, but did not go. However, Philip the second discovered that this prince was more a politician than he expected; and that he had privately directed his agents to apply to Pope Gregory the thirteenth upon this head. The Spanish ambassador had orders to take every method possible to prevent it. The Pope, notwithstanding, directed a particular congregation of cardinals to consider this point, who reported to him, that it was not fit for him to grant a dispensation; yet the agents of Henry still solicited with so much zeal, that it was suspected at Rome the cardinal had some illegitimate son, whose title he might have a desire to help by marrying his mother. It is more probable those agents solicited without the king's orders, through an honest desire of saving their country from falling under the yoke of foreigners; but it proved ineffectual, for, under pretence of its requiring mature deliberation, Gregory would decide nothing; and though he made a merit of this to king Philip, yet the true reason of his conduct was, that he had a mind to frame a title of the holy see to the crown of Portugal, or at least to establish in himself the sole right of judging to whom the succession of that crown belonged: in order to which it was equally necessary to him and to king Philip, that this cardinal monarch should die without issue^d.

ALL monarchs, however great and happy, have notwithstanding some causes of chagrin; but Henry of Portugal had every thing to chagrin, and no one circumstance to console or content him. He heard nothing from the hour he was seated upon the throne but enquiries who was to be his successor, and saw plainly that the utmost he had to expect was to be confessed sole and supreme judge of this point; which most writers seem to agree he might have been, if he had shewn a sufficient degree of steadiness and courage; but his profession, his age, and his circumstances considered, we need not wonder that this was wanting. There were but five titles, out of many, that deserved to be considered, and of these there were three at least, in respect to preference, of which it was not easy to decide. The first of brought against him, this seems to be that which is most destitute of proof (2). It may be said with more probability, that the Pope instigated him to this fatal expedition, for he sent him one of the arrows with which the infidels pierced St. Sebastian; and, like the poisoned shirt bestowed upon Hercules, this gift continually tortured him and spurred him on to revenge (3).

The Pope likewise granted him bulls, by which he raised money upon his clergy, and sent a nuncio to compliment him upon his zeal for the Christian faith (4). Yet all this might be without any intention to promote his ruin, though the Pope set up a claim to his dominions, as well as the king of Spain.

these was the prince Ranuccio of Parma, whose mother, Donna Maria, died about two years before: she was the eldest daughter of the infant Don Duarte, and consequently her son claimed to be the legal heir of the crown. The next was the duchess of Bragança: she was the second daughter of the same prince; but she affirmed, or rather her lawyers affirmed for her, that the civil law did not allow the benefit of representation beyond the third degree of propinquity to the last possessor; so that she being nearer by a degree to the reigning king than her nephew Ranuccio, ought to be preferred before him. She likewise claimed to be preferred before Philip, who stood in equal degree to king Henry, because she claimed under a male, and he under a female. Philip the second was the son of the infanta Donna Isabella, sister to the infant Don Duarte. The duke of Savoy claimed in right of his mother Donna Beatrix, who was the younger sister of Donna Isabella above-mentioned. Don Antonio, prior of Crato, asserted, that the infant Don Lewis, duke of Beja, was privately married to his mother; which if he could have made out, would have given him a better title beyond comparison than any of these; but not against Catherine de Medicis, queen-mother of France, who set forth, that she was descended from Robert the son of Don Alonso the third, by his first wife Maud; so that all the kings of Portugal from Don Denis were usurpers, and therefore it was high time to restore the crown to her, who was the last of the right line. To this there lay one pretty strong objection, taken from the will of the countess Maud, from whence it clearly appeared that she never had any children by Don Alonso^a. The Pope also put in his claim, and insinuated a double right; first, because the holy see had either given or confirmed the regal title to Don Alonso Fitz Henry; which, however, was denied by all the laity of the kingdom of Portugal, who affirmed it was given him by their ancestors, and, which was more, that they purchased it too by their blood. The second claim was taken from the reigning king, to whom, as a cardinal, the see of Rome was heir. But this was denied, because in point of civil succession no such title had been ever admitted^w. After all, the best title was destitute of support, or otherwise the prince of Parma must have prevailed. The duchess of Bragança had in the beginning the king in possession for her, and the statutes of Lamego, which were either valid, or all the kings from John the first were usurpers. King Philip had his own power, and by far the best advocates; for he was one of those kings who thought the pen at least as good a weapon as the sword; and therefore attempted nothing without a previous appeal to the judgment of mankind, which he often courted in so plausible a manner as to obtain it; which, if it could not give him right, gave him what was next to it, the colour of right, which, in truth, was all he wanted. Don Antonio's claim was in right of blood; but his best support was the favour of the people, and particularly of the Jews; and therefore it was sometimes given out, that in the present perplexed state of things, the right originally derived from, devolved again to the people^x.

His timid and
duct.

In this unhappy and confused condition of public affairs, it was a great additional misfortune, that all power of rendering them better, or indeed of reducing them into any degree of order, depended upon the king. It is believed, and it is highly probable, he meant well; but at the same time it is universally allowed that he acted ill: he removed some men of merit, and more of capacity. Those he brought in were, like himself, mild and moderate; but no way suited to the juncture in which they were employed; so that, except suppressing the salt tax, there was scarce a right step taken during his reign: so very easy a thing it is for a king to be a very good man, and yet not a good prince, which, however, seldom springs so much from weakness of abilities as from want of resolution. He really wished the good of his people, but wanted the spirit, courage, and skill necessary to take proper measures for preventing the miseries with which they were threatened. The states of the realm desired him to declare his successor, and the magistrates of Lisbon presented to him strong remonstrances on the same subject. He answered them, it was a matter deserved much and serious reflection; but he would in time provide for the succession. He was undoubtedly inclined to the duchess of Bragança, and encouraged the lawyers of Coimbra to write for the maintenance of her title, in order to prepare the world for the declaration he was disposed to make in her favour: and had he clearly and expressly declared her his successor, and got her acknowledged as such by the states of Portugal, which might easily have been done, the kingdom would, in all probability, have united in supporting her interest against Philip, and the miseries which ensued upon a different conduct, in a great measure been prevented. What diverted, or rather with-held him from taking that step, was his fear of a civil war between her and Don Antonio, who was favoured by the common people. But incapable of taking a a vigorous step; finding almost equal difficulties in all that were suggested, and uncertain what party to take, he sought only to gain time, and put off a declaration, which was absolutely necessary for the quiet and safety of the kingdom, and the delay of which could not but prove fatal. This was the worst party of any that could be taken; yet he resolved to cite all that laid claim to the crown to appear before him, and produce their respective reasons. His age and infirmities were such that it was not likely he could live till a decision: he proposed therefore to appoint five governors with a sovereign authority during the interregnum; and to oblige the people to swear obedience to them, whilst they examined at their leisure the titles of the candidates, and till they had pronounced sentence on their several pretensions. The world was very justly amazed at this resolution, and the people complained of the b slowness of his determination, when he could not flatter himself with hopes of living to behold the end of the cause. They railed openly at his ministers and measures, and maintained that he ought himself to decide the right of succession, to declare his successor, and see that he took an oath to preserve the rights and privileges of the nation; and that it was too tedious in the present perilous juncture even to wait an assembly of the states, their condition and situation requiring an immediate declaration^y.

HENRY, however was positive, or rather obstinate, in his resolution, and calling together the states to confirm it, they met at Lisbon on the first of April. He asked their advice how to provide for the good of the realm, but scarce two persons agreed in the same sentiment. In this confusion he talked in private with the principal persons of the clergy, nobility, and gentry, and prevailed with them not to insist on his naming a successor at that time, but to consent to his regulation. It was resolved that he should hear the reasons of the several candidates, and give his judgment thereon; but this judgment was not to be published till after his decease. In case he died before this was done, the affair of the succession was to be decided by eleven persons to be chosen by the king out of twenty-four named by the states; and the government of the realm during the interregnum was to be in the hands of five persons appointed by his majesty out of fifteen recommended by the states, all the members whereof swore to obey the governors so chosen, and the person who should be declared successor^z. The states being dissolved, Henry cited the candidates. Ferdinand Farnese, bishop of Parma, came to support the interests of the young prince Ranuccio, who was still a child, and might have been bred up as the Portuguese pleased; Charles de la Rouere appeared for the duke of Savoy; and Urban de St. Gelais, bishop of Cominges, for Katherine de Medicis, who was admitted to set forth her claim, but could not support it by any proof. Philip, suspecting as well the goodness of his cause as Henry's disposition towards him, refused to appear, alleging, that a king's power ceased at his death, and he could bequeath no authority to governors; nor had he in his own life any power to judge of the rights of his successor, or take them away by his sentence. The duke of Bragança appeared to support his consort's pretensions^a; as Don Antonio did to support his own. These two last quarrelled, and the animosity between them raised a great disturbance in the court. Henry ordered the former to retire from thence, and the latter to his priory: yet the duke returned soon to maintain his cause in person: a favour which was not indulged the other. Antonio complained of this inequality of treatment; yet sent his agents and witnesses to make out his title; but the latter either recanting, or disagreeing in their depositions, he was declared illegitimate. Instead of retiring to Crato, he went over the several provinces of the kingdom to court the populace. This proceeding incensed Henry so highly, that he issued out a proclamation against him, confiscated his goods, and banished him the kingdom in fifteen days^b. Antonio not obeying this order, but lurking in secret, and being protected by the people, so that he could not be taken or discovered, was summoned to court, but did not come, being afraid to trust himself in the way of the king's resentment. King Philip, though he would not appear in form to support his claim, sent first Christopher de Moura as his ordinary ambassador, and afterwards the duke of Offuna as an extraordinary one, to take care of his interests^c. He wrote also to the chief cities of Portugal, representing his descent from the royal blood of their kings, the kindness he had shewed, and the good offices he had done their countrymen prisoners in Barbary, offering to augment their privileges, flattering them with the expectations of great benefit from a free trade to the Spanish West Indies, and laying before them every thing that they had either to hope or fear from his power. His ambassadors were continually soliciting Henry to declare him his successor, and neglected no measures that could be serviceable to carry their point. They did not fail to employ money properly, and by large presents, and larger promises, they drew in several persons of quality. But however notable their management, and considerable their success were, he would not trust to them entirely;

but assembled a powerful army of old Spanish soldiers, and levied great numbers of new forces in Italy and Germany, resolved at any rate to make himself master of Portugal.

The states labour to set him right in vain.

THE timid and diseased old king, seeing these preparations, was afraid of declaring the dutchefts of Bragança, whom he judged unable to resist Philip, especially since the affections of the common people were so much set on Don Antonio, that a civil war was expected to be raised within the kingdom, at the same time that it was attacked by the Spaniards from without. His apprehensions of Antonio's popularity were so strong, that he raised new companies of guards for the security of his person. These fears of his were so improved by Leon Henriquez, a jesuit, his confessor, who had a vast ascendant over him, and who, though he had been at first for Katherine, was now gained over to Philip's party, that he was brought to think the only way to save the nation from that immediate ruin that threatened it, was to compromise things with Philip, and declare that prince his successor^d. This design he communicated to the Spanish ambassadors, and sent the project of an accommodation (in which it was provided that no charges should be given but to natives of Portugal, and some other flattering conditions were inserted) with great secrecy to Madrid, signifying his intention of laying it before the states to obtain their consent. Philip, though he hoped well of the clergy and the nobility, as being most of them gained by his agents, yet knowing the aversion of the people to the Castilian government, easily imagined it would be impracticable to obtain the concurrence of the third estate. He proposed therefore consulting the cities singly, and used strong remonstrances against assembling the states, who having already given the king power to declare his successor, there was no need of calling them again. But Henry was not now, more than formerly, to be diverted from his own methods by any reasons; and the states meeting at the palace of Almerin, January the ninth, he communicated to them his design of concluding a capitulation between Philip and the kingdom, as the only expedient of preserving peace in the nation, which, if Philip succeeded to on such advantageous conditions, would receive great benefit by his succession. The clergy accepted it readily; and it was after long debates among the nobility, carried there by a single voice; but it was rejected by the third estate^e. The king had used his utmost endeavours to get the cities to chuse deputies to his mind, and to gain such as were returned: he had prevailed in Lisbon to get such elected as he thought most dependent on his will; but failed of his point at Coimbra, and in the rest of the cities. These deputies were unanimous in rejecting all manner of accommodation with the Castilians, and Phæbus Moniz, one of the deputies for Lisbon, and more attached to him than any other, desired him, in the name of the rest, not to give them up to Castile; but to declare any Portuguese whatever his successor, and they would be satisfied. The king rejecting this, and the states perceiving that there were some secret negotiations between one of the claimants and king Philip, declared roundly, that they considered themselves as the supreme power, and would fill the throne, whenever it became vacant, by election^f.

Henry dies, and the male line of the Portuguese monarchs becomes extinct.

THEY had very soon an opportunity of doing this, if they had stuck to that resolution, since in the midst of these disorders and disputes king Henry ended his life on the last day of the month of January, when he had lived precisely sixty-eight years, and had reigned something more than seventeen months^g. The plague being at Lisbon, his body was deposited at Almerin, from whence it was afterwards removed by king Philip to Bellem(F). He was the nineteenth sovereign, and the seventeenth king of Portugal, the eighth and last monarch of his house; for in him the male line of the Portuguese princes determined, after having subsisted upwards of four hundred and sixty years. He was very little esteemed, and less lamented,

(F) This last king of Portugal much resembled his father; of a middle stature, thin habit of body, very light and lively, and capable of much labour. He understood all the learned languages, was well acquainted with divinity, and had some tincture of the mathematics. He could command his looks much better than his passions: he not only remembered injuries, but revenged them: his judgment was sound enough in foreseeing misfortunes, though he had not sagacity enough to find out remedies(6). He died displeased with his subjects, as they also were with him. Some of the Portuguese writers have made many superstitious remarks on the beginning and ending of their sovereignty with a prince of the same name. They likewise observe, that this Henry was born precisely four hundred years after Henry of Burgundy; but of what use these remarks are it is hard to say(7). But it may not be amiss to take notice, that in the year of his accession the mother of king Sebastian died, as did likewise the cardinal's youngest sister Mary, who, if she had survived, must have succeeded him(8). But through the indulgence of her father, and the dispositions made in her favour by the queen dowager her mother, she amassed so large a fortune, that the Portuguese were unwilling to see it carried out of the kingdom, which hindered her marriage; though if a proper choice had been made in that, by espousing her to a prince of the blood at home, all the miseries they afterwards felt might have been avoided(9).

a notwithstanding he had done many laudable actions in the course of his life, though very few during that of his reign; yet he lost nothing, for by a timely peace with the cherif he secured the few places that were still left in Africa, and procured at a large expence the return of most of those who survived the battle of Alcaçar; but in respect to the poverty and weakness of the kingdom, both were too visible at the time of his decease, of which, though he was very sensible, yet he knew not how to seek, or how to apply a remedy. In short, he died disconsolate, and the monarchy with him.

The reduction of Portugal by Philip; the continuance of it under the dominion of the kings of Spain till the revolution, by which the duke of Bragança was advanced to the throne.

b IN the former part of this work we have already treated of the expedition into Portugal by the famous duke of Alva, in the light in which it has been considered by and from the authorities afforded us by the Spanish historians; but as these are not entirely consistent with what we find delivered by Portuguese writers, and as the reduction and revolution of Portugal are points of the highest importance in modern history, the reader has a right to expect a more full relation of them here. We will, therefore, within the compass of this section, endeavour, with all possible succinctness and impartiality, to explain in what manner king Philip annexed Portugal, with all her conquests in the Indies, to his dominions; what efforts were made by Don Antonio, prior of Crato, to support his claim; the maxims pursued by him and his successors in the administration of the affairs in Portugal, so long as it remained under their obedience; and lastly, what were the true sources that induced this nation so unanimously to throw off what they called the yoke of Castile, and what concurrent circumstances there fell out to facilitate this bold step, and to maintain them in possession of their independency, after by this generous effort they had so gloriously recovered it. In order to treat these matters with perspicuity, as well as to pursue strictly the plan we have laid down, we must resume the thread of our narration from the demise of the king and cardinal Don Henry.

Upon the death of that monarch, the five governors assumed the administration of the kingdom: and the duchess of Bragança referred her cause to them, pressing for their definitive judgment^a. Philip also wrote to them in maintenance of his right, and offering them the terms upon which Henry had insisted, sending them a copy of that prince's memorial. He wrote also to the principal nobility, and the five chief cities of the kingdom, to the same effect. The governors, three of whom were in his interest, published the conditions he had granted; viz. that he would take a solemn oath to maintain the privileges and liberties of the people: that the states should be assembled within the realm, and nothing proposed in any other states that related to Portugal: that the viceroy, or chief governor, should be a native, unless the king should give that charge to one of the royal family: that the household should be kept on the same foot: that the post of first president, and all civil, judicial, and military offices, should be filled with Portuguese; all dignities in the church, and in the orders of knighthood, confined to the same: the commerce of Ethiopia, Africa, and the Indies, reserved also to them, and to be carried on only by their merchants and vessels: that he would remit the third penny, the crusadoes, and other imposts on ecclesiastical revenues: that he would make no grant of any city, town, or jurisdiction royal, to any but Portuguese: that estates resulting from forfeitures should not be united to the domain, but go to the relations of the last possessor, or be given to other Portuguese for recompence of services: that when the king came into Portugal, where he should reside as much as possible, he should not take the houses of private persons for his officers lodging, as in Castile, but keep to the custom of Portugal: that wherever his majesty resided he should have an ecclesiastic, a treasurer, a chancellor, two masters of requests, with under officers, all of them Portuguese, who should dispatch every thing relating to the kingdom: that Portugal should ever continue a distinct kingdom, and its revenue consumed within itself: that all matters of justice should be decided within the realm: that the Portuguese should be admitted to charges in the king and queen of Spain's households: that all duties of entry on the frontiers be taken away: that Philip should give three hundred thousand ducats to redeem prisoners, repair cities, and relieve the miseries which the plague and other calamities had brought on the people. The clergy and nobility were for accepting these offers; but the deputies of towns refused them, believing they would not be long kept^b.

betrayed by the regents.

THE kingdom of Portugal was at this time in a condition very unfit to oppose the arms of Philip. Besides the terrible blow received two years before in Barbary, an excessive drought had spoiled their harvest, and caused a famine. The extreme scarcity of provisions, unwholesome diet, or infected commodities, had occasioned a plague in Lisbon, which spread all over the kingdom. There was no money in the treasury; and when it was proposed to the merchants to lend so small a sum as one hundred thousand ducats, they refused. The very capital city of Lisbon was without walls in several places, and all the forts in the kingdom destitute of garrisons and ammunition. There was, however, still a sufficient force in Portugal to defend it, had there been any union among the nobility, any spirit of obedience among the people, or any head to direct the conduct of both, and put the nation on exerting itself with vigour, and collected force. The greater part of the governors were in the interest of Philip, and desirous of delivering up their country into his hands; but this they durst not declare, and they found that the execution of it was not so easy as they had imagined. The method they took was none of the most honourable: they pretended to inspect the magazines, out of which they took some of the powder, and caused the rest to be mixed with sand: they appointed an agent to go and demand succours from the crown of France, which they knew could not arrive in time: they dissolved the states as soon as they discovered they were bent on rendering themselves a free people: and, under a shew of confidence, they sent such of the nobility as they most suspected, to command in different places on the frontiers^c. Thus, in hopes of advantages which their posterity never enjoyed, they sacrificed the honour, independency, and welfare of their country.

claimed king.

ABOUT the middle of June, the duke of Alva, by Philip's orders, entered Portugal with twenty thousand men. Elvas, Olivenza, Serpa, Moura, Portalegre, Estremos, and other towns, submitted to him without any opposition, there being Spanish factions in all of them ready to force the governors to surrender^d. The people ascribed all to the five governors, and exclaimed against their betraying the kingdom to Philip. Don Antonio, to make his advantage of these discontents, took occasion, from the building of a fort at Santaren, to get himself proclaimed king in a tumult. The project succeeded, the mob declared for him, and several of the nobility were compelled to be witnesses of the proclamation; but being a man of little judgment (though not without some learning) his passion for a crown was too violent to let him wait so long, and he placed all his hopes in this tumultuary election; which the nobility disliking, retired to their own houses and revolted, as soon as the force upon them was removed^e. This defection was so general, that scarce any of them stood by him but the count of Vimioso. He was, however, so much in favour with the people, and all the religious were so zealous for him, that he was proclaimed in almost all the towns north of the Tajo; and marching to Lisbon, was received there by the inhabitants who were left in it by the plague, which had made the rich merchants quit the city, as the magistrates also did upon his approach^f. From thence he sent the count of Vimioso to Setuval, which declaring for him, the governors fled in great confusion, gave sentence in favour of Philip, declaring him king of Portugal, in virtue of the laws^g, who was like to be so by force of arms.

His forces beat by the duke of Alva.

DON Antonio, being master of the capital, seized on the arsenal and magazines, placed new magistrates, officers of justice, and ministers; but as he employed new men without experience, ready to execute all his orders with rigour, the place was soon full of violences, rapine, plunder, and all manner of disorders. He made great offers to the duke of Bragança, the marquis of Villa-Real, and other grandes: he wrote also to the lower nobility, but very few cared to acknowledge him^h. These were great discouragements: however, to provide the best he could for his defence, he sent the French consul to France, to procure a succour of two thousand men, seized the crown jewels, the collections that had been made for redeeming slaves in Barbary, the plate of churches, the money deposited in convents, or given to charitable uses, and left no means untried to provide a fund sufficient for the support of an army. He depended on the populace for numbers; but as the peasants could not leave their work to make a campaign, and he found it impracticable to keep any considerable number of them together for above a day, he, to supply that defect, armed the negro slaves that were in Lisbon, and published a proclamation, offering freedom to all that would take up armsⁱ. This gave occasion to infinite disorders, those negroes seizing arms, stealing horses, and supplying themselves with every thing they wanted or desired, wherever it was found. With this hasty ill-armed body of men he resolved on defending the Tajo, and hindering the duke of Alva's passage. On the other hand, the duke having had the town of Setuval delivered to him by the inhabitants, and received the submission of the kingdom of Algarve,

- a and all the country south of the Tajo, advanced to pass the river, which he did at Cascaes, by the help of the Spanish galleys, without any difficulty. Cascaes and fort St. Julien being surrendered to him, and Cabezaseca abandoned, the duke marched to Alcantara, where Antonio was posted with all the men he could draw together; but without officers qualified to command, or soldiers that knew how to obey^k. In this condition his forces, inferior in number and all other respects, were routed August the twenty-fifth, when the Spaniards pursuing them to Lisbon, the city was reduced by capitulation, and saved from plunder^l: but the suburbs, which were much larger and finer than what was inclosed within the walls, and all the neighbouring villages, were sacked for several days together by the soldiers, at which king Philip was much offended. He was very desirous the different behaviour of his troops from those of Don Antonio should have done honour to his title, and he could not be disappointed without being chagrined.
- b

At the beginning of the rout Don Antonio passed through Lisbon, without stopping to Don Antonio have a wound dressed, fled to Santaren, and from thence to Coimbra. There he once more assembled four or five thousand men; but Sancho de Avila being sent against him, received in his march the submission of Coimbra, Monte Mayor, and Aveyro, forced a passage over the Duero, and, in consequence of that success, took Porto^m. Antonio quitting this last place, fled to Viana; but being closely pursued by some of the Spanish cavalry, took shipping in order to retire into France. The wind proving contrary, and the weather stormy, the Spaniards were about to attack the ship; so that he was obliged to quit it, and throw himself disguised into a little skiff, and get ashore near Viana, even in the sight of a party of horse; yet he had the good fortune to escape, and to be concealed privately in the country. A reward of eighty thousand ducats was put on his head, and all endeavours were used to seize his person, but in vain. He travelled about, and often passed in disguise through the midst of those that were in quest of him, without being known. Some even of his retinue and servants were taken as they were getting provisions for his embarkment at Lisbon, and put to death, yet they made no discovery where he was. He continued in the kingdom from October to July; was at all the ports of the kingdom seeking for a passage, and at Lisbon when Philip himself was there; but as he could not embark at that place because his men were taken, he went to Setuval, where, with half a dozen of his most faithful friends, he embarked, and landed safely at *Calais*ⁿ. Upon his flight, all the kingdom submitted, and owned the king of Spain; as did the garrisons in Barbary, and all the Portuguese settlements on the coasts of Guiney, in Brazil, the East-Indies, and the isle of St. Michael^o; but the rest of the Madeiras held for Antonio till they were reduced, and the French naval army, sent to their relief, beaten and destroyed^p. We have mentioned this in the history of Castile, with some memorable circumstances attending it.

PHILIP would not seem a conqueror, and therefore did not enter the kingdom till it was entirely reduced; but came to Elvas, where he abolished the duties on entry, which were levied upon all merchandize from the one realm to the other, valued at one hundred and fifty thousand ducats a year. He entered Lisbon with a kind of fullen pomp, without acclamations^q. He called an assembly of the states at Tomar, in April. He confirmed the terms he had offered to the kingdom by his letters: but whereas the duke of Osuna, by way of security for those conditions, had promised them a law by way of proviso, that if the king did not observe them, the states should be freed from their oath of obedience, and might defend their rights by the sword, without incurring the reproach of perjury, or the guilt of treason; this he absolutely refused to ratify. He endeavoured, but with little effect, to reconcile the Portuguese to his government, and was so lavish in bestowing honours and gratifications, that the Spaniards said he had to his other titles to that crown added that of purchase^r. This, however, did not satisfy every body; for when was that ever done? It was calculated to conciliate the affections of the Portuguese to his family, and it failed of doing this; but it had an effect which was not foreseen even by a prince whose foresight was his characteristic; it weakened the power, it absorbed the revenues of the crown; it rendered Portugal a province, and a dead weight to his other dominions; and, by putting it out of the power of his successors to be liberal in any proportion, it raised a short-lived gratitude only in a few, and left a multitude of malcontents, to which time was continually adding. The Portuguese writers say he did not do enough for the family of Bragança. The Spaniards, as we have shewn elsewhere, say that he did too much. It is agreed by both that the dukes was not satisfied; and that the duke and his son did him homage. It is said by the former, that Philip's agents had promised the kingdom of Algarve, and the privilege of sending an annual ship to the West-Indies, which the king would not ratify; and if this was true, it fortified the title of that house, for it shewed that Philip had treated for that title, and not giving the equivalent, left it in the same condition in which he found it^a. Here again he failed also in his politics; for he laboured to supply the defects in his gratifications, by testimonies of respect and compliment, which at once fortified the sense of the Bragança family of the justice of their own title, and heightened also the good opinion which had been entertained of it by the wisest people in the nation. He had his views in this; but accidents were too hard for those views, for he who framed these could not command those; but he had other difficulties to struggle with. b

He is not able to effect this; but on the contrary disgusts more than he obliges.

THE deputies of the third estate presented a remonstrance on the state of the nation, pressing him to send the prince his son to be educated amongst them; to withdraw the garrisons of Castilians and Italians, which he had put into the strong places; to abolish certain taxes; to keep Portugal independent of Castile; and to make some regulations in justice. He agreed to a few of these, and those of the least consequence; the rest were refused or declined^c. The nobility, having never acted against his catholic majesty, thought nothing could be denied them; and therefore demanded, by a deputation, a jurisdiction over their vassals; to annex the principal employments to their body, exclusive of all others; to ennoble none for the future, unless for very great services, and then for life, so that the title should not descend. These, and other articles of a like nature, were rejected; so that they now began to repent they had not acted in concert to oppose his entrance, till they had made their own terms^d. Before the assembly separated, a general indemnity, as it was called, came abroad; but so full of restrictions, that it by no means deserved the name. Fifty-two persons, of the highest consideration, were excepted; not a monk could have benefit thereby, or indeed any who had ever followed Don Antonio, received any honour, dignity, or gratification from, or had any employment under him. All these were declared incapable of holding, for the future, any office in the state, or of being continued in those that they possessed; so that the Portuguese said, the pardon extended to none but such as had never offended, or had nothing to lose; and were highly exasperated to find themselves so deceived with regard to their expectations in this respect^e. Nor could any intreaty prevail to make the pardon more general; but the excepted persons were summoned and prosecuted, great numbers of men of quality, and others, were imprisoned, put to death, treated with the utmost rigour, or sent prisoners into Castile: even the women were not exempted, their goods being confiscated, their persons imprisoned, and some of them taken out of convents sent into Castile: none suffered more remarkably than the monks and other religious, of whom he destroyed an incredible number; and not to speak of those who died by hardships in his prisons, he got, in a fit of conscience, from the Pope, a brief of pardon for two thousand religious, whom he had put to death in different manners. The carcases of many of these being thrown into the Tajo, were there taken up, some in their habits of monks by the fishermen, who thereupon fancying the river to be excommunicated, would not eat of the fish, nor follow their usual occupations, till the archbishop of Lisbon, to humour their simplicity, went solemnly, with the accustomed rites, to the river, and absolved it from the supposed excommunication. The king staid there much longer than he originally intended, and at his departure left the cardinal arch-duke Albert his viceroy, with a good Portuguese council about him, and all the exterior marks of power; but with little trust, and less of real authority^f. Thus in the dawn of Philip's reign the seeds were unwittingly sowed of universal discontent.

As for Don Antonio, who had been proclaimed, and still stiled himself king of Portugal, he first retired into France, and there demanded succours for the recovery of his dominions. He found so much countenance, that with a fleet of near sixty sail, and a good body of troops on board, he made an attempt upon the Terceras, where his fleet was beat by the Spaniards; and a great number of prisoners being taken, all the officers and gentlemen were beheaded, and a great number of meaner people hanged. Don Antonio, notwithstanding, kept possession of some places, coined money, and did many other acts of regal power; but was at length constrained to retire, and it was with some difficulty that he did this, and returned into France^g. He passed from thence into England, where he was well received; and many fitted out privateers to cruise against the Spaniards under his commission. But after king Philip had ruined the naval power of Portugal, as well as Spain, by equipping the armada, queen Elizabeth made no difficulty of owning and assisting Don Antonio, and even of sending Sir

- ^a John Norris and Sir Francis Drake with a strong fleet and a great army to restore him. Upon this occasion ² Don Antonio sent his son Don Christopher a hostage to Muley Hamet, king of Fez and Morocco, who was to lend him two hundred thousand ducats; but king Philip prevented this by surrendering Arzila; and this disappointment, the unseasonable enterprize upon Corunna, and the disputes that arose between Norris and Drake, rendered that expedition abortive; so that, except carrying the plague into England, it was attended with no consequences worthy of notice². He remained some time after in England; but finding himself little regarded, he withdrew once more into France, where he fell into great poverty and distress, and at length dying in the sixty-fourth year of his age, his body was buried in the church of the nuns of Ave Maria, with an inscription on his tomb in which he is stiled king^b.
- ^b He left several children behind him, who, on account of his being a knight of Malta, and having made a vow of virginity at his entrance into the order, were looked upon as illegitimate. He preserved even to the day of his death a great interest in Portugal, and had drawn from thence, in the course of his life, immense sums of money; which had been squandered in many fruitless negotiations, and attempts to disturb the possessions of king Philip in almost all parts of his dominions, and particularly in the Indies, where the Portuguese were rather more averse to the Castilian yoke, or at least testified their aversion more openly than in Europe.

BUT Don Antonio was not the only pretender to the crown of Portugal; for the people, partly through the love of their prince, and partly from their hatred to the Castilians, were continually feeding themselves with the hopes that Don Sebastian would appear and deliver them; and in this respect such a spirit of credulity reigned, that it was said proverbially, they would have taken a negro for Don Sebastian. This humour put the son of a tyler at Alcobaza, who had led a profligate life, and at length turned hermit, to give himself out for that prince; and having with him two companions, one of whom stiled himself Don Christopher de Tavora, and the other the bishop of Guarda, they began to collect money, and were in a fair way of creating much disturbance, if the cardinal arch-duke had not caused him to be apprehended, and after leading him ignominiously through the streets of Lisbon, he who took the name of Sebastian was sent to the gallies for life, and the pretended bishop was hanged^c. Not long after Gonfalo Alvarez, the son of a mason, gave himself out for the same king, and having promised marriage to the daughter of Pedro Alonso, a rich yeoman, whom he created earl of Torres Novas, he assembled a body of about eight hundred men, and some blood was spilt before he was apprehended: at length being clearly proved to be an impostor, himself and his intended father-in-law were publicly hanged and quartered at Lisbon; which, instead of extinguishing this humour, father increased it^d.

THERE was, however, a person who appeared about twenty years after the fatal defeat of Alcazar at Venice, who created much more trouble. He assumed the name of Don Sebastian, and gave a very distinct account of the manner in which he had passed his time from that fatal defeat. He affirmed, that he had preserved his life and liberty by hiding himself amongst the slain: that, after wandering in disguise for some time in Africa, he returned with two of his friends into the kingdom of Algarve: that he gave notice of this to the king Don Henry: that finding his life sought, and being unwilling to disturb the peace of the kingdom, he returned again among the Moors, and passed freely from one place to another in Barbary, in the habit of a penitent: that after this he became a hermit in Sicily; but at length resolved to go to Rome, and discover himself to the Pope^e. On the road he was robbed by his domestics, and came almost naked to Venice, where he was known, and acknowledged by some Portuguese. Complaint being made to the senate, he was obliged to retire to Padua. But the governor of that city ordering him also to depart, he not knowing what to do, returned again to Venice; where, at the request of the Spanish ambassador, who charged him not only with being an impostor, but also with many black and atrocious crimes, he was seized, and thrown into prison. He underwent twenty-eight examinations before a committee of noble and impartial persons; in which he not only acquitted himself clearly of all the crimes that had been laid to his charge, but entered also into so minute a detail of the transactions that had passed between himself and the republic, that the commissioners were perfectly astonished, and shewed no disposition to declare him an impostor, moved more especially by the firmness of his behaviour, his singular modesty, the sobriety of his life, his exemplary piety, and his admirable patience under his afflictions^f. The noise of this was diffused throughout Europe, and the enemies of Spain endeavoured every where to give it credit.

THE state, however, refused to discuss the great point, whether he was or was not an impostor, unless they were requested so to do by some prince or state in alliance with them. Upon this the prince of Orange sent Don Christopher, the son of the late Don Antonio, to make that demand, and at his request an examination was made with great solemnity; but no decision followed, only the senate set him at liberty, and ordered him to depart their dominions in three days^g. He went therefore, by the advice of his friends, to Padua, but in the disguise of a monk, and from thence to Florence; where he was arrested by the command of the grand duke, who delivered him to the viceroy of Naples. The count de Lemos, then in possession of that dignity, died soon after, before whom he was first brought; this man asserted, he must know him to be Don Sebastian, since he had been twice sent to him from the king of Spain^h. He remained prisoner several years in the castle del Ovo, where he endured incredible hardships. At length he was brought out, led with infamy through the streets of the city, and declared to be an impostor, who assumed the name of Sebastian: at which words, when proclaimed before him, he said gravely, and so I am. In the same proclamation it was affirmed, that he was in truth a Calabrian, which as soon as he heard, he said, *it is false*ⁱ. He was next shipped on board a galley as a slave; then carried to St. Lucar, where he was some time confined; from thence he was transferred to a castle in the heart of Castile, and never heard of more^k. Some persons were executed at Lisbon for their endeavours to raise an insurrection on his behalf; but it was thought strange policy, or rather a strange want of policy in the Spaniards, to make this affair so public without proofs; and the attempt to silence this objection, by affirming him to be a magician, was justly looked upon as ridiculous. It is very remarkable that Faria y Sousa^l, a very candid and exact writer, who mentions the former impostors with abhorrence, is altogether silent with regard to this man, whose story is very extraordinary in itself; and having so close a connection with the history of Portugal, we thought best to insert it here, though a little out of the order of time, to prevent repetitions, and that the several cases being produced together, might illustrate each other.

Errors in Philip's administration, which laid the foundation of the Portuguese discontent.

THE administration of affairs in Portugal, during the reign of Philip, was certainly detrimental to the nation, and yet it does not appear that this flowed so much from any ill intention in that monarch, as from errors in judgment. His prodigious preparations for the invasion of England impoverished all his European dominions; but it absolutely exhausted Portugal. The pretensions of Don Antonio, and the hopes of despoiling their Indian fleets, exposed the Portuguese to the resentment of the English; from which the king having granted away all his domains, wanted power to defend them. Their clamours were not at all the less loud for their being in some measure without cause. The king, to pacify them, borrowed money from the nobility upon the customs, which were the only sure remedy he had still left; and this was attended with fatal consequences. The branches thus mortgaged became, and continue to this hour, fixed and hereditary; so that the merchant was oppressed, and the king received nothing. This expedient failing, a tax of three per cent. was imposed, in the nature of ship-money, for the defence of the coasts and the commerce, which for some years was properly applied; but then made a part of the ordinary revenue, and went into the king's exchequer without account. This made way for diverting other appropriated branches; as for instance, that for the repair of fortifications, the money being strictly levied, and the works suffered to decay, and tumble down; and that for the maintenance of the conquests in Africa, by which the garrisons mouldered away, and the places were lost. Upon the whole, in the space of eighteen years, the nation was visibly impoverished, and yet the government of Philip was incomparably better than that of his successors; so that his death was justly regretted, and the Portuguese were taught by experience to confess, that of bad masters he was the best^m. A miserable consolation indeed (A)!

(A) In the foregoing history of Spain we have observed more than once that Philip the second treated the people of Portugal with more lenity than any of his successors; and in this we follow the Portuguese as well as the Spanish authors; but the former assert, that this was merely the effect of his policy, and that he was in reality the author of all the miseries they endured. In support of this they mention, and they produce a certain memorial, which they say was drawn and digested from the instructions which he left behind him, for the use of his son Philip the third, by one of his ministers; and the hints therein contained, as they say, were so many maxims of state, from which his son and grandson never digressed. It is certain that Philip the second did leave a political testament for his son, for which he is commended by some, and blamed by other writers⁽¹⁾. It is generally believed that we have this testament as Philip wrote it; and in that we find nothing more said of Portugal than that it was the only conquest that remained to him, after spending, in less than thirty-three years, five hundred and ninety-four millions of ducats; and that he did not look upon himself as very secure in the possession of it. In the close of it, indeed, he mentions some schemes that he had left in a place, of which Christopher de Moura had the key, and desires him to take care of them immediately, that a His son Philip, the second of Portugal and the third of Spain, sat twenty years upon the throne before he made a visit to Portugal, where the people, to convince him how soon a little sunshine might banish foul weather, put themselves to a most enormous expence to receive him; for which they received little more than the compliment, that, before his entry into Lisbon, he knew not how great a king he wasⁿ. He held an assembly of the states, in which his son was sworn successor. He having done all that he wanted for himself, acquired a false idea of the riches of the nation from an immoderate and foolish display of them during his short stay at Lisbon; and having shewn himself little, and done less, he returned into Spain; where he acted the part of a good king upon his death-bed, in deploring bitterly that he never thought of acting it before^o. The reign of Philip the third and fourth was a series of worse measures and worse fortune: all his dominions suffered greatly; Portugal most of all. The loss of Ormuz in the East, of Brazil in the West-Indies, together with the shipwreck of a fleet sent to escorte that from Goa, brought the nation incredibly low, and encouraged the conde duke to hope they might be entirely crushed. These are the heads only of the transactions for forty years: to enter in any degree into the particulars, is, in other words, to point out the breaches made by the Spanish ministers on the conditions granted by king Philip; which, with respect to them, was the original contract, and unalterable constitution of Portugal, while subject to the monarchs of Castile; and which, notwithstanding, they so often and so flagrantly violated, that one would have imagined they had studied to provoke the wrath of heaven, and insult the patience of men, instead of availing themselves, as they might have done, of the riches, power, and martial spirit of the Portuguese people. But having exhibited such a charge as this to the reader's view, we are bound in conscience to exhibit also the evidence, which we shall do as clearly and concisely as it is possible, and then there will be no room left to wonder, that, except a few of the nobility who were meanly content to be great, while the rest of their countrymen were little, united themselves with so much zeal, and at the same time with so much fortitude in their endeavours to shake off a yoke that had already rendered them miserable; and which, with the habit of a few years more, would have sunk into a race of naked and despicable slaves^p.

It was the very basis and foundation of their privileges, that the kingdom should remain separate and independent, and consequently that Lisbon should continue as much its capital as ever, the several supreme councils and courts residing there; so that the natives of this realm might not be obliged to travel in search of justice. So little, or at least so short a time was this observed, that neither promotion nor justice was to be obtained without journies, and Madrid was not more the capital of Castile than of Portugal. The general assembly of estates was to be held frequently, and they were held thrice in the space of threescore years, and of these twice within the first three. The king was to reside in this realm, as often and as long as possible; in compliance with which Philip the first was there but once, Philip the second but four months, and Philip the third was never there at all. The household establishment was suppressed through all their reigns. The viceroy was to be a native of Portugal, or a prince or princess of the blood; yet when any of the royal family bore the title, the power was in reality in the hands of a Spaniard. Thus, when the princess of Mantua was vice-queen, the marquis de la Puebla was to assist in council, and in all dispatches; and she was to do nothing without his advice. The council of Portugal, which was to be composed entirely of natives, was filled with Castilians, as the garrisons also were, though the contrary had been

they might not fall into other hands; it is possible this might be of the number: but let us see what were its contents (2). He first observes, that Portugal can be but of little value if not absolutely reduced: he next shews, that prodigious advantages may be drawn from it when it shall be reduced. The way to do this, he says, is not by imposing taxes, increasing the revenue, or invading their privileges; but, on the contrary, treating them gently, and behaving mildly towards them upon all occasions, augmenting their liberties, and gradually introducing Castilians into employments, caressing their nobility, and using every method to entice them to Madrid, employing them in Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries; and, having thus disarmed the minds of the people, keeping the feuds amongst their great families open, and spies continually on the duke and the lords of the Bragança family, they might easily discover the proper time of sapping one privilege after another, bringing Castilian magistrates into towns, marrying the poor nobility of Castile to the rich heiresses of Portugal; and having found, or created a pretence, seize the person and family of the duke of Bragança, confiscate his and his friends estates, and then applying some popular palliatives to appease the minds of the people, remove all marks of a separate government, and render it in effect, though not in name, a mere province to the crown of Castile. Till this could be done, he directs that the government should be ever in the hands of a prince or princess of the blood, but surrounded by ministers who should be alone intrusted with ministerial secrets; and that where they could be trusted, Portuguese should be employed, because this would provoke odium, and take from them all connection with or concern for their countrymen. Such were the lessons of this Solomon of Spain.

(2) Le Clede Histoire generale de Portugal.

promised. The presidents of provinces, or corregidores, were to be natives ; but by keeping a those offices in his own hands, the king eluded this article. No city, town, or district, were to be given but to Portuguese ; yet the duke of Lerma had Beja, Serpa, and other parts of the demesnes of the crown, which were formerly appenages of the princes of the blood. None but natives were capable of offices of justice, in the revenue, in the fleet, or of any post civil or military ; yet these were given promiscuously to foreigners, or sold to the highest bidder, not excepting the governments of castles, cities, and provinces. The natives were so far from having an equal chance in such cases, that no posts in the presidials were ever given to them, and scarce any in garrisons ; and whenever it happened, in the case of a person of extraordinary merit, whose pretensions could not be rejected, he was either removed, or not allowed to exercise his charge, as fell out to the marquis of Marialva and others. The forms of proceeding, the jurisdiction, the ministers, the secretaries, were all changed, in the council of Portugal, being reduced from five to three, then to two, and at last to a single person ^a.

In points regarding trade, equal alterations were made, of which the consequences were still worse, more especially to the people in general. The Portuguese had been assured, that a fleet should be kept off their coast, for the security and for preserving the freedom of their commerce ; and, when it was needful, that this should be reinforced with Castilian ships : but instead of all this, the fleet of Portugal was employed on all occasions, ruined in the Spanish service, and the Portuguese admiral and general, in all expeditions where they acted together, were obliged to obey the Castilian. They had no fleet or galleys to cruise or to escorte vessels, to secure the ports, or scour the coasts : so that the sea was full of pirates, the Moors made descents, navigation was unsafe, and commerce daily decaying. The number of India ships lessened ; and whereas twenty used to go, and scarce one miscarried, the number was reduced to a few in a year, and these indifferently laden, and generally half of them lost or taken, in sight of port, by corsairs : so that above two hundred great galleons, besides other vessels, were lost while Portugal was dependent on Spain ^c. If a fine ship was built at Lisbon, it was immediately put into the Spanish fleet ; so that people were discouraged from building. The arsenals of Portugal were emptied of their artillery and arms of all sorts : so that above two thousand pieces of brass, and an infinite quantity of iron cannon were carried away into Spain ; and in the grand place of Seville, there were nine hundred cannon to be seen at a time, marked with the arms of Portugal. The Portuguese were not admitted to the West Indian commerce, though they had been flattered with a promise of indulgence in that respect, whilst the Flemings were allowed to trade to the Portuguese plantations. How very little the court of Madrid had the trade of Portugal at heart appears from the truce concluded with Holland, which was limited so, that it should not extend to countries beyond the equinoctial ^d, as if on purpose that the Portuguese settlements in Brazil, Ethiopia, and the East Indies, might have no benefit, and all their plantations in those parts be exposed to the attempts of the Hollanders. In consequence of which, the Dutch were soon enabled to take Gale, Colombo, and drive them entirely out of the isle of Ceylon, and monopolize the cinnamon trade to themselves ; and likewise out of Ternate, Tydore, and most of the Molucca islands, by which they likewise became masters of cloves, nutmegs, and in a great measure of pepper. These were not the only losses of the Portuguese. Ormuz was wrested from them by the Persians. The ports of Mina and Arguin in Guiney, with Fernambuco, and a great part of Brazil, were seized by the Dutch, who also took the important fortrefs of Malacca, in the East Indies, after a siege of six months. These losses served for a pretext to raise money, in order to recover those places ; but it was still diverted, and the Portuguese saw themselves in imminent danger of utter ruin, when in all countries in Europe, that were before friends, were made their enemies, merely by this union with Castile ^e. A circumstance, which, in point of honour, the Spanish ministers ought to have considered.

The royal revenue diverted gradually, till Portugal becomes only a farm to Castile.

THE revenue of the crown, which was by the concessions of king Philip to be spent in Portugal, yet was applied to the wants of Spain. Pensions were sold to persons there, and then appointed to be paid out of the revenue of Portugal, so that six millions of old revenue scarce brought eighty thousand crowns into the king's exchequer. The tax of salt, first imposed by king Sebastian, remitted by Henry, revived by Philip, and raised to more than the value of the commodity, with the annates from graces, bringing in four hundred thousand crowns a year, and the profit of all confiscations of merchandize, were appropriated to the service of Castile. The money levied on the clergy of Portugal, and the tax on oil, were applied to the same purpose ^f. The excise on flesh and wine, to a fourth part of its value, was assigned to the build-a ing of the palaces of Buen Retiro, and Galinero, near Madrid. A duty laid by the common council of the city of Lisbon, to build a conduit for the use of the inhabitants, was (after being some time managed by the city officers and applied to that purpose) seized by Philip the second; and afterwards by Philip the third: this practice was extended to all the cities of the kingdom. Every parish was charged with furnishing ball to the soldiers; and the Castilian projectors exercised their wits so well, in inventing new subsidies, that out of these alone, from anno domini 1626 to 1633, thirty-two millions three hundred and thirty thousand crowns were brought into the king's coffers, and a much greater sum afterwards, from that last year to 1640. Upon the whole, the Portuguese writers compute, that from 1584 to 1626, the Spanish government cost Portugal above one hundred millions of gold, without any advantage

b to the grandees or people; and what was drained from them afterwards was very little less than that sum, which makes two hundred millions, and was more than sufficient to exhaust any country, and which really beggared Portugal ^w.

THE clergy, exclusive of those grievances which they shared in common with the rest of their countrymen, had some peculiar to themselves. The first Philip had stipulated not to demand from the Pope any bulls to enable him to tax benefices; the last Philip, however, imposed and levied the old impositions, without breach of faith in his opinion, or rather in his minister's opinion, because it was done without bull and without law. The priests resented this invasion of their privileges, and complained of the pensions granted out of their livings, and the delays of filling sees and ecclesiastical dignities, that the king might have the profits of the vacancies. All ecclesiastical dignities, and all commanderies of orders, were restrained to natives: yet the Castilians enjoyed all the great, and none but the small were left to the Portuguese. This affected not only the clergy, but the nobility and gentry, who were likewise uneasy to find they could get no military charges, but what were the leavings of the Castilians, being generally given to courtiers and their relations: so that none by distinguishing services could now hope for any recompence; and that emulation, which is the source of brave actions, being destroyed, Portugal, so famous in former days for prodigies of valour, lost at once all its reputation. Many of the best families were, for want of employments, reduced to poverty; whilst others, who were not yet sunk so low, had loans proposed to draw their wealth out of their hands, and were ill treated if they declined lending. No fiefs, jurisdictions, or escheats to the crown, ought to have been bestowed on any except Portuguese; yet great numbers of families were banished purely to introduce Castilians, who had also titles granted them, and the richest heiresses of Portugal were given to poor gentlemen of Castile, that they might find those riches in other countries, which they wanted in their own ^z.

THE detestation of the Spanish government was become universal, from the comparison made by different ranks of people between their respective grievances; for common misery taught men of all degrees to mingle their complaints. The nobility and gentry were grieved to see their long services so ill repaid, while Germans, Italians, and Flemings, were courted, preferred, and honoured with the Golden Fleece, which never fell to the share of a Portuguese. They saw, with the utmost sorrow, the order of knighthood with them become contemptible; and even that of Christ, cherished and enriched by successive kings, now disgraced by those who wore it; and they bore with impatience the sending their children into Castile for education, where they were considered as hostages, rather than men of quality. The clergy felt very sensibly the several methods that had been practised to fleece them; they were mortified at seeing the great benefices in the hands of the princes of the blood, who never judged it expedient to visit Portugal: thus, for instance, the cardinal infant Don Ferdinand held at once the priory of Crato, worth twenty-five thousand crowns, and the abbey of Alcobaça, in commendam, which was worth forty thousand crowns a year more; and Leopold, the son of the archduke of Tyrol, was named bishop of Viseo, at three years old, notwithstanding Don Alexander, brother of the duke of Bragança, was refused the archbishopric of Evora, under pretence that he was not a doctor of divinity ^y; and, what surpassed all other evils, they found no way to rise in preferment so expeditious as that of granting pensions to courtiers. The officers and soldiers employed in the East Indies were very indifferently paid, compelled on all occasions to act in subserviency to the Castilian interest; and the common people, besides being oppressed by taxes, and scarce left the benefit of the laws, were daily forced into the king's service, and, contrary to the most solemn engagements, sent into the most distant parts of his catholic majesty's dominions, with a very scanty subsistence, and no hopes of being ever preferred ^z. In this situation the signs of discontent were frequent and loud: an insurrection had been raised in the kingdom of Algarve, which might have been attended with very untoward consequences, if the vice-queen Mary had not vigorously interposed, and by her care and prudence quieted the minds of the people: notwithstanding which the new tax of five per cent. upon lands and merchandize, was, in obedience to the orders of the court, imposed^a.

The situation of Don Juan, duke of Bragança, and his family, at this juncture.

A NATION, when once discontented, naturally seeks a chief; for an established government quickly suppresses popular tumults when they are not conducted by some able head, and to some determined end. They no sooner began to make this enquiry, than the duke of Bragança offered himself to their view, and to their mind^b. This prince was in the flower of his age, grandson to John duke of Bragança, who had been competitor to Philip, and himself of the same name. His father, Don Theodosius, had been a warm friend to his country, and opposed the first insults of the Castilians with great dignity and spirit, which had endeared him exceedingly to the people. He had by his duchess, the daughter of the duke of Frias, this duke, his brother Don Duarte, and Don Alexander, designed for the church, and who died a young man^c. As for Don Juan duke of Bragança, he had espoused Donna Louisa de Guzman, the sister of the duke of Medina Sidonia, and it is necessary to set his character in a true light. In the eye of human policy he seemed to be of all men living the most unfit for the great part he acted. He was of a gentle and quiet temper; rather indolent than active; loved hospitality and magnificence; delighted in country sports, was the kindest husband, the most affectionate father, the most generous master, the friendliest neighbour, and the most amiable and companionable man breathing. Providence intending him for the instrument by whom the oppressed Portuguese were to be restored to their independency and freedom, gave these virtues a turn proper to produce consequences which the most penetrating human policy would never have suspected. His behaviour reconciled the nobility to his grandeur, as they never saw it exerted but in doing good: it defended him from the jealousies and suspicions of the Spaniards, who thought a man of his temper could never give them any trouble, unless he was forced to it; which made them tender and indulgent in their proceedings. It attached to him all his vassals, who looked upon him as their common parent; gained the affections of the populace where-ever he came, and spread a universal desire of being happy under the government of a prince of so much mildness and moderation. He knew his own rights, and he did not want ambition: he saw the misery of his country, and he saw it with compassion: he comprehended perfectly the views of the Spanish ministers, and he looked upon them with proper resentment. But he could do all this without discomposing his temper, without altering his conduct, and without discovering the least desire of being greater than he was. In the end, his patience, which some thought pusillanimity, appeared to be consummate prudence; his indolence the most refined policy; and his backwardness in stirring the only effectual method of procuring that unanimity in resolution which so wonderfully and unexpectedly placed him on the throne. His duchess was of a different frame of mind; her temper was lively, vehement, and sincere; her courage manly, and her fortitude heroic. She had the credit of exciting, or at least of confirming her husband in his final resolution; but in reality the duke had taken it before he asked her advice, and that calmness with which he proceeded, received a useful as well as acceptable colouring from the vivacity of his consort^d.

Spanish ministers act as if determined to drive the nation to despair.

A. D. 1637.

In some particular places extraordinary severities had forced the people to explain themselves, though to their own hurt. Thus at Evora there happened a great sedition, in which the name of the duke of Bragança was mentioned, and a deputation sent to acquaint him, that the lives and fortunes of the inhabitants of that city were at his devotion. The best part of the province of Alentejo was in motion upon this news; but the duke rejecting the proposal, and stopping the insurrection, availed himself of the credit which this gave him with the court of Madrid, to preserve the citizens of Evora from destruction^e. But now that rage which had hitherto been confined, became general; the conduct and scheme of the Spaniards driving the whole nation from discontent into despair. A strict survey had been taken of the whole kingdom, as if they had meant to divide it; and from hence it appeared that there were in Portugal about two hundred and ten thousand fighting men. In consequence of this came orders for raising six thousand foot, and a great corps of horse, to march against the rebels in Catalonia; most of the eminent gentlemen in the several provinces were required to raise their vassals, and to march with them in person^f. The best part of those who complied were seized, with several of the principal nobility, as hostages, and some of them put to ransom; which frightened those who remained at home excessively, and disposed them to run a all hazards, though threatened to be declared traitors, and their estates confiscated. The next good effect of this political survey was the project of no fewer than twenty new taxes and impositions, to be levied on a people crushed by those under which they laboured already. Some letters of the secretary Vasconcellos, whose character has been already given, let the Portuguese into the depth of his and his master's designs, and took from them all possibility of hope, in case experience had failed of doing it before. Under such circumstances as these a revolt was certainly to be feared, and indeed it was what the Spaniards expected: the conde duke had taken precautions for suppressing it, and had resolved to make it a pretence for depriving them of that shadow of independency which was still remaining ^g.

b THE duke of Bragança had for the master of his household and director of his finances, Juan Pinto Ribeiro, a doctor of the civil law; a man of a bold spirit, extensive genius, and who at once deserved and possessed his master's confidence. He was at Lisbon, and with very great address promoted and encouraged that spirit which he saw rising in all ranks and degrees of people. When in company with the nobility, he deplored the dejected and distressed state in which they were held by the Castilians. Amongst the priests he admired the learning and abilities conspicuous in men of their order; and testified his concern, that instead of recommending, this should hinder their preferment. With men in a mercantile way the decay of trade was his constant topic: he pointed out the sources of it, and took care to insinuate, that, from the nature of them, things must grow daily worse and worse. His discourses gained him credit with those who had the good of their country sincerely at heart: amongst whom the most considerable was Don Rodrigo da Cunha, archbishop of Lisbon, a man of great quality and abilities, who was particularly piqued at the Spaniards, and at the vice-queen for raising Don Sebastian de Mattos de Norogno to the primacy of Braga, and bestowing on him all their confidence. The archbishop of Lisbon communicated his thoughts to Don Miguel de Almeida, a nobleman of Roman courage, who was so dissatisfied with the Spanish government, that he never went to court, Don Antonio de Almada, and his son Don Lewis, the grand huntsman Mello, and Don George his brother, Don Lewis de Cunha, the archbishop's nephew, Pedro de Mendoza, Don Rodrigo de Saa, great chamberlain, and some other officers of the crown, who, though they retained their pompous titles, had not either appointments or perquisites ^h.

d IN their first consultations it very naturally occurred, that the first step to be taken was to make choice of a proper person on whose head they might place the crown. Some were for the duke of Bragança, others for the marquis de Villa-real, and others for the duke of Aveiro, all princes of the same house. The archbishop heard all that could be said, and then told them his own sentiments clearly; which were, that in declaring against the Spanish government they could not either hope for justice, or escape the guilt of rebellion, otherwise than by owning the duke of Bragança, who was the true heir of the crown: in which they readily acquiesced. He then shewed them, that as this was no factious, they had reason to flatter themselves it would prove no fruitless attempt; but being intended for their benefit, would be abetted by the whole nation: that the Spanish force in the kingdom was not great, and the strength and credit of that crown no longer what it was: that the Dutch had long ago recovered their liberties: that the Catalans had lately followed their example; and that the Portuguese might do the same with great ease, if either the love of liberty, or the sense of injuries, could revive the ancient courage of their nation, and enable them to shake off that reproach thrown upon them by the infidels, that those who stiled themselves the conquerors of the Indies were nevertheless slaves at home ⁱ. They applauded this discourse, and promised in their several stations to do all in their power for accomplishing so glorious an enterprize, and for restoring that constitution, which, while they held it, they were a great, and which now they had lost, they were scarce a people. The archbishop recommended to them steadiness and secrecy; and at the same time desired, that the obstacles which it would be necessary for them to surmount, should be seriously and circumstantially considered.

f IT was observed, that the Spaniards, and those of their party, were in full possession of the government in all its branches; that the magistrates, judges, officers civil and military, and in short, all who had either power or influence, were on their side. To this it was answered, that in appearance it was so; but that very probably it might be otherwise in reality, and if not, the many were every where superior to the few, and the few were nowhere formidable when they were men of bad characters, and universally detested, which was the case of every man devoted to the Spanish interest. It was remarked, that the Spaniards had garrisons in three places in the Algarves; that they had a citadel, and several forts in and about Lisbon; and that they had a body of troops in the Spanish Estremadura. It was said in return to this, that if all those forces had been together, or so disposed that they might have been suddenly collected, they would have been much more formidable; that as they were now divided, they might be easily kept for ever separate; that though a siege was not, yet a blockade was easily formed; and that if a garrison could not eat they must surrender, though no artillery was brought against them; that of the troops in the field, a third part at least was Portuguese; and that it would be no difficult matter to assemble an army strong enough to invite them to come over, and then the business would be done without fighting. It was objected, that after all, Portugal was naturally but a part of Spain, surrounded on it by three sides, on all which it might be attacked, without any regular forces of its own, and without allies. It was replied to this, that the situation was the same in former times; that the Castilians had heretofore claimed Portugal, without being able to conquer it; that though the force of Portugal was diminished, the strength of Spain was likewise declined; that at all events, the Portuguese were superior to the Catalans, and might therefore venture to do what they had done. Lastly, it was alleged, that the present season was not to be lost; that Portugal was destined to destruction by the Castilians, as appeared by the letters to Vasconcellos from Madrid, and therefore they ran no greater risk, for no greater evil could happen than destruction, which they might as well meet as expect; that their enemies were never so much embarrassed as at this juncture; and that as Spain had rendered almost all Europe her enemies, Portugal upon her revolt would have almost all Europe either for open or secret friends. The result of all was, that proceeding was less hazardous and more glorious than desisting; and that the recovery of their liberty would depend chiefly upon themselves.

prudence as to his master.

WHEN doctor Pinto came to be consulted, he embarked himself roundly, but disclaimed all knowledge of his master's sentiments. He was very clear as to his right to the crown, and he was no less clear as to his love for his country; but he observed that the duke was without ambition: and that he would risk nothing for the sake of his title, being satisfied with the great property he had, and with the opportunities it gave him of doing good; but added, that if the welfare and interest of the nation demanded his service, he was confident there was not a peasant in Portugal would risk his cottage sooner than his master would his estates. In fine, that he would do nothing to make himself a king, but would expose himself to any thing for the welfare of the kingdom; and that from what he had said they might account for his past conduct, and to take their measures in the most effectual manner to induce him to alter it. His notions were well received, and it was unanimously determined, when once their affairs were ripe, to force the crown upon the duke of Bragança.*

throughout.

WE have, in the history of Castile, shewn on what maxims the conde duke de Olivarez acted, and what various methods he practised, that he might amuse the duke of Bragança, and engage him to come to court, which, if he had done, we have that minister's own authority in his apology to prove, he would never have set foot more in Portugal, so that his suspicions in this respect were not in the least unjust. But as great a politician as Olivarez was, his artifices not only proved ineffectual, but were really serviceable to the duke. Thus, when he was declared general of the forces, directed to visit the fortresses, it gave him an opportunity he could not otherwise have had, of making a progress through the kingdom, obliged even his rivals and enemies to pay him great respect, and gave even the hispaniolized Portuguese an habit of obeying him. It is true, that such of the Spanish governors as could be trusted had orders to seize him; but the duke came so well accompanied, that it would have been much easier for him to have surprized any of their places with those he had about him, than for them to have arrested him. Where human prudence might have failed, Providence visibly interposed for his preservation: the Spanish fleet under admiral Osorio was ordered upon the coast, in hopes he would have dined on board it, upon an invitation; but a storm dispersed and shattered that fleet, which might otherwise have given him a great deal of trouble. When he came to Almada, over-against Lisbon, Pinto procured an audience for Antonio Almada, Michael Almeida, and Pedro Mendoza: he heard their propositions with a pleasant countenance; and though he did not absolutely engage himself, yet his expressions of gratitude were so strong, and his testimonies of kindness so warm and so obliging, that they returned well satisfied, and charmed with the thoughts of having so good a prince. He had received instructions from court to wait upon the vice-queen at Lisbon, and to treat her with the most profound respect: the design of which was to shew him to the people in the light of a subject, and thereby to weaken those impressions they might otherwise have received. The duke went accordingly; but attended with such a concourse of nobility, and was complimented with such multitudes on his arrival, that the marquis de Puebla, who in reality was governor to the vice-queen, could not help saying; a " This visit does not proceed from respect to you ; but is intended to shew you what " respect is due to him : " and indeed it left him and his friends no great reason to suspect that the declaration he intended to make would meet with much opposition there. For the expence of this general visit, and for the necessary fortifications, he had forty thousand crowns paid him out of the treasury, and soon after twenty thousand more to facilitate his journey to Madrid ; which were very convenient supplies at that juncture, and prevented his taking such measures to raise money as might have afforded suspicions¹.

When the plan of the associated lords was so far advanced that little more remained than to fix the time and manner of its execution, they dispatched Mendoça to the duke, ^{He resolves to accept the crown.} to obtain his definitive resolution. At this he hesitated a little, and desired some time to consider. Mendoça requested that he would not protract time, and that he would forbear asking the advice of his secretary Antonio Paez Viegas, a person of great sagacity, but remarkably cautious. The duke readily promised the former ; but not the latter. After mature reflection, he thought it expedient to send for Viegas, and to lay before him the whole state of the matter. Instead of giving his opinion, the secretary asked him, whether if the lords, in imitation of the states of the United Provinces, had resolved to set up a republic, he would not have sacrificed his own rights to the welfare of his country ? " Yes, replied the duke, " and my fortunes, and my life, if necessary, to her safety. " " Why then, said the secretary, should you hesitate at receiving a crown which it is her interest to offer, and to which you have a just title ? " Having said this, he knelt and kissed his hand. The duke then communicated it to the duchess, who, after a little reflection, said, " My lord, a violent death certainly waits you at Madrid, and it may be at Lisbon ; but you will die there a miserable prisoner, and here covered with glory and a king. This is the worst that can happen : we ought rather to confide in the love of the people, your just claim, and the divine protection. " The secretary, without speaking, knelt and kissed her hand likewise. The duke sent for Mendoça, introduced him to the duchess, and then told him he might assure those who sent him, that they might dispose of him as they thought fit ; and that upon the day fixed he would cause himself to be proclaimed throughout all his own estates, and wherever he had any influence^m.

d ALL these transactions were in the five last months of the year, and the first time mentioned for taking up arms was the month of March ensuing ; but when they came to examine things more strictly, they found it impossible to put off the attempt so long. Mendoça made another turn to consult the duke, who afterwards sent for Pinto from Lisbon, whom he enjoined to acquaint the lords, to keep punctual to Saturday the first of December, which was the day they last appointed, and to bend all their endeavours to the seizing of Lisbon ; for they had some thoughts of attacking Evora, which he disapproved. As the time drew nearer they were obliged to take some considerable citizens into their party, and a monk, one father Nicholas de Maja, who brought the magistrates to concur with them ; so that by this time the design was in the hands of at least five hundred persons of all ranks, sexes, and ages, which made the deferring it more dangerous than the execution. Yet even after this there fell out accidents that were very near compelling them to defer it, and it certainly had been done if the duke of Bragança had not constantly insisted that his excuses were all exhausted ; and that, if he did not set out for Madrid, he had nothing to hope if he remained still a subject in Portugal. Doctor Pinto held all the associates closely united, and with the utmost hazard, and most indefatigable industry, laboured to adjust every thing, so as to have it ready by the time, and in particular engaged the traders, who were embarked, to dismiss numbers of their journeymen and servants, under pretence they could no longer pay or employ them, that discontented, and out of bread, they might be the readier to take arms. Father Nicholas also was very useful in promoting, though cautiously, and in very ambiguous terms, that spirit it was so necessary to raiseⁿ.

f At length Saturday the first of December came, when the confederates met early at the houses of Almeida, and the other great men, where they were to arm themselves. In all their countenances appeared such confidence as gave hope of victory : all being armed, they repaired to the palace by several ways, and most of them in litters, the better to conceal their number and arms. They were divided into four bodies, and expected the hour of eight, A.D. 1640, which was the time appointed. As soon as the clock struck eight Pinto gave the signal by firing a pistol, and then all parties fell to their respective tasks. Don Michael de Almeida fell upon the German guard, who being surprised, for the most part unarmed, were soon subdued. The grand huntsman, his brother, and Don Stephen de Cunha, charged the Spanish company before the palace at the place called The Fort. Most of the townsmen who knew of the design were in this action, and boldly fell sword in hand upon the court guard. None amongst them signalized himself more than a priest, who carrying a crucifix in one hand, and a sword in the other, amidst his loud exhortations ceased not to act beyond the most alert. None could stand before him; so that after some small resistance, the Spanish officer and his soldiers were forced to surrender, and in order to procure quarter, to cry out, "God save the duke of Bragança!" Pinto, having made his way into the palace, headed those that were to attack Vasconcellos in his apartment. At the foot of the stairs they met Francis Scarez de Albergaria, judge of the civil causes, who seeing this tumult, would have interposed his authority to appease them; but hearing all cry "God save the duke of Bragança!" he thinking it the duty of his office cried "God save the king of Spain and Portugal!" This cost him his life; for one of the gentlemen in arms shot him, to prevent two cries. Antonio Correa, first clerk to the secretary, running out upon the noise, was stabbed by Don Antonio de Meneses; yet he turned up his eyes full of revenge, and said, "What! dare you strike me?" All the answer Meneses returned, was to stab him till he fell: yet he survived all these wounds to die some time after by the hand of the hangman. Being quit of this obstacle, the confederates pressed forward towards the secretary's chamber. James Garcia Paleia, a captain of foot, was then with him, who seeing so many armed men, and supposing they sought the life of Vasconcellos, though he owed no obligation to that minister; yet out of mere generosity endeavoured to keep the door with his sword, till the secretary could make his escape; but being wounded in his right arm, and overpowered by the multitude, he leaped out at a window, and had the good fortune to escape. They immediately broke into the chamber, and not finding the secretary, though they searched all corners, they threatened an old woman with present death if she did not discover him; and she, to save her life, pointed to the place where he was, being a close cupboard taken out of the thickness of the wall, where they found him covered with papers. Fear prevented his uttering one word, and Don Rodrigo de Saa gave him the first wound with a pistol; after which several of the confederates having struck him, they cast the body out at the window, crying, "The tyrant is dead: let liberty live, and Don John of Portugal!"

The vice queen seized, and the Spanish government entirely dissolved.

THE multitude, who had flocked to the palace, gave great shouts of joy at seeing the body cast down. Pinto losing no time, hastened to join those who were to seize the vice queen, and found they were already successful. Those who were to enter that princess's apartment being come to the door, and the enraged multitude crying out, they would set fire to it if not opened, the vice-queen, with her ladies, and the archbishop of Braga, appeared in her chamber, believing her presence would appease the nobility, and oblige the commons to retire. At their entrance, advancing some steps towards the confederates, "I confess, gentlemen," said she, "that the secretary has justly incurred the hatred of the people, and your indignation, by his austerity and insolent manner of proceeding. His death is a sufficient revenge. I believe that what has hitherto passed may be attributed to the hatred conceived against the secretary; but if you proceed in this manner, you cannot avoid being reputed rebels, and you will deprive me of the means of excusing you to the king." Don Antonio de Meneses answered, that so many persons of worth were not met to punish a wretch who ought to have died by the hands of the hangman: that they came to do right to the duke of Bragança, to whom the crown appertained. She would have replied; but Almeida fearing his companions might cool, said, Portugal had no king but the duke of Bragança; and then all cried out, "God save Don John king of Portugal!" The vice-queen seeing them past reclaiming, thought to find more respect in the city; but as she offered to go down, Don Carlos de Noronha civilly intreated her to retire to her chamber, and not expose herself to the fury of the incensed people. She, in a rage, finding herself detained, cried out, "Why, what can the people do to me?" To which Noronha answered, "Nothing, madam, but throw your highness out at the window." The archbishop of Braga, inflamed at this, snatched a sword from a soldier, and offered to run at Noronha; but Don Michael de Almeida laid hold of him, and told him the danger of provoking those who, but for him, had decreed his death. This made him curb his passion, in hopes of a more favourable opportunity of revenging himself. The rest of the confederates seized all the Spaniards that were in the palace or city. The marquis de la Puebla, steward to the vice-queen, Don Diego Cardenas, major general, Don Hernando de Castro, intendant of the marine, the marquis de Bainetto, an Italian, master of the horse to the vice-queen, and several sea-officers, were on this occasion made prisoners, which was done with as great ease, as if by order of the king of Spain. No man stirred to defend them, and they were in no condition to a do it, being most of them taken in their beds. This done, and all danger removed, Antonio de Saldanha led the people to the courts of judicature, where he made an harangue to them upon the present happiness of Portugal, in being delivered from tyranny, and the crown restored to their natural prince. His discourse was received with general applause, and all proceedings for the future ordered to run in the name of Don John king of Portugal^a. Thus the foreign government was compleatly dissipated, and their natural prince restored.

In the mean while Don Gaston Coutinho released out of prison all who had been committed through the severity of the Spanish ministers; and they who were thus delivered, formed themselves into a body no less formidable than that of the first confederates. Amidst this general joy, Pinto, and other principal men, were not, however, free from care. The Spaniards were still possessed of the citadel, and, whilst it held out, the king of Spain had always an entrance at his command: they conceiving therefore they had nothing unless they were matters of that place, went to the vice-queen, demanding of her an order for the governor to deliver it up. She rejected this with scorn; but Almada swearing desperately, if she persisted, he would instantly murder all the Spaniards that were taken, for fear of sacrificing so many persons of quality, she signed the order, believing the governor knew his duty too well to obey a command he could not but be convinced was extorted from her. It fell out quite otherwise than she expected; for the Spanish governor, Don Lewis del Campo, a man of no resolution, seeing all in arms before the citadel, vowing they would put the garrison to the sword unless they surrendered, was glad to depart with so good a pretence as the vice-queen's order to hide his cowardice. The citadel being surrendered, and the confederates now secure on all sides, they dispatched Mendoça and the great huntsman to carry the happy news to the duke of Bragança, and assure him there wanted nothing to complete the people's felicity but the presence of their king, yet this was not equally desired by all; the nobility looked upon his exaltation with an envious eye; the gentry, who had no hand in this affair, stood doubtful, as if they knew not whether he would justify those proceedings. The creatures of Spain were in a consternation, and only took care to save themselves. The duke's friends knowing his intention without disclosing it, prosecuted their business: they met at the palace to settle affairs, and unanimously chose the archbishop of Lisbon president of the council, and lieutenant of the kingdom. He refused at first, believing there was more need of a general than a person of his character; but soon complied, upon condition the archbishop of Braga should be joined in commission with him. This subtle prelate's design was to make the other as guilty in respect to the Spaniards as himself if he accepted; or if he refused, to render him as odious to the new king as he was to the people. The primate of Braga perceived the snare; but, being wholly devoted to the Spaniards, positively refused to have any share in the government. Thus the whole power fell into the hands of the archbishop of Lisbon, Don Michael de Almeida, Pedro de Mendoça, and Don Antonio de Almada, who were appointed his counsellors (B).

(B) This change of government was so sudden, and those who conducted it shewed so much prudence as well as spirit, that in the afternoon of the Saturday on which it happened, the shops were opened, and every thing quiet. This had different effects upon different minds; for when they came that night to sing the Te Deum, the chapter of Lisbon could not be prevailed upon to assist at it, supposing it impossible that a revolution could be produced with so little bustle; and the archbishop of Lisbon saw, with regret, that this coolness of theirs was like to operate upon others. He ordered, therefore, Te Deum to be performed the next day with greater solemnity, which was Sunday, assembled as many of the nobility as he could at his own palace, and made use of his authority to compel the chapter to be present; upon which, they made no difficulty at all, supposing that this mandate of his would justify them in case of any new change (3). After Te Deum was sung, this prelate went in procession, with a crucifix carried before him, through the streets; and when he came to the house where St. Anthony of Padua was born, he made a stand before a crucifix placed in a nich there, and kneeling on a low bulk against the side of the house, began a loud prayer, that if what they did was pleasing to God, the image would afford them some token of consent. Upon this, certain persons placed there before, cried out, that the image gave a sign; and others, posted in the rear for the like purpose, roared out, a miracle! a miracle! At the close of the procession, the archbishop shewed that the right arm of his own crucifix was detached from the cross, and was extended in a menacing posture. Whether this happened through art or accident is uncertain; but however it happened, it brought out all Lisbon. Such as had still expectations from the Spaniards, such as were afraid of risking their persons and estates, and even such as were indolently neutral, came abroad upon this occasion, and relieved those who were already hoarse with the cry of "Long live John the fourth, the father and deliverer of his country (4)." The very archbishop of Braga was forced to join in this cry; and a variety of passions blended their effects into the appearance of that universal loyalty with which such signal and stupendous changes are commonly attended. All that part of the city which lies upon the Tagus was covered with people, who stood there in expectation of seeing their new

THE president dispatched expresses the same evening to all the provinces to excite the people to give thanks to heaven for the recovery of their liberty; and commanding all magistrates to cause the duke to be proclaimed king, and to secure the Spaniards. He in the next place acquainted the vice-queen, that she must withdraw, to make room for the king and his family, and caused an apartment to be furnished for her in the royal antient palace of Xabregas, which is in the suburbs. The vice-queen left the palace with a countenance full of indignation, and without speaking a single word. Only a few of her own servants and the archbishop of Braga, with the hazard of his life, attended her. The duke of Bragança was all this time in suspense, not knowing how affairs succeeded at Lisbon, till Melo and Mendoça arrived at Villaviciosa. By the joy of their countenances, and their casting themselves at his feet, he understood, before they spoke, he was king of Portugal. He conducted them to the duchess to relate what had happened, and they gave her the title of majesty. The same day Don John was proclaimed king in all the towns that depended on him: Alonso de Melo did the same at Elvas. The new king set forward for Lisbon with the very same equipage he had provided to go to the court of Spain; he was attended by the marquis de Ferreira, his kinsman, the count de Vimiosa, and many other persons of quality. The queen was left at Villaviciosa to confirm that province in its obedience by her presence. All the roads through which he passed were thronged with people, who ran see him, pouring blessings on him, and curses on the Spaniards. All the nobility, officers of the crown, and principal magistrates went out to receive him at a great distance from Lisbon, where he made his entry amidst the joyful acclamations of the multitude on the sixth of December.

king; and the archbishop of Lisbon sent expresses to hasten him, that his subjects might not be disappointed. They met him half-way to Lisbon, in a hunting equipage, attended by a few of his friends, and hawking carelessly, as if a crown was the least in his thoughts. As soon as he knew the state of things, he pushed directly on to Lisbon, passed the river Tago, though nine miles broad, in what we stile a pair of oars, landed, and almost without notice, made his way to the theatre that was prepared for his reception (5). There, shewing himself to the archbishop and other great officers of the crown, the people were ravished with amazement; and, to keep up their spirits, the interpretation of certain old prophecies were spread abroad, and those, for the authenticity of which the Spaniards themselves had vouched, were now turned against them; so that the people looked upon king John as a monarch sent them by heaven (6). If therefore the Spaniard, who saw the rejoicing of this night, really meant what he said, when he declared that John was truly a fortunate prince, to acquire a kingdom by a bonfire, and that his master was very unlucky to be driven out of so many fine provinces by an illumination (7), he was not much wiser than the Indian, who thought he had defined the mechanism of a clock, by saying, there were twelve figures between two circles, and a hand passing from one to the other pointed out the hour, which is the truth indeed, but very far from being the whole truth; for, as we have abundantly shewn, this enterprize ran great hazards, and was not accomplished without many difficulties. On the first reading this history it may excite strange notions, but none will stir without reading it again, and whoever does that, will not stir at all.

The reigns of John the fourth, and his son Alonso the sixth.

Coronation of John IV. and assembly of the states, in which the revenue
was settled.

THE new king perceiving with what alacrity his title was received, and how general a satisfaction the people expressed on the throwing off the Castilian yoke, and resuming their antient constitution, resolved without further delay to proceed to his coronation, and then to call an assembly of the states; the only acts that were requisite to authenticate his authority, and to render his person sacred. The ceremony of the coronation was performed on the fifteenth of December, with all possible magnificence. The duke of Aveiro, the marquis of Villa-real, the duke de Caminha, his son the count de Monfanto, and all the nobility of the kingdom assisted at the ceremony. The archbishop of Lisbon, at the head of his clergy, and attended by several other bishops, received the king at the gate of the cathedral, and there all the three estates took the oath of fidelity to him. A few days after the queen came to Lisbon, having been received at a distance by the whole court, and the king himself, who upon other occasions, as well as this, testified in the most public manner how much he esteemed

^a esteemed the great talents, and how sensible he was of the many services rendered him by his consort ^b. The assembly of the states met on the 28th of January, recognized the king's title, and acknowledged his son Don Theodosius in quality of prince of Portugal. On the other hand the king acquainted them, that for his civil list he would content himself with his patrimonial estate, and apply the public revenue for the public service. He at the same time consented, that all the new taxes and impositions laid upon the people by the Spaniards should be extinguished; so that the nation was visibly greater gainers by this revolution than the king, who obtained nothing but his right, while they were freed from the ordinary expences of government, as well as the extraordinary levies to satisfy the avarice of the Castilians. We need not wonder therefore that most of the fortresses on the coast of Africa, the Azores ^b islands, (a single place excepted) the settlements in Brazil, and in the East Indies, acknowledged this monarch as soon as they had notice of the revolution, or that all the powers in Europe, who were not immediately under the influence of the house of Austria, readily owned him, and received his ambassadors ^c.

As the situation of his own affairs hindered the king of Spain from attacking Portugal immediately with any considerable force, he had recourse to soft measures, and wrote a very pathetic letter to the new king, but without effect ^d. This was followed by some military incursions, by which the Portuguese suffered little, or obtained a reasonable satisfaction for their losses in the same way ^e. But in Portugal itself there wanted not those, who, disdaining public happiness, incompatible with their private interest, sought to subvert the new establishment before it was well fixed, and plotted against a monarch to whose title they had so lately sworn, to whose conduct they had nothing to object, and to whose councils they were daily admitted. The original author and principal conductor of this plot was the archbishop of Braga, who owed his preferment indeed to the Spaniards, and had a great interest with the vice-queen; but had been often insulted by Vasconcellos, and might easily have been well with the present government. This man, laying all things together, perceived, that how acceptable soever the king might be to the nation, he was envied by the princes of his own blood; and that many of the nobility, conscious that their estates were purloined from the crown, were secretly disaffected. He begun therefore with the marquis of Villa-real, the king's nearest relation, and one to whom he paid the highest respect: he promised him the vice-royalty of Portugal, and therefore allured him and his son the duke of Caminha, to take part in the scheme: his own nephew, the count de Armamar, blindly followed his will; Don Augustine Manuel, a person of a very noble family, and great parts, embarked from ambitious motives; the grand inquisitor out of real attachment to the court of Spain, and about a hundred other persons of rank, some out of ambition, and others from particular piques; the Jews also, or new Christians, upon the promise of toleration, came in, as did some likewise who were actually in the king's service. The design was well laid, and all its branches properly directed. The Jews were to fire the city of Lisbon in several places; the conspirators within the palace were to admit their associates from without, who were to dispatch the king, and to secure the rest of the royal family, while the archbishop of Braga, and the grand inquisitor, preceded by their crosses, and followed by their clergy and dependants, were to parade the streets, and endeavour to keep the people quiet, till the houses were burnt, and the Spanish forces at their gates, ready to chastise them for their late defection, and to put another for ever out of their power ^f. Such is the piety of some ecclesiastics!

^a Authors differ extremely in their accounts of the manner in which this project was discovered: some say, and this very probably was the first account, that a Portuguese spy fell accidentally into company on the frontiers with one of his own trade employed by the prince, whom he stabbed, and then taking from him his letters, brought them to Lisbon, in consequence of which the whole came out. The second, which is more generally received, gives the discovery to the marquis of Ayamonte, who commanded on the Spanish frontiers, who was related to the queen of Portugal, and who was embarked in an intrigue with the duke of Medina Sidonia, to make him king of Andalusia. This marquis receiving letters by the canal of one Baça, a rich merchant, secretly a Jew, but whose packets came now under the seal of the inquisition, with instructions to forward them to Olivarez: he suspecting their contents, broke them open, and finding in them the whole plan of the conspiracy, sent them to king John. The third, and the most probable is, that the archbishop of Braga, understanding that the count of Vimiosa, who was a prince of the blood, had been removed from his command on the frontiers, tampered with him, and having received some encouragement, communicated to him the whole design, with which he acquainted the king. But in whatever manner the discovery was made, it was conducted with great address; for the king took no notice of any thing till the very day preceding the night in which it was to have been executed. This was the ninth of August, when the troops in the adjacent villages, under colour of a review, entered Lisbon by break of day. The king delivered billets, sealed up, in the morning to many persons in whom he could confide, with instructions to open them at noon, and then to execute their contents with the utmost punctuality. At that very instant the marquis de Villa-real, and the archbishop of Braga being summoned to council, were arrested in the king's anti-chamber, the duke de Caminha was seized in the great square, and in the space of an hour forty-seven of the principal conspirators were apprehended in virtue of the king's billets; and at the time the business was divulged to the people, all against whom the court intended to proceed were in actual custody^a. By these precautions the public security was thoroughly provided for, and also proper evidence furnished to satisfy public inquiry.

Manner of their punishment; providential supply of the king's treasury, and foreign alliances.

THE king summoned a council, to consider what should be done with those who were embarked in this treason. He was himself inclined to mercy, more especially as Don Lewis de Meneses, marquis of Villa-real, was so nearly allied to him; and this, notwithstanding the ingratitude of the action, was heightened by his being first privy-counsellor appointed by the king after his accession. But the council were clearly and unanimously of another mind; in consequence of which the conspirators were remitted to the ordinary courts of justice. The king did not think fit to disclose the evidence that was in his own possession; and therefore Baeza was put to the rack, who confessed the whole. The marquis of Villa-real and his son, the archbishop of Braga, and the inquisitor, confessed without being exposed to the torture. The two former, together with the count de Armamar, and Augustine Manuel, were beheaded on the twenty-ninth of August. Pedro Baeza, the secretary of the archbishop of Braga, and four others, were hanged. The archbishop himself, and the inquisitor, were condemned to perpetual imprisonment; in which the former died, but the latter, after some time was set at liberty^b. All their estates were confiscated, and furnished a very large and seasonable fund for the war. The archbishop of Lisbon, who thought nothing ought to be denied him, interposed in favour of one of his friends, and asked the queen in pretty strong terms for his life. "I cannot grant your lordship that favour," answered her majesty; "but I will grant you a much greater, I will forget you ever desired it^c." When these executions were over, the king declared the rest of the prisoners innocent, and caused them to be discharged; so that he had nothing to fear from their despair. It was not in this instance only, but in many others, that Providence visibly favoured this wonderful revolution. A ship from the East Indies, with effects to the value of near half a million on board, knowing nothing of what had happened, came into the port of Lisbon, and was seized; the like happened to ten more in the islands of Azores; so that what the Spaniards chiefly relied on, the distress of the new government for want of a settled revenue, was prevented by these almost miraculous supplies^d. On the other hand, the crown of France concluded a treaty with Portugal, and sent them succours^e. The states-general of the United Provinces entered into a negotiation, which ended in a truce for ten years. The northern powers also gave them all the assistance they could desire; and though the bishop of Lamego, who was sent ambassador to Rome, was unfortunately betrayed into the hands of the Spaniards, who were inclined to have treated him with the utmost severity, yet the inclination that Olivarez had to deliver his cousin the marquis de Puebla, induced him to consent to an exchange^f. He proceeded in his journey; and though it be true, that for fear of the Spaniards the Pope would not suffer him to enter Rome in the day, yet he allowed his being introduced by night in the French ambassador's coach; and though he would not own his public character, yet he caused the same respect to be paid to him as if it had been owned. Don John acted a very different part with regard to the vice-queen, who was also a princess of the blood in Spain; for after she had remained ten months a prisoner, he set her at liberty without exchange or ransom^g; which had indeed a very good effect, though it did not happen immediately since, as we have shewn elsewhere, this princess had no inconsiderable share in bringing about the fall of the king's implacable enemy, the conde duke de Olivarez.

A singular instance of royal goodness, and return of popular gratitude.

THE affairs of the kingdom making it requisite, he called an assembly of the states, in which he demanded a supply, not for the maintenance of his court, but for the support of the war, which raged more or less in all parts of his dominions. The states voted him two millions, and left it to him to raise the money in what manner he pleased, sending him blanks

a which he might fill up with such rates for raising that sum as he judged most expedient. It was a confidence never placed in any king of Portugal before, and it appeared to be very well placed now; for the king thanked them for their votes, returned them their blanks, adding, that it was for the Spaniards to impose and levy taxes; that for his part he would leave all to the good-will of his subjects; in consequence of which he raised four millions instead of two °. The conde de Castelmelhor, who was in America, and in the Spanish service when the revolution happened, and very ill used, endeavoured at his return to seize the best part of the fleet in the port of Carthagena, in both which he had certainly succeeded, if he had not been betrayed by a Portuguese, whom he had trusted in the highest degree. Upon this, he was condemned to death; but appealing to the court of Madrid, gained time. The king Don John sent a couple of emissaries to Carthagena, so well furnished with money, and a vessel to hover on the coast, that, with the assistance of a captain of a Dutch frigate, after making his escape out of the citadel, he got safe into Portugal, where the king covered not only him, but all who had any hand in his deliverance, with such favours, as did not a little contribute to his service; and some years after made him governor of Brazil p.

A. D. 1642.

THE war continued all this time with an expence rather of treasure than of blood, the affairs of Spain q being in great perplexity; and much time, and the bringing over of foreign officers, being requisite to render the Portuguese troops fit for action, in the way of regular service; and till this could be done, the king very wisely declined expeditions of great consequence. In the mean time a very unlucky affair happened at home. The archbishop of Lisbon, during his short administration, had promoted Francisco Lucena, who had been clerk to Vasconcellos, to the post of secretary of state, in which he was continued by the king. He was indisputably a man of great abilities; but he was old and peevish, and had a severity in his temper which raised him a great many enemies, whom he treated with a contempt that sharpened their resentment, and induced them to publish many stories to his prejudice. When the revolt of Portugal happened, he had a son at Madrid, and had intrusted him with some blank papers, to which he had only signed his name, leaving to him to fill them up with letters of recommendation, as he should see occasion. Upon advice of the revoltion, Olivarez caused the son to be arrested, and his papers to be examined, to see if he had been acquainted with the conspiracy. Nothing of that kind was discovered, only these blank papers were found. Olivarez kept them in his hands, till, finding the mischief Lucena did to the Spanish affairs, he consulted the marquis of Montalvan, and his brother, father Jeronymo Mascaregnas, both Portuguese, whether he should endeavour to make Lucena a friend by an act of generosity, or destroy him as an irreconcilable and dangerous enemy. The priest recommended the former, the marquis advised the latter method, which being most agreeable to Olivarez's nature, he approved. He had a Portuguese gentleman in his pay at Lisbon, who served him for a spy, and gave him good intelligence of the measures and resolutions of the king's council, which he discovered by his money or sagacity. This man was suspected by Lucena, and from the secretary's looks, and some marks of his displeasure, began to dread the worst, and to think of flying into Spain for refuge. Olivarez, to provide for his friend's safety, and effect his enemy's ruin, sent him the blank papers signed by Lucena, ordering him whenever he sent his advices to him in the usual private method, to send also at the same time, in a more public way, those very advices in the blanks with Lucena's name. These last were intercepted; and the king, strangely surprized, observed carefully the air, manner, and conduct of Lucena, but found no grounds for suspicion. Not knowing of himself what to think, he consulted some about him on the subject, who, envious of Lucena's credit and power, advised his arrest and punishment. As soon as Lucena was seized, Olivarez's spy sent others of the blanks with further secret advices, being chiefly copies of letters and instructions to ambassadors abroad, which he had got from the clerks that copied them, and took care at the same time to have forged letters in Olivarez's name, wrote as it were in answer to former advices, and relating to secrets formerly discovered to be sent from Castile; and these were likewise intercepted. Lucena was surprized at the charge, and at seeing his name put to letters he had never wrote or dictated. The thing admitted of no defence but a denial of the fact, which he did with great indignation, and without any sign of fear. He owned it was like his hand; but at the same time asserted he had never wrote or given orders for any such letters, or had ever held any correspondence with Olivarez; and insisted that there was some fraud in this matter, which the judges ought with impartiality to examine, and by a due comparison of circumstances discover. His hurry of business had made him forget the blanks he had given his son, and he really thought his name had been counterfeited. Judges, though otherwise regular and just in their proceedings, seldom mind what criminals allege for themselves; and seeing what seemed to be proofs on one side, and encountered only by denial without evidence on the other, condemned him, and he was presently after too hastily executed, protesting his innocence to the very moment of his execution, which happened a fortnight or three weeks before Olivarez's disgrace. The truth was soon known by that minister's triumph on the occasion, and by the declaration of the marquis of Montalvan's sons; but there was no calling Lucena to life. Thus the king of Portugal lost the service of the most capable, industrious, and affectionate minister he had in his service!

The first battle fought, and victory gained by the Portuguese, by the count de Alegrette.

A. D. 1644. THE forces of Portugal, in the province of Estremadura, were commanded by Don Matthias Albuquerque, and consisted of six thousand foot, and eleven hundred horse, with which he made an irruption into the Spanish province of the same name; but was quickly met by the Spanish army, which consisted of six thousand foot, and two thousand six hundred horse; upon which a battle ensued, and the Spaniards having the advantage in the beginning, pursued it with such impetuosity, that Albuquerque perceiving their foot uncovered, attacked them with such fury that they were quickly routed, with the loss of between two and three thousand men. An action great in itself, but of prodigious consequence at this juncture; and therefore the king rewarded his general with a pension of four thousand crowns, and the title of Alegrette. The Spaniards, to repair this, had recourse to their old expedient, and found ways and means to raise strong suspicions of treachery in regard to Don George de Mascarenhas, count of Monte-Albano, one of the privy-council, and who had other considerable employments; whom the king caused to be arrested and sent prisoner to the castle of Bellem, but without any circumstances of resentment or disgrace. Upon a strict enquiry the truth appeared, and the king, by a letter to the states, declared him perfectly innocent, and restored him to his honours and employments. About this time died the archbishop of Braga, who, from the time of his condemnation, had behaved with great decency and humility: when he found himself near his end, he sent to desire the king's pardon, and directed that his body should be buried on the outside of some parish-church, without monument or inscription, oblivion being, in his opinion, the best that could befall a traitor. Thus all things went to the king's satisfaction, except in the Indies, where, under various pretences, the Dutch kept the war alive, and continued to push their advantages, notwithstanding all the expostulations of the Portuguese in Asia and in Europe.

THE next year did not produce any thing extraordinary, if we except the attempt made by the Spanish ambassador to assassinate the agent sent by the clergy of Portugal to Rome; which Pope Innocent so far resented as to order the Spaniard to leave Rome immediately; and was so gracious as to offer to name bishops in Portugal, and to cause them to be consecrated by his own authority; which the king with great spirit rejected, and declared, that he would own no bishop who did not own him, and who were not named by him. In France the queen dowager proposed to the count de Videguira, that king Philip should give his master the kingdom of Sicily, in satisfaction of his pretensions. The count answered, that such a proposition might amuse children; but the king of Portugal would continue king of Portugal till God should be pleased to take him to a better kingdom. The war began now to languish on both sides, chiefly for want of money, at least in appearance; but in reality both sides were weary of seeing their forces destroyed, and their countries ruined to no purpose; and what added to the trouble of king John, there was, generally speaking, such misunderstandings amongst his chief officers, that he ran far greater risks from their quarrels than from the forces of the Spaniards: the latter had once more recourse to their old intrigues of both sorts, in hopes that one would support the other; that is, they managed a false and a true plot at the same time. The former consisted in spreading new calumnies of the count de Monte-Albano, who was thereupon arrested a second time; and the view was to hinder any attention from being paid to informations relative to the second. They had corrupted one Dominic Leyte, a native of Lisbon, a man of mean birth, and of the most corrupt morals, who undertook to shoot the king as he passed in solemn procession through the street, on the feast of Corpus Christi. In order to this, he hired several houses in the Turner's street, and made loop-holes, where muskets were placed; so that if one missed another might be instantly fired. This Dominic brought with him from Madrid a countryman of his, one Manuel Rocco, whom he appointed to wait for him at a certain place with horses, making him believe that he was jealous of his wife, and that he meant to sacrifice her in the midst of her gallants. The interposition of providence prevented the execution of this black design; for though every thing fell out as he expected, yet at the sight of the king the heart of the assassin failed him; notwithstanding which, he went to his companion, and taking horse with him, returned to Madrid. There fresh supplies, and higher promises, engaged him to renew

a the attempt ; which, as they went back to Portugal, he communicated to Rocco, who commended his contrivance, admired his courage, and applauded the undertaking : but, entering Lisbon an hour before him, discovered all he knew to the government ; upon which Dominic Leyte was arrested, convicted, and executed, acknowledging his crime, and professing his penitence ^x.

THE king thought it now time to form the household of his son Don Theodosius, a prince of admirable endowments, who, to his father's affability and generosity, joined his mother's penetration and vivacity. He was not more beloved by his parents than by their subjects, who stiled him the delight of Portugal ; and he knew so well how to sustain this high reputation, that by degrees a powerful party was formed in Spain in his favour, from the very fame of his good qualities. This domestic happiness served, in some measure to console the king for the loss of his brother the infant Don Duarte, who after a long confinement, in which he was cruelly as well as unjustly treated, and which he sustained with all possible courage and magnanimity, expired in the citadel of Milan, the Spaniards say of grief, the Portuguese of poison, but as the physicians reported, of a pestilential disease. The king, his brother, had practised every method that could be devised for obtaining his liberty, and expended vast sums of money for that purpose, but without effect : for the Spaniards knowing that the prince was an excellent officer, that he was passionately fond of his brother, and that his presence would put an end to the disputes amongst the Portuguese generals, were determined to keep him fast ^y (A). The count de Videguira, whom the king had raised to the title of marquis of Niza, had proposed a treaty offensive and defensive with the crown of France, in which he was traversed by the queen dowager ; but he managed his negotiation so ably, that at length cardinal Mazarine offered him of his own accord six thousand foot and two thousand horse, in consideration of a large subsidy to be paid by Portugal ; which the marquis rejected in his turn, and in such a manner, that the refusal did the crown of Portugal more honour, and perhaps as much service as those succours would have done ^z. The minister the king sent to Holland, Don Francisco de Sousa Coutigno, managed his affairs

(A) The usage which the infant Don Duarte received in Germany was not only barbarous and unjust, but inexcusably cruel, and that in the highest degree. He had served with the greatest reputation in the armies of the emperor Ferdinand the third, where by merit he had obtained the rank of lieutenant-general. He had no concern whatever in the revolution of Portugal ; notwithstanding which, Don Francisco de Mello, a Portuguese by birth, but amongst the number of those who had raised his private fortune on the ruin of his country, being his catholic majesty's ambassador, solicited strongly that he might be arrested and sent prisoner to some strong fortress (1). The emperor was naturally averse to this, and his brother, the archduke Leopold, declaimed against it vehemently ; but the emperor's confessor, who was a Spaniard, soon brought him round, and he gave orders for securing his person, which was done at Ratisbon, with various circumstances of indecency and needless severity. The diet protested, and all Europe exclaimed against it ; notwithstanding which, he was hurried from place to place, and at length delivered to the Spaniards. At parting, he said to the imperial commissary, " Tell your master from me, that he is a tyrant : that it shocks me more to have served him than to be thus sold by him into the hands of my enemies ; and tell him farther, that I pray God to revenge my innocent blood upon his posterity, not assuredly more privileged from the common calamities of life for being of the house of Austria, than I who am descended of the blood royal of Portugal (2)." At length he was imprisoned, or rather immured, in the castle of Milan, and there persecuted without relaxation. After he had been there a long time, and had been obliged to change his confessor as often as they thought fit, the lieutenant of that fortress scandalously deposed, that in a fit of passion he had heard him say he had committed on crime, and that he suffered for his king, his brother, and his country : upon this, and on the testimony of some Spanish soldiers, who had heard him drink his brother's health, three Spanish commissioners declared him guilty of high treason. He appealed, however, from this sentence, as given by incompetent judges ; but in a short space he either went or was sent to prosecute his complaint at the highest tribunal, dying after eight years close confinement, in the forty-fourth year of his age (3). The king his brother had sent one father Francis Taquet, a Jacobin monk, to Venice, with bills to the amount of half a million of crowns, to procure his liberty. He tried first to procure the interposition of the senate ; but finding them cold, he entertained some intelligence in the castle of Milan : but finding all his designs traversed by the marquis du Fuentes, the Spanish ambassador, he hired a couple of bravos to dispatch him ; which design he communicated to the president de Grimonville, the French ambassador, who, though the crowns were then at war, apprized as became him the Spaniard of his danger (4). The true reason why the Spaniards were so inexorable in regard to this prince, was their fear of his military capacity ; and some, as we shall see hereafter, allege that the queen of Portugal was not very desirous of seeing him at liberty, having been informed some of the Portuguese nobility were inclined to have preferred him to his brother (5). But these are arrows shot in the dark, unaccompanied with proofs, and therefore unworthy of credit. We know how ready the Portuguese were to entertain suspicions of their queen dowagers, more especially when they were also Castilians.

there with extraordinary dexterity, and prevented them from sending a strong fleet in time to Fernambuco, by undertaking in his master's name that it should be restored to them; at the same time he wrote to king John, "Save your honour, sir, by disavowing me, sacrifice my head, but do not sacrifice that place." After this, finding some attempts made to corrupt his secretary to discover the instructions he received from Portugal, he ordered him to take as much money as he could, and the king having confided to him some blanks with his name subscribed, he filled them up with such instructions as he thought most fit for the Dutch statesmen to see. In process of time, this being discovered, a message was sent him that they would confer with him no more, nor acknowledge him in quality of ambassador; to which he answered with great firmness, that the first was in their power, and what he could not help; but that his character depended solely upon the king his master^a. However, as he could be no longer of use there, he was soon after withdrawn, and replaced by Sousa de Macedo, then the king's ambassador in England.^b

In the progress of the campaigns that were made this year, Don Juan de Acosta, Andrew Albuquerque, and Sancho Manuel, distinguished themselves extremely; yet the king thought the triumphs of these prædatory expeditions a poor recompence for the great expence, the licentiousness that prevailed among the troops, and the interruption of agriculture^c. The two princes palatine, Rupert and Maurice, having retired into the river of Lisbon, with a small squadron of English ships, they were pursued by Blake, who very peremptorily demanded them. It was by no means the interest of Portugal to quarrel with the new republic; and some of the king's council both thought and said as much. Don John acknowledged the force of their reasons; but rejected their propositions, ordered his own ships to join the squadron of the princes, and to give the English battle, which the weather put out of their power, and Blake had besides the good luck to have fifteen sail of the Brazil fleet fall in with his, by whom they were all taken^c. However, this drawing him from the coast, gave the two princes an opportunity of putting to sea. The troops of Portugal and Spain being this year very inactive, prince Theodosius withdrew from court in the beginning of November, by the advice of some young people about him, and soon after appeared at Elvas. The king was extremely offended, but dissembled it; sent some great lords to attend him, and his secretary, with an order to return to Lisbon: which, as he obeyed with reluctance, and chiefly through want of money, the king received him coldly; and in reality this breach was never made up^d. Don Francisco de Sousa Coutigno was now at the court of France; where, though he was able to make but little progress in his negotiation, yet he gained a perfect knowledge of the court, and prevented his master from having any reliance upon it: while Don Antonio Sousa de Macedo practised the same arts he had done in regard to the states, who complained that they changed the men but not the ministers^e.

Great and general dissatisfaction with the king's measures, though perfectly just and prudent.

In order to prevent his son from visiting any of the provinces, he gave him the pompous title of generalissimo of all his forces, but he was no longer summoned to council; and the people of Portugal in general believed that the king was jealous of him, and, as is commonly the case, they admired the spirit and genius of the youth, and censured the king's conduct, which they did not understand^f. It was indeed extremely remote from their way of thinking; but Don John was nevertheless steady: he suffered them to find fault with his measures; but nothing could ever bring him to alter or to explain them. He found the charges of an offensive war too heavy for the kingdom: he perceived that his cavalry were inferior to the Castilians, and that it required some time to remedy this defect: he might have had money from the states upon the least intimation; but never was any monarch more greedy than he was modest in this particular: he found a pretence for selling some of his own land, and with the money purchased horses: he perceived that justice was very much decayed; and that the magistrates of towns made no scruple of diverting the revenue arising from them into their own pockets: he redressed these grievances effectually: he heard that many of the governors on the frontiers were arbitrary and avaricious: he sent for several of them out of different provinces, and cashiered them at once, rejecting all applications and submissions. Some time after he sent for and told them, "It was for your faults I broke you; and as I remember your past services, you are restored." But the great secret of his government was his correspondence in Spain. He saw how hard they were pushed by the French and Catalans: he knew the king's obstinate temper, and the maxims on which he governed, and therefore would take no advantage of him in his distress, that he might not rouse him to a resolution of shaking off his distresses, by making peace with his numerous enemies, and turning his whole force upon Portugal. His views, therefore, were to divert this as long as possible, and to be provided against it when it could be no longer diverted; a scheme of policy prudent in itself, but not to be divulged either to a warm youth, or to all who had a seat in his^g a council. But the prince, not comprehending this, and mortified with his father's behaviour, A. D. 1652. fell into a lingering disease, which filled the whole kingdom with sorrow ^e.

In the spring of the ensuing year the prince's health grew so bad, that he was by degrees obliged to keep his bed. Public prayers were made for his recovery, but in vain; for on the fifteenth of May he expired, when he was but just entered into the twentieth year of his age. The king lost also his elder daughter, the infant Donna Joanna; but these misfortunes, and his own infirmities, he bore with great fortitude ^b. The states being assembled, gave him a tenth of every man's estate; promised him a fourth in case the Spaniards besieged any town of note: and resolved that the king might take what he pleased if they invaded his dominions with an army. The king thanked them, but told them he hoped he should take nothing, and he was as good as his word ⁱ. All this time the war of excursion was going on, with various success on both sides: but the Portuguese troops were forming, part of the militia entering every year into the field, and another part into the garrisons, where they were mixed with invalids, that the vigour of one might be directed by the skill and diligence of the other. The German, French, and Dutch officers formed the cavalry; so that they became daily better than they had been, less afraid of artillery, and infinitely more capable of changing their disposition, or rallying, as occasion required, to the great surprize of the Spaniards, who had beheld them before with a sort of contempt, which piqued a nation naturally brave, and very susceptible of offence. 1653.

Amongst other persons whom the king employed as spies in Spain, there was one father Antonio de Andrada, who reported at his return that Don Sebastian de Meneses, and his brother Don Diego, an ecclesiastic, had a treasonable correspondence with his catholic majesty's ministers; upon which they were both seized. As Don Sebastian was a man of great learning and probity, his misfortune occasioned a general murmur, more especially as Andrada had been his domestic, or at least his creature; but the king thought there was no harm in being safe ^k. He had been obliged to send an ambassador into England, who returned this year, but very disconsolate, though he had succeeded in his commission; for Cromwell caused his brother Don Pantaleon Saa to be executed ^l on Tower-Hill, for a riot and murder in the New Exchange, which he looked upon as a breach of the law of nations, as if that had been superior to the divine law, which requires that murder should be expiated by the blood of the offender. The Dutch were this year driven out of Brazil ^m, and the Portuguese out of the island of Ceylon ⁿ, which was chiefly owing to the contempt of the king's authority in the East Indies, which he bore with his accustomed calmness; but would certainly have punished it if he had lived. The king being informed that his cavalry was now grown numerous, recalled the orders that he had given for suspending hostilities; and the incursions that followed were so much in favour of his subjects, that the people began to discern the rectitude of the king's politics, and acknowledged, that what they took to be indolence was highly advantageous to the state. Their praises affected him as little as their censures: he was content with the applause of his own heart, and continued to pursue the public good with great constancy, and without the least ostentation; but his health daily declining, filled the whole nation with apprehensions, more especially when they saw the queen introduced into the council, which they attributed to its true motive, his majesty's feeling himself draw towards his end. 1654.

At the opening of the spring, the king sent his orders to the generals and governors on the frontiers to alter their conduct, and to make incursions into the Spanish territories; which, however, was but indifferently obeyed; for though the mob at Lisbon were extremely fond of the military exploits that furnished them with news, yet the inhabitants near the frontiers, who began to taste the sweets of peace, and were become infinitely easier in their circumstances than at the beginning of this reign, were far from being disposed to run the risks of renewing hostilities. This change of orders was not owing to any inconstancy in the king's temper, or to his giving way to popular clamour. It was, on the contrary, the effects of the same refined policy which had been so long conspicuous in his conduct. The court of France fed him with hopes of considerable supplies, as well as of continuing the war; but at the same time expostulated very warmly his inactivity against the common enemy. It was therefore to silence these complaints that the king issued such orders; and it was from his own humanity, and sincere tenderness for his subjects, that though he repeated them, he manifested no displeasure at the dilatoriness with which they were carried into execution ^o. At this juncture died Pope Innocent the tenth; upon whom all the intreaties of the Portuguese and French clergy could make no impression, or procure the least relaxation of that severity he had expressed in favour of the house of Austria. His successor, Alexander the seventh, affected to appear a pontiff of a very different character : he declared cardinal Ursins protector of the Portuguese nation, and gave the king hopes, not to say assurances, of seeing himself reconciled to the see of Rome before his death^p. In England things went intirely to the king's satisfaction, not only as the peace continued to be exactly observed^q between the two nations, but as the war with the Dutch proved a very seasonable diversion in favour of his subjects, and secured to them the important settlement of Brazil, which with so much hazard and difficulty they had recovered.

The generous and christian

IV. surnamed
the Fortunate.

THE same orders were issued at the beginning of the next year, for the same reasons, and had pretty near the same effect. Don Francisco de Sousa Coutigno left Paris to repair to Rome, where he was acknowledged as ambassador from the crown of Portugal, treated with great civility and respect, but could not obtain an audience from the Pope, and found himself embarrassed by all the artful delays which constitute the very essence of Italian politics. Antonio Raposo had better success at the Hague. The conquest of Ceylon had put the states into better temper, and disposed them to forget the expulsion of their subjects from Brazil. This minister was not a man of great family or fortune ; and the archduke Leopold, who then governed the Low Countries, conceived he might be tempted by great offers to betray the secrets of his master. Raposo did not discover any distaste on the first overtures, which encouraged the archduke to write him a letter full of magnificent promises, which the Portuguese minister immediately transmitted to his master, as a convincing proof of his own integrity, and of the mean unprincipled arts of his enemies^r. This monarch's health, which had been failing for several years, though he concealed it all he could, and continued to hunt as often as the weather would permit, sunk all at once in the autumn. His stomach, which had an unnatural craving, lost all power of digesting : his physicians were at a loss about the nature of his distemper ; but they very soon perceived, from the great decay of his strength, that his departure was at hand. He received this news with the same steady calmness which had ever distinguished his character. He applied himself with great piety to make his peace with his Creator. He embraced his children with much tenderness ; gave the queen ample instructions as to her conduct in the regency ; admonished his ministers and generals to be faithful to their country, and to his family ; sent for some of the nobility of the first rank, whom he had imprisoned for quarrels amongst themselves, and caused them to be reconciled in his presence. In fine, he breathed his last, with all the constancy of a christian hero, on the sixth of November, in the fifty-third year of his age, having borne the title of duke of Barcelos twenty-six, of Bragança ten, and worn the crown of Portugal sixteen years, abating a month. He was justly stiled the Fortunate ; and might with equal propriety have been named the Beneficent, or the Good^s (B). His corpse, by his own directions, was interred in the church of St. Vincent.

(B) This prince was born at Villa-viciosa, on March the thirteenth, 1605. In 1630 he succeeded his father in the title of Bragança. About three years after he espoused Donna Louisa de Guzman, the eldest daughter of Don Juan Manuel Perez de Guzman, duke of Medina Sidonia, by whom he had Don Theodosius, born February the eighth, 1634 ; Donna Maria, born September the eighteenth, 1636 ; and Donna Catalina, born September the twenty-fifth, 1638. His two surviving sons were born after his accession to the throne⁽⁶⁾. In his person he was middle-sized, and not extremely well shaped ; his hair was light, his complexion ruddy, his eyes sparkling, and upon the whole there was something very pleasing and captivating in his countenance, and in his deportment. He was courteous, and conversed freely with the gentlemen of his court ; but was very grave and reserved towards the grandees. He did not distinguish himself by a fiery and active courage ; but gave, upon many occasions, proofs of solid intrepidity. He was certainly a very refined politician ; and this to such a degree, that, till the very decline of his life, most of his subjects thought him no politician at all. He never promoted Dr. Pinto, who managed the whole affair of what the Portuguese call his acclamation, but he rewarded him to his satisfaction : he never made him either minister or privy-counsellor, but he did nothing without his advice : he was never taken for a favourite at court, and yet he had his master's confidence from first to last. It is difficult to say whether the prudence of the one, or the modesty of the other, was most to be admired⁽⁷⁾. He was so totally void of ambition, or at least of a criminal ambition, that he never formed any designs against Spain ; but rejecting all projects of conquest, declared his plan to be keeping his own. This, which appeared at first sight neither conformable to the rules of the cabinet, nor to his circumstances, appeared in its consequences a wise and well adapted measure. It abated the edge of the Spanish resentment, and left him at leisure to settle his domestic affairs. Once, when things went a little amiss in the province of Alentejo, and the inhabitants of Lisbon appeared dejected, the king suddenly passed the Tagus in a small boat ; and when those about him asked his majesty's intentions, he answered calmly, " Those that love me will follow me ;" and on his arrival in the army it quickly became so numerous, that the enemy found it prudent to retreat⁽⁸⁾. He had so good correspondence at Madrid, that he was early apprized of all their designs ; of which, after blaming his indolence loudly, and rising almost in rebellion, his subjects were fully convinced, by seeing all the preparations that so much alarmed them turned another way. His firmness was mistaken for obstinacy, and there was so much secrecy in his designs, that few of them were known till after his decease. He was blamed for his harsh usage to his son Don Theodosius ; and he was suspected to be

As the death of this monarch spread a deep and general consternation throughout all Portugal, so it might be in some measure said to fix the attention of all Europe. It is not easy to conceive a kingdom left in more perilous circumstances than this was. The king Don Alonso Enriquez, a child little more than thirteen years of age, reputed of no very sound constitution either in body or mind; the regency in a woman, and that woman a Castilian; the nation involved in a war, and this respecting the title to the crown; the nobility, some of them secretly disaffected to the reigning family, and almost all of them embarked in feuds and contentions with each other; so that the queen scarce knew who to trust, or how she should be obeyed. The Spaniards expressed a very indecent kind of joy at this event, as if the decease of the king must have been attended with the dissolution of government; but they had made no preparations, as they might have done, to take any immediate advantage of the surprize it occasioned; and the firmness, vivacity, and great abilities of the queen, very soon changed the face of affairs in that respect. The nobility were many of them inclined to have treated her as the queen dowager Katherine had been treated on the accession of Don Sebastian; but it was not in their power. She appointed Don Francisco de Faro, count of Odemira, of the house of Bragança, governor of the king, and one of her principal ministers of state; and she made choice of Don Antonio Lewis de Meneses, count of Castenheda, to be his coadjutor. The former was a person advanced in years, possessed of a great estate, revered by the nobility, in great credit with the people, and entirely devoted to her interests; and those of the royal family: the latter was also a man in years, but not at all infirm, singular in point of talents, being equally capable of presiding in the cabinet, or of commanding in the field. These ministers sometimes differed with each other, but without prejudice to the queen's affairs; for as they both meant well, and as their differences arose purely from their sincerity, they united heartily whenever others attempted to undermine the queen's authority. The two secretaries, Pedro Veira, and Gaspar de Faria, were honest and able men.

Precautions taken by the queen dowager at the entrance of her regency.

A. D. 1657.

The war vigorous, and the battle of Elvas gained by the marquis de Mar a va.

THE first step of importance taken by her after she was established in the regency, was sending orders to the count de San-Lorenzo, who commanded on the frontiers, to act offensively; and though he was not fortunate in his attempt, yet the measure being right in itself was attended with good effects. However, the duke de St. Germain, an Italian in the service of Spain, and a very good officer, entered Portugal, besieged and took Oliveira, and the little castle of Moron, for which the governor of the former was first imprisoned, and then banished for life; and the general, who was certainly a man of a confused head, and who wanted

jealous of his martial genius. This suspicion was well founded, and yet it was unjust; the king did not care he should distinguish himself against the Spaniards, and the reason was, that he had a secret treaty with some of the Spanish nobility for reuniting Portugal to the Castiles, by placing Don Theodosius upon the throne, and transferring the seat of empire to Lisbon, which had been once the design of Philip the second, and would have been attended with consequences that we have not room to mention (9). In respect to his own desires, he was so moderate, that almost the only saying recorded of him is this, "That if a man had cloaths, it was no great matter of what they were made; and that no dish was bad of which a man could make a good dinner." His piety was of the same stamp with his politics: he had a high respect for the church; but then this led him to expect that his churchmen should have some religion. He had a high veneration for the inquisition, and accepted of the confiscations they gave him; but then the goods of private men becoming his property, he thought it became him as a good king to grant them back to their families. This satisfied every body but the inquisition; and there are some strange stories told of their resentment; but in this, as in other things, he was firm; he judged for himself; and out of what he thought right he could not either be frightened or persuaded (1). His distemper was a general decay, which terminated in a suppression of urine. His exhortations on his death-bed, more especially to the judge and magistrates of Lisbon, had a great effect; and many attributed to them two things: first, the steady affection they expressed for his family till they disagreed amongst themselves; and next, the authority which they assumed in respect even to the highest affairs, in consequence, as they asserted, of the trust and confidence reposed in them by their king in his last moments. We may form some idea of his disposition towards, and dependence upon, this common council of Lisbon, from a familiar instance. It was thought towards the middle of his reign that he spent a little too much of his time in hunting; the judge, therefore, threw himself in his way as he was going out of the city; and, after a profound reverence, took his horse by the bridle, and conducted it back to the palace, which the king was very far from resenting. Upon the attachment of these people he relied in his life-time; and to their fidelity he consigned his queen and children (2). The conde Vimioso being killed in a fray, and some persons of the first quality being embarked in it, he made them sensible of his displeasure, but would not leave them under it at his decease. These were the conde de Castelmelhor, the conde de St. Lorenzo, Don Miguel de Portugal, the conde de St. Juan, and Hernando d'Almada (3). As soon as king John was dead, it is positively asserted that the inquisition acquainted the queen regent, that by restoring the effects of persons condemned by their tribunal, he had incurred the sentence of excommunication; from which, however, they charitably offered to absolve him; and accordingly in the presence of the queen, her sons Don Antonio and Don Pedro, with other persons of high rank, they came, and with many solemn or rather ridiculous ceremonies, absolved the body of their deceased king, not a little pleased, no doubt, to triumph over the remains of him dead, whom, though very unwillingly, they had been constrained to obey while living (4).

experience, though he had been in great favour with the queen, and had a considerable party at court, was removed^a. He was replaced by Juan Mendez de Vasconcellos, a popular man, and in great favour with the troops. He undertook to act offensively the next campaign, and to besiege Badajoz, which he did; but he was obliged to raise it upon the approach of Don Lewis de Haro, with the whole forces of Spain, for which he was arrested, and in some danger of being punished: but the boldness and simplicity of his defence saved him. He said, "That he undertook the siege in obedience to the queen's orders, and for the honour of the nation, and that he had raised it without orders for the preservation of the army: " That he knew the hazard he run when he did it; but that it gave him pleasure to think that at the hazard, or even the loss, of his reputation and life, the troops of Portugal had been saved, which, under a more fortunate general, had now raised the siege of Elvas, and forced the enemy to retire with shame, who had entered in triumph." The council of war declared him innocent, and worthy of the queen's favour^w. Don Sancho Manuel had commanded in Elvas, and defended it with equal spirit and conduct; but it was the count de Castanbeda who raised that siege, and forced the army of Spain in their lines; in which he shewed himself an officer of a consummate judgment, as well as by hazarding nothing more when he had performed the service, upon which the very being of the state depended. This memorable action gained him deservedly great reputation; but it raised also, though unjustly, much envy and many enemies.

THE two next years there passed nothing in the field that deserves a place; but the reason of this was very extraordinary. Spain was intent upon the war in Flanders, and the peace she was negotiating with France; and in Portugal the country was fairly exhausted; they were unable to recruit the army that had gained the late victory. In this situation the queen sent Don Juan Lewis de Costa, count of Soura, into France, with the title of ambassador; a man of much courage and integrity, and whom she had not used so well as he deserved. He acted with great spirit, spoke his mind in very plain terms to cardinal Mazarine, procured the count de Schomberg, and the earl of Inchiquin, to be sent into Portugal, and published a manifesto, that had like to have revived the troubles in France. The cardinal sent to desire he would suppress it. The count answered, "That he had indeed printed a large impression, of which there remained no more than eight in his hands, and if it would oblige his eminence, he would burn those." The cardinal complained of this to the queen regent, who wrote him for answer, "That she was glad to learn in so authentic a manner that the count de Soura had done his duty^x." He followed the cardinal to the Pyrenees, where he engaged the duke of Lorraine, the duke of Guise, and the duke de Harcourt, in the interests of Portugal; but Mazarine, to please the Spaniards, compelled them to desist. He next communicated some propositions from the Spanish minister to the count, who rejected them with disdain. Mazarine told him they might meet with a better reception at Lisbon: in which, however, he was mistaken; for these terms being no other than that things should be restored to the state in which they were at the revolution, and that the dukes of Bragança should be hereditary viceroys, under the guaranty of France, the count de Castanbeda asked the cardinal's agent if he had any thing more to say; and upon his replying in the negative, "We are sorry, sir, added the count, that you should make so long a journey to say nothing." The peace of the Pyrenees produced some effects that were favourable, and some that were not only disagreeable, but dangerous to Portugal. We may reckon among the first, the setting at liberty a great number of good officers, who willingly accepted the count de Soura's offers, and to the number of some hundreds repaired on board English and Dutch ships to Lisbon. Amongst the latter we may account the desertion of the duke de Aveyro; who, retiring out of Portugal into France, passed from thence into Spain; as well as Don Ferdinand de Tellez, the Portuguese minister at the Hague, who acted the like dishonourable part, for which he was degraded, declared infamous, and executed in effigy at Lisbon^z.

THE Spanish minister at Paris exerted all his influence to prevent the departure of the officers who were to accompany count Schomberg; and to procure a flat denial of an audience of leave to the count de Soura. He failed in both; the viscount de Turenne interposed in respect to the former, and the king and the cardinal would not hear of the latter: on the contrary, they paid the count de Soura extraordinary honours, and still more extraordinary respect. Both the king and the cardinal made him large presents; and the latter told him, "That how much soever he had crossed his measures as a minister, he had ever had the highest esteem for his merit." The famous cardinal de Retz coming about that time to Paris, Mazarine asked him if he had seen the ambassador of Portugal; and upon his telling him he had not, "Go then, returned he, and make him a visit; you great men ought to be “acquainted with each other.” Don Francisco de Melo in England, and the count de Miranda in Holland, were alike successful in their negotiations; and though the actions of this campaign were not very considerable, yet, such as they were, they were every where in favour of the Portuguese. It was, however, apprehended, that the war would be carried on for the future at another rate, since the command of the Castilian army was given to Don John of Austria, who, besides being the king’s son, was in reality a person of great merit, as well as an officer who had seen more service than most of the Portuguese generals^b.

THE queen regent finished in a manner her administration, with the marriage of her only daughter the princess Katherine, once intended for Lewis the fourteenth, with Charles the second, king of Great-Britain^c; one of the most fortunate events that ever happened for Portugal, since it immediately procured them the protection of the English fleets, reinforcements of some thousands of horse and foot, besides, adding much reputation to their affairs throughout Europe, which was the reason that the Spanish court had opposed it with so much heat, or rather passion. The command of the Portuguese army was given to the marquis de Marialva, who was at this time sole minister, by the death of the count de Marialva; but his conduct was by no means equal to what it had formerly been, the battle of Elvas having given him a contempt for the Spaniards, which induced him to act rashly, notwithstanding his age and experience^d. Don John took advantage of this, seized several places, insulted the Portuguese in their lines, out of which the marquis would have marched, in order to give the Spaniards battle, if count Schomberg had not shewn the folly of this, and if some other general officers had not vigorously opposed it. If we could entirely trust a French historian^e, we must look upon all the Portuguese generals as cyphers, who were only honoured with titles, while the command rested simply and only with Schomberg: but in this no doubt he was misinformed, since that able officer found it a great deal easier to triumph over the Castilian courage, than over the envy of the Portuguese. The next campaign the command was given to the king, or rather to his minister the count de Castelmelhor, to Don Sancho Manuel, now created count de Villafior, with whom Schomberg lived in a good correspondence. Don John, however, having a numerous army, carried all before him, and at length besieged the city of Evora, which occasioned a very dangerous insurrection at Lisbon, and orders to be sent to Villafior to relieve the place at all events; but these orders came too late, the place being surrendered. However, it produced a battle, in which, chiefly through the skill of count Schomberg, and the valour of the English troops, the Spanish army was entirely defeated, with the loss of between seven and eight thousand men, most of their artillery and baggage, which was one of the most important victories ever gained by the Portuguese. As the measures of the court were far from being settled at this time, the marquis de Villafior, after all he had done, was removed from his command, and the marquis de Marialva placed once more at the head of the army. He acted offensively, besieged and took Valencia de Alcantara, and gaining other advantages against count Marsin, who commanded the armies of Spain, recovered that reputation which had been before upon the decline. He commanded the next year again, when the Spaniards, under the command of the marquis de Carracena, entered Portugal with a greater army than they had ever had before in the course of the war. Carracena besieged Villa-viciosa, the favourite seat of the house of Bragança, and one of the most beautiful places in the kingdom. The marquis de Marialva advanced to its relief: upon which a battle ensued, in which the Portuguese gained a complete victory^f, which was the sixth and last in the course of twenty-eight years war; and the visible effects of the protection of Providence, since it was chiefly owing to unforeseen accidents, to the great abilities of Schomberg, and other strangers, and to the determined courage of the foreign troops. This victory of Montes-claros fixed the fate of the kingdom, though not of the king of Portugal; for at this time the intrigues of the court ran so high, that the most intelligent people saw the king would, sooner or later, be certainly deposed. But in order to set these affairs in a distinct and proper light, it is necessary to enter into a full detail of them, without the intermixture of any other subject, which was the reason of our going briefly through the whole history of the war, before we entered upon these domestic intrigues, which come therefore to be next examined.

THE king Don Alonso Enriquez, having been struck with a palsy while an infant, was afterwards, on account of his weak state of health, treated with great indulgence; so that as he grew up, his want of parts, and the defects in his education, were very perceptible. Some say, and possibly it may be true, that the queen his mother had a much stronger affection for the infant Don Pedro, and endeavoured to feel the pulse of some great men about preferring him to his elder brother, at the time their father died; but the privy-council of Portugal were not at all inclined to make a breach in that succession for the support of which they were in arms; and besides, they could not comprehend how any could pronounce, with certainty, either as to the impuissance or incapacity of a child^a. The queen readily yielded to these reasons, and took the best measures she could to render him worthy of that crown that his birth intitled him to wear. The count de Odemira found it a very difficult task to manage this young prince, who had no inclination to letters, and who was prone only to those delights that he saw employed the minds of children of his own age, without considering the difference between their rank and his. The count de Odemira struggled with this a little while, and even ventured to take some pretty strong steps, but he found it was to no purpose. Don Alonso, though not very sharp in other things, was quick enough in perceiving that he was a king; and this was fatal to him. Such as had an opportunity of approaching his person, complied with every thing he desired, and commended every thing he did. Such as had no dependence upon the court declaimed against this with the utmost vehemence; and because he was guilty of some childish, and, it may be, ill-natured actions, they ascribed to him all the foolish and cruel accidents that fell out about Lisbon, which are generally speaking not a few. In some things they certainly did him wrong; for they gave out that he was still paralytic on one side, though there appeared no marks of it, except the contraction of his right hand, and that consequently he was feeble and inactive: whereas, the errors of which he was really guilty, and which were magnified likewise, prove the direct contrary, since fighting of dogs, scowering the streets, and encountering three men alone, running at a bull, and other things of this sort, were no indications either of want of strength or of courage.

Antonio and Juan Conti, the sons of a Genoese pedlar, become his chief favourites.

AMONGST the companions, or rather amongst the directors of the king's follies and debauches, there were two sons of a Genoese pedlar, Antonio and Juan Conti, called from the place of his birth de Vintimiglia. These, but especially Antonio, had an entire ascendancy over the king's affections, gained by subtle flattery, and fawning complaisance^b. The count de Odemira once banished them, so that for a time he only saw them privately; but as he grew up he threw off all restraint, sent for them back to court, and made Antonio a knight of the order of Christ, which offended the nobility highly, who considered this as a prostitution of the order. Yet by degrees they began to court this unworthy favourite, and even the queen-mother stooped to make use of his interest; but Antonio, to whom cunning and artifice was natural, saw through this, and resolved to stand upon his own feet. It was with this view that he engaged the king to discard the old, and bring the young nobility into employments; and this he did, because he found it no difficult matter to gain and keep an influence over them, by the very same methods that made him so much master of the king. This created great jealousies and heart-burnings; and as the infant Don Pedro was of a milder and graver disposition, sufficiently addicted to study, and very capable of receiving and taking advice, many applied themselves to him, which raised a dislike in his brother, who wanted not penetration enough to discern how much higher he stood in the queen's good graces, and how readily he received and practised the lessons she gave him, to render himself esteemed by the nobility, and at the same time popular. In respect to the Conti's, the infant was reserved and civil; but neither suffered their intimacy, nor ever made any use of their influence; which, as it grew daily stronger, and wrought more and more powerfully, so it gained them a number of dependants; and Antonio, who did not want ambition, set himself up for a kind of minister, affected to give law, and to treat those who did not pay him the respect he thought due to him, with a degree of haughtiness that his enemies termed insolence. In this he was supported by the young noblemen he had introduced to power; and in a very short space of time he raised a faction strong enough to give umbrage to those, who, but a few years before, would have despised him, not only as their inferior, but as a person altogether below their notice^c.

The king grows impatient to exercise the reins of government without restraint.

THE court was divided, some siding with the king, others with the queen, and a considerable party adhering to neither. Conti made it his chief aim to persuade the king to take upon himself the government, urging that some former kings took upon them the administration sooner than he. The king was more swayed by his counsels, because his mother falling sick, in that interval all application was made to him, which inflamed him with a desire of absolute command. The queen recovering and resuming the government, found the king more intractable than before, and perceived he was bent upon wresting the power from her by force, if she should refuse to resign. This was intolerable to her ambitious spirit, who abhorred the thoughts of falling from that height in which she had sat for so many years; nor could she be without some concern for the kingdom, if left at the disposal of a hasty and injudicious youth, beset with dangerous and inexperienced favourites and counsellors. Being a perplexed with these thoughts, she resolved to set up her younger son Don Pedro against the king, that in hopes of attaining the crown through her means, he might be wholly at her devotion, and Alonso, fearing to lose his crown, might be kept in awe. To prepare the infant, who of himself was willing enough for this design, she persuaded him he ought to be declared prince and heir to the crown, insinuating that his brother was impotent, and consequently the regal dignity must devolve to him. For the better executing this plan, she addressed herself to all the nobility, intending to call the cortes, or assembly of the states, to confirm her resolution; but finding greater difficulty than she expected, most of the lords being averse to setting up as it were two kings, to rend the kingdom and destroy themselves, and thinking it unjust to consider Alonso as impotent, before any proofs were made of his ability, she desisted from this method of proceeding, but not from the design. Her next contrivance was to adorn and dress the infant in the most costly and splendid apparel; to give frequent opportunities of shewing himself to the people; to form him a separate household, composed of such as were disaffected to his brother; and to procure him the best palace in Lisbon, built by Christopher de Moura, marquis of Castel Rodrigo. The infant thus engaged in opposition to his brother, and secured to herself, her next artifice was to counterfeit a desire of quitting the regency, and retiring into a monastery. She drew up with this view a very plausible and specious writing, intimating her pretended design; and so framed this memorial, that the great men and principal ministers, to whom she sent it, soon saw into the concealed intention, which was, that she desired to be constrained to continue in the exercise of the regency, and to be induced to condescend to this, by the removal of Conti and the rest of his party from about the king^k.

THOSE to whom this extraordinary writing was communicated being her creatures, and fearing, if she abandoned the government, they should be deprived by the king of the pre-ferments they enjoyed, resolved not to forsake her. In answer to her memorial, therefore, they gave her to understand, that, however inclined to lay down the administration, it was not expedient to do it, till she had removed from the person of the king those that seduced and led him into ill, or at least idle courses. Nothing could be more pleasing to the queen than this answer, which fulfilled all her wishes without obliging her to express them. But that all might appear to be transacted by the advice of the council, knowing they were resolved to execute her will, she would have nothing done but what was discussed by them, and given under their hands. The council met accordingly, and though some of the gravest among them opposed the design, as too visible an affront to the king, yet it was carried that Conti and his adherents should be seized, and sent into banishment. In pursuance of this resolution, the queen having secured the king in her lodgings, under pretence of business, the duke of Cadaval with his party entered the king's apartment, where Conti was. He suspecting some danger locked himself in; but the duke, without any respect to the place, or to the remonstrances of the count de Castelmelhor, who would have diverted him from that action, offered to break open the door: upon which Conti, seeing no hopes of escaping, and the count not able to relieve him, or acquaint the king, surrendered himself on promise of life. At the same time some others of Conti's party were secured in the palace, and in the town, all which were immediately put on board a ship that lay ready to sail in the river, and sent away to Brazil^l. The queen being informed that what she had in effect commanded was put in execution, led the king into the great hall, whither she had previously summoned all the nobility, ministers of state, and magistrates of the city, the better to appease and imprint an awe upon the king. In order to this, a remonstrance was made to him in the name of the kingdom, full of grievous complaints against his own conduct, and still higher against his favourites; and at the close they acquainted him, that, to prevent any farther ill consequences, they had been obliged to send him into banishment: this done, they kissed his hand, and departed.

THIS high wrought scheme of policy which the queen had contrived to perpetuate her regency, was the very cause of her falling from it. The count of Castelmelhor, a man above exception for his birth and parts, succeeded in the king's favour in the place of Conti, and began to encourage him in the resolution of taking upon him the government. Besides this, which had as strong an influence, a young lady belonging to the queen, for whom the king had an affection, made him the more earnest, discovering to him all his mother's private discourses. The king, big with this design, prolonged the time of the count's waiting, that he might have his advice and assistance. He then retired according to custom to Alcantara, a palace near Lisbon, carrying with him his brother and a great retinue. He returned the same day to Lisbon, and visited the queen, to whom he behaved so kindly, that all resentment seemed to be past; but on a sudden, without acquainting her, he returned to Alcantara, accompanied only by the count de Castelmelhor, and the count de Atouguia; from thence he dispatched letters into all parts of the kingdom, to the officers of the army and governors of towns, acquainting them, that being now at full age, he had taken upon him the government of his dominions. Then he ordered all the nobility and ministers of state, that were at Lisbon, to repair to him at Alcantara. The queen, astonished at this news, assembled the council of state, where it was resolved, that Emanuel Pacheco should be placed upon the road, to stop all those that should offer to repair to the king; that the queen should write a letter to him in the softest terms, desiring him either to delay for some time his taking the government upon him, or at least to admit her to bear a part with him; and that in case persuasion failed, she should use force to constrain him. Accordingly Pacheco turned back those that were going to Alcantara: the guards, and all the queen's adherents, were ordered to be in readiness to support her; and a letter was sent to the king from her, full of gentle and persuasive expressions; but before the letter could possibly be dispatched, the people of Lisbon, perceiving the court armed against the king, began to run into arms also for his defence, fearing some violence might be offered him. This zeal of the multitude quickly and effectually humbled the queen, who, seeing no hope of prevailing by open force, had recourse to intreaty, and therefore sent a submissive letter by the bishop of Targa. In this letter, among other things, the queen pressed the holding the cortes, or assembly of the states, that she might there resign the government; but the king and count perceiving this was a contrivance to gain time, thought it best to send her an answer by the bishop, importing, that the king, considering the great burden that attended the government, was willing to ease the queen his mother, who had long laboured under it, of that toil, and to take it intirely upon himself. The queen, perceiving there was no hope, either by force or address, of retaining the government, resolved to quit it with an air of satisfaction. She desired, therefore, the king would return to Lisbon; and that the ceremony might be performed in the palace. The king delayed this: but at length, finding himself secure, and the queen's interest declining, since the people of Lisbon had declared for him, repaired to the palace; where, in the presence of the nobility, ministers of state, and magistrates of the city, the queen delivered up the seals into his hands, which is the usual ceremony in Portugal when a king takes upon him the government^m.

New intrigues at court by the fresh favourites which the king encouraged about him.

THE queen mother after this began to talk of retiring from the world, but in such a manner that no body believed she had any such intention; for sometimes she proposed building a new monastery, but could never find out a convenient situation; then of erecting an apartment for herself near some of the old ones, but none of them cared to admit her; and this, it was believed, was only done to protract time, and to continue in the palace till some emergency should oblige her son to call her once more to the governmentⁿ. But now all the duty, reverence, and submission was made to the king. The nobility attended him, the clergy paid their court, and there wanted not crowds of sycophants to fawn on him. His principal ministers were the counts of Castelmelhor and Atouguia, and Don Sebastian Caesar de Meneses. The partizans of the old government knowing this, gave out confidently, that being himself void of sense, he only spoke such words as they put into his mouth. Count Castelmelhor, endeavouring to establish himself absolutely in the king's favour, eased him as much as possible of public affairs, indulging his inclination to horses, arms, and even to women, but without any public scandal. At this juncture the count delivered out of prison Henry de Miranda, who had been confined by the queen-mother; and being brought to court, he quickly became one of the king's greatest favourites, and yet there never happened the least jealousy between the count Castelmelhor and him: but it was otherwise with the count of Atouguia and Caesar de Meneses; but not thinking himself yet thoroughly established, he would not attempt so soon to remove them. At length, having gained the sole ascendant over the king, and having all things at his disposal, he lodged himself in the apartment that had belonged to prince Theodosius, the king's eldest brother. The only object of ambition remaining was the having some employment that might always keep him about the king's person; and there being none vacant, he thought of one that had been suppressed, stiled in Portuguese Escrivao Prividade; that is, the private secretary. This he begged of the king, who readily granted it; and though the secretary of state disputed it, as being become a branch of his office, yet he caused him immediately to be settled in the possession of it. By this charge he also obtained the right to a seat in the council of state: but as prosperity commonly blinds favourites, so the prudence of the count having raised him so high, seemed to leave him, and he began to bestow preferments without measure upon all his friends and adherents; and at the same time omitted not to crush and to destroy his enemies, that the power of one party, and the fate of the other, might be the sure basis of his greatness^o. In the next place, he advised the king to a shew some resentment for the several affronts done to his person, during the queen's regency, and particularly in forcing Conti out of his apartment, and other like insolences, which if not punished, might draw him into contempt. In pursuance of this advice, the duke of Cadaval, Garcia and Emanuel de Melo, the counts of Soret, Pombeiro, and Pedro Vieira, secretary of state, who had often reproved the king, and some others, were sent into banishment, that some respect might be recovered to the crown.

THIS proceeding against so many persons of note, gave occasion to their partisans to revile the king and his government; and now the queen dowager, seeing herself excluded from public affairs, laboured all she could to strengthen the party of the infant, and to hold frequent consultations with him; wherein it was always repeated that the king was stupid and unfit to rule. Count Castelmelhor, who was not ignorant of their intrigues, contrived all the methods he could to separate them, but in vain: for the infant, building upon the notion of his brother's incapacity, thought it better to be a king than be next to a king. The count, seeing he could not prevail upon him to desist from his cabals, persuaded the king in the first place to change all his brother's servants, putting in their room such as he could confide in, that for the future he might have the less opportunity of carrying on his designs. The next thing was to compel the dowager to retire from court, as she pretended to desire, tho' by her proceedings it plainly appeared nothing was more distasteful to her than the thoughts of leading a private life. Yet upon seeing the king so inclinable to have her remove, she had recourse to her former dissimulation, and asked leave to withdraw to some private house, because the apartment she had begun to build was not yet finished. The king's answer was, that it became not her grandeur to quit the palace for a private house; but that she might cause more diligence to be used in finishing her structure, which till then had gone on very slowly. Yet not long after, the king being informed that his mother made use of all the arts imaginable to advance his brother Don Pedro to the throne, he sent an absolute order for her to depart the palace. Upon this, on the seventeenth of March, she withdrew to the new apartment she had built at a small distance from Lisbon, being attended thither by the king, the infant, and all the nobility. The queen mother thus removed, the infant seemed now wholly devoted to the king, except in one thing, which he knew to be offensive to him, and that was in frequently visiting his mother. and holding private discourses with her, nor was she wanting, often in public, to warn him of the danger of this tender affection and duty towards her; but whether she really meant it as a caution to him, or rather did it artificially to make the king more odious, and procure themselves the greater commiseration, is not easily determined ^p.

THE king Don Alonso, to whom his mother's presence had been a curb, being delivered from that restraint, ran into all the vices of youth. Count Castelmelhor, fearing a disorderly life might hasten his fall, in whose ruin he must himself be involved, studied various means to reclaim him, or when that could not be done, to conceal his extravagancies; but it is a work of great difficulty to correct the vicious inclinations of youth, especially where the person to be reformed looks on himself as above controul. In short, his vices were too visible to be excused; for the king giving a loose to his passions, the whole burthen of the government devolved in a manner upon the counts of Castelmelhor, Atouguia, and Cæsar de Menezes: the former had long meditated to overturn the other two; but as long as the queen continued at court, he durst not attempt it, for fear that, having lost the king, they should incline to go over and strengthen her party. But when she was expelled, he quickly circumvented the count de Atouguia, caused him first to be removed, and then banished. But Menezes, warned by his example, in order to support himself, persuaded the king to recal Antonio Conti from Brazil, hoping that he, being restored to his former post, would in gratitude stand by the person to whom he owed this favour. The count being apprized of this, so immediately wrought upon his easy master, that Menezes was banished before Conti arrived to support him. On the return of Antonio from Brazil, the ship that brought him was received into the port of Lisbon with the sound of trumpets, firing of cannon, and all other demonstrations of joy, as if it had been for the reception of some sovereign prince. Yet all this was but fantastic joy; for count Castelmelhor, having persuaded the king that as it was a vindication of his authority to recal him from banishment, so to entertain him at court would provoke the nobility, to whom his name was odious: for these reasons, without suffering him to land, he was sent into the country, with express command not to come near the court ^q. To shew, however, this exile was not the effect of jealousy, but of his care for the safety of the king, he failed not to care for him at a distance, sending him frequent presents; and a considerable employment falling, he conferred it upon him though absent, and bestowed a rich benefice upon John Conti his brother.

Antonio
Conti endeavours to circumvent him, and is caught by the count in his own contrivance.

CONTI, not satisfied with this, used all his endeavours to obtain an interview with the king; and such industry was used to compass this design, that at length he had a private meeting with Alonso at Alcantara, the count being then absent from court. At this conference the king's affection was so revived that he offered to carry him immediately to Lisbon; but Conti, fearing his sudden return might prove dangerous, desired it might be postponed, and intreated the king to recal those noblemen who had been exiled for adhering to his mother. This interview, and the proposal which attended it, being known to the count, he discovered that Conti's design was to make a party to ruin him: to prevent his enemy, and turn that destruction upon himself, he employed several spies, and at length found out that Conti had conspired with those noblemen to restore the queen to the regency, leaving the king nothing but the empty title, without power or authority. Having got witnesses to prove the plot, he acquainted the king, who appointed judges to examine the matter. Upon a full hearing several were convicted, but not one suffered death, only Don Theodosius de Melo, brother to the duke of Cadaval, was banished five leagues from Lisbon, Sebastian Cesar de Menezes into Algarve, and Conti to Oporto. The depositions in these proceedings involved the queen mother; a secretary was sent to examine her, but she refusing to answer, the king let that fall. Count Castelmelhor, elated with this success, removed from the apartment he was in before to another nearer the king, where it being observed that more court was made to him than to the king himself, his name was rendered odious, and he began soon after to decline.

The queen mother dies, little regretted by the king, but much so by Don Pedro.

Don Simon Vasconcellos, brother to count Castelmelhor, after serving in the army several years with great reputation, coming about this time to court, gained such an ascendant over the infant, that it was observed as very remarkable to see the royal brothers, so differing otherwise in inclinations, and yet so addicted to these two brothers that they seemed incapable of acting without them. The infant falling sick, Vasconcellos attended him with such diligence, that he not only rose higher in his favour, but incurred the ill-will of all his other servants; who upon this quitted the infant, but in a very few days they were recalled by the king, except the count de Ereceira. The king also made Vasconcellos not only gentleman of the bed-chamber to his brother, but also master of his household. This displeasing the whole family, they all quitted their employments, and others were put into their places, for the most part creatures of count Castelmelhor, and therefore not acceptable to the infant; who, thinking himself beset with so many spies, resolved to alter his course of life, in order at once to become less suspicious to his brother, and at the same time more popular. Nothing could be more fit for his views than devotion; he therefore seemed wholly addicted to prayers, visiting churches, reading pious books, and conversing with religious persons. Thus taken up he seldom visited the king; and some judged this change of life to proceed from Augustin de Ceuta's dropping dead at his and the king's feet; but those who pretended to see farther, thought it only a device to gain the good-will of the populace. Whilst these things were in agitation, arrived at Lisbon the marquis de Sande from France, where he had concluded a match for the king, with the princess of Nemours; and by the infant's orders had made overtures on his behalf to the duke of Bouillon's daughter, which also had taken effect, though the articles were not signed. This marriage was proposed in order to secure the succession of the crown, in case the king, as had been surmised, should be incapable of getting children. But the infant having changed his mind, upon what account is uncertain, could by no persuasions be prevailed upon to consent to this marriage, although the king himself pressed it. This match thus broke, the marquis da Sande enquired whether the reports that went of the king's impotency were true; and was assured by the count de Castelmelhor that the king had several illegitimate children, which was sufficient evidence to refute that imputation. All things being then disposed for the reception of the queen, the marquis returned to France, in order to conduct her to Lisbon. On the twenty-fifth of February the queen mother falling sick, and perceiving her end approach, sent to both her sons, who were then hunting at Salvaterra, to take their last farewell; but they did not return till the third day, when, having kissed her hand and received her blessing, they departed, and within an hour after she expired. She was a princess of wonderful resolution, a great soul, and singular wisdom, which appeared in the administration of the government in peace and war. It was she, as some say, that determined her husband to assume the crown; she helped, beyond all doubt, to keep it on his head; and she, by her industry and care, secured it to his posterity. Her skill in government was above the capacity of a woman; and she was so sensible of the danger of discord between brothers, that she is believed to have obstructed Don Duarte from making his escape when confined, lest returning home he should envy the greatness of the king his brother. But what appeared most rare in her was, that, being a Spaniard, a name odious to the Portuguese, yet she so carried herself, that she gained the love and esteem of the whole nation.

THE queen dowager being dead, the king believed himself more safe: and the infant, deprived of her support, thought himself more exposed. Count Castelmelhor, who till then stood in some awe of that young prince, acted now with more freedom. The infant, growing more discontented, the king became the more jealous of his reservedness, and averse to those he saw in his favour. Some of the infant's servants quitted him, and others were removed, so that his retinue was much below his dignity. He bore with this till the news of the queen's being set forward obliged him to press the king, that he might make a suitable figure at her arrival. But this was disputed and delayed till the second of August, when the fleet which brought the queen entered the river of Lisbon; of which the news being brought to the king, he received it without the least demonstration of joy, which was looked upon as an ill omen of that marriage. The infant being highly incensed against count Castelmelhor, as the only man that had obstructed his having those servants he desired, forbore not openly to threaten him when occasion should offer, which Vasconcellos, the count's brother, who was present, relenting, quitted his service. So now there remained but two servants of any rank about him, which led him to send to the king to desire he would give him leave to retire from court. Nothing could have more incensed the king than this message; insomuch that count Castelmelhor, fearing the flame of discord should rise too high, used all his interest to obtain for the infant those servants he desired, yet could never prevail. The infant, perceiving the king was not to be overcome by the intreaties of the count, withdrew to Quelas, a league and a half from the city, accompanied only by Roderic de Meneses. Fame, upon this, divulged a report that all things were preparing for a civil war. At Lisbon Don Pedro's faction was more numerous than Alonso's: the virtues of the former were extolled, and the vices of the latter exaggerated; but after all, the affection of the one, and the aversion of the other, to count Castelmelhor, weighed more than any thing with the people, who bore him an implacable hatred. The nobility interposed to pacify the brothers, though without effect; and when all other means failed, the queen prevailed that he should not depart the court, and should leave that affair to her management, which he could not refuse, being, as it was believed, not indifferent to her from the first sight. At length, by the queen's mediation, the prince chose new servants, and the king allowed * of them. Yet the grudges betwixt them were of a higher nature than to be so easily forgot; but Don Pedro discovered them with deep dissimulation: Alonso had little of that art, and threatened much more than he would perform.

IN order to render himself in some degree independent by acquiring a post, the functions of which might be supported by legal authority, he desired the king would create him constable of Portugal. The minister, much alarmed at this, and suspecting that the conde de las Torres, and the conde de St. Juan, two officers of great distinction and merit, were those who put this project in the infant's head, advised the king not only to give him a flat denial, but to order them immediately to their posts. Don Pedro dissembled, and the officers obeyed; but this interval of quiet did not last long. A Frenchman, servant to the queen, was murdered, and the assassin taking shelter in a church, could not be brought to justice. The queen was much provoked at this, and the infant Don Pedro seemed more so. Both of them inveighed bitterly against the minister; but at length Antonio Sousa de Macedo, who was secretary of state, became the victim, and the council ordered that he should leave the court. In such times of intrigues as these, plots, true or false, are very necessary instruments: the minister acquainted the king his master, that the infant had framed a project to seize his person, as the grand obstructor of his designs, to transport him out of the kingdom, and in case of resistance to put him to death; which his majesty ordered should be enquired into. Upon this, the infant retired to his house at Quelas, but at the same time declared, that it was not on account of this pretended design against the minister, but because he had himself discovered the count had been endeavouring to suborn some of his servants to poison him: upon which the storm rose so high, that after offering, though to no purpose, to beg the infant's pardon upon his knees, the count de Castelmelhor was compelled to quit the court, and to retire into a monastery. The king, equally offended and suspicious, persisted in the pursuit of his minister's measures, doubled his guards, and caused some new raised companies to be rendered complete for the security of his person, and of those who still adhered to him; which alarmed the city of Lisbon, and increased the general discontent.

ON the other hand the infant resolved to root out all the minister's party about the king; for though the count himself was removed, his creatures remained at court, and nothing of moment was transacted without his advice. Before the infant could put his design in practice, he was said to be advertised by the queen of words the king daily let fall against him, and perhaps of more than ever had been spoken. This obliged him to hasten the execution of his projects. The principal men at that time remaining near the king of the count's faction were Henry Enriquez de Miranda, Manuel Antunez, and Antonio Sousa de Macedo, secretary of state. Of these the chief was Miranda, whom therefore Don Pedro first attacked, and to that end sent some pretended friends privately to give him notice to depart the court before he involved himself in greater danger. He was so frightened at this, that, considering the expulsion of the count, and other alarming accidents, he attempted to kill himself; but being prevented fled, fearing to be torn to pieces by the rabble. Count Castelmelhor instantly advised the king to be more circumspect in his words and actions: for that it was easier by fair means to defeat the measures of his brother, than to crush him by open force. His advice being approved by the king, he summoned his brother to appear in council, where some important matters were to be debated: but no kind of letters were of any force to move him, till the queen sent for him, when he appeared with a great train of followers, and conducted himself prudently. The king, received him less coldly than before; but being no master of the art, could not so well hide his just displeasure as the other. The king, who was not used to that continual weight of business, resolved to rest it upon Antonio Sousa de Macedo, one of the count's creatures, who, for some words spoken to the queen, had been ordered into banishment, but lay still concealed at court. In order to raise him to the honour of prime minister, the king begged of the queen that she would forgive him, and consent to his return; but notwithstanding his repeated and submissive intreaties, she remained implacable. Alonso, to conquer her obstinacy, put into her hands the order of council for his banishment, wherein it was expressed, rather to satisfy her resentment than for his fault, they had for some days thought fit to send him into exile. This so enraged her, that after venting her fury, without any regard to the king's presence, she flung into another room, from whence she sent a billet to him, demanding to have Sousa severely punished. The king, in hopes her passion would subside, concealed this billet; but he soon found his mistake, for their animosity daily increasing, the court was almost empty, few caring to hear the king's complaints, and she in secret studying revenge. Antonio de Sousa, in the mean time, appeared more openly in the palace, being well attended, to prevent danger. Upon this a report prevailed, that he threatened the city, in case of his banishment, he would repair to the army, with which he would return to punish their rebellion, as it deserved, with fire and sword. Many such rumours were confidently framed, and given out on purpose to incense the people against the king, and turn their eyes on Don Pedro, as their deliverer from tyranny and oppression.

WHEN things were thus disposed, the infant resolved by open force to expel Antonio de Sousa from court, and in order thereto went from his house to the palace, accompanied by a great number of the nobility, and the whole city following in a most tumultuous manner. When he arrived at the palace, he staid till the counsellors of state, summoned the day before, were come, and then, followed by them, entered the king's bed chamber before he was awake; who no sooner opened his eyes than he was told by the infant, that his crown and person were in extreme danger, the multitude being in arms, demanding Antonio de Sousa should receive condign punishment for the affront he had given the queen. To these words he added more threats in the name of the people; but the king in a rage interrupted him, calling aloud for his sword. The infant, according to his cool and equal temper, offered him his; which the king would not accept. The noise of the multitude filling the palace, brought the queen to the king's apartment, where she found him in a violent passion; and enquiring, as if she had not known what the matter was; he told her, that Antonio de Sousa, in despite of his authority had been murdered; and that now they came to force him to pardon the murderers. But she, who knew better, replied, that Sousa was living; which the king would not believe, till the duke of Cadaval brought him into his presence. At the sight of the secretary he was appeased, and then the queen, infant, and the rest of their followers left him. When they were gone the king said, he forgave those who had so indecently urged the expulsion of Antonio de Sousa: to which the count de Sabugal answered, "They stood in no need of pardon, but deserved praise;" and this he repeated, till the king told him, "He would bestow his pardon and his praise where, in his own opinion, each was requisite." Antonio de Sousa continued still in the palace, which the infant observing, consulted with his friends what was next to be done. One warmer than the rest said, "The next thing was to assume the crown, whilst the people's affections stood for him;" but he took him up very short, being unwilling to have the secrets of his heart pryed into, as fearing an action done in so tumultuous

a a manner could not be long esteemed legal. It was resolved therefore, that Antonio de Sousa, and Emanuel Antunes, should be threatened with death, unless they quitted the palace. They perceiving no power left in the king or their friends to protect them, retreated by night, without acquainting the king, to prevent becoming victims ^c. The king ordered search to be made for them the next day, but in vain, for his orders were now neglected. In this condition, forsaken by his friends, and oppressed by his enemies, he knew not which way to turn himself, or of whom to ask advice. His council took part with the infant; his queen favoured him; the people followed him; and the nobility adhered to him. Things being in this extreme confusion, even the most moderate began to think no way was left to restore tranquility but assembling the parliament, or states. The magistrates of Lisbon, and the common-council, b were the first who petitioned the king; but he, being sensible the only design was to dethrone him, put them off from day to day, without any positive answer. Upon this they ventured to write to all the principal towns of the kingdom, exhorting them, by petitioning in the same manner, to extort the king's consent ^d. A few days after, the council of state, the queen and the infant being present, unanimously made application to him to the same effect: but he, convinced it was a design against his person, became more obstinate in refusing, so that nothing was done that day. But the next, the council meeting again, and sending him a remonstrance full of invectives against his conduct, and urging the necessity of assembling the three estates; and not only the magistrates and multitude of Lisbon, but generally of the whole country, pressing upon him with threats, he was at last constrained to comply with their demand; for c it was equally dangerous to refuse, or to call the cortes: however, yielding to necessity, he sent out writs of summons for the first of January ^e. The king, finding himself in imminent danger, resolved to retire into the province of Alentejo, causing horses to be provided, and boats to be got ready on the river for that purpose; but his brother, who wanted no intelligence, discovered, and prevented the design. At length not knowing what other step to take, and having scarce any to consult with, he ordered the writs, or letters of convocation to be drawn, and, when they were drawn, refused to sign them. His pretence was, that the time of meeting was fixed in them to the first of January, whereas his intention was, that the states should not assemble till the first of February; believing it his interest to gain time. In the end he was constrained to comply, and to subscribe in the manner that was demanded of d him ^f.

It seems that hitherto the queen's presence was necessary at court; but this great step once gained, she either grew weary of the uneasy life she led, apprehended some greater mischief than she had hitherto met with, or held an elopement necessary to the accomplishment of her designs. But whatever the motive might be, the fact is certain, that on the twenty-first of November she quitted the palace, and retiring to a convent, wrote from thence a letter to the king; in which she represented, that she had left her family and her country, and had converted her estates into money, with a view of rendering herself acceptable to his majesty; that the usage she had received was insupportable; that he knew she had no reason to consider herself as his wife; that she desired to return on board the French squadron in the river; and e to this she desired his consent ^g. The king was exceedingly enraged upon receiving this letter, and went immediately, followed by a great train of attendants, to the convent of St. Clara, where he demanded entrance, and, when it was refused, threatened to have the doors broke open; but the infant coming, with many of the nobility, and other persons of distinction, prevailed upon the king to return to the palace. The next day there was a great consultation held at the convent; and the queen applied herself by letter to the chapter of the cathedral church of Lisbon, desiring that they would enquire into the evidence of the impuissance of the king, and for the honour of the nation render her justice ^h. In the mean time the infant Don Pedro, and the council, considering the state of public affairs, the great danger the kingdom was in, and the little hopes there were of seeing these evils redressed by Don Alonso, f resolved, that he should be desired, for the sake of the public safety, his own, and that of his family, to resign in favour of the infant Don Pedro his brother. This resolution was executed the next day, the marquis de Cascaes going, at the head of the council, to the palace in the morning to propose it. The king was in bed, and fast asleep: the marquis ordered him to be awakened and knocked himself violently at the door for that purpose; and when he had obtained admission, is said to have upbraided him in very coarse terms with his laziness, and want of attention to public affairs at so critical a conjuncture; adding, that since he must be sensible he wanted abilities to govern a kingdom, the wisest thing he could do was to resign it to the infant his brother. The king roundly and absolutely refused to consent ; but not long after the infant came to the palace, caused him to be put under confinement in his apartment, where one of his favourites making him believe that he would be immediately restored to his liberty, persuaded him to sign a short act of renunciation in favour of his brother Don Pedro, and his lawful issue, reserving one hundred thousand crowns out of the revenue of the crown, together with the house of Bragança and its dependencies¹. At the same time a paper was offered him, containing an acknowledgement that his marriage was null for want of consummation ; which he said he could not sign till he had the advice of some divines, and which, when he had some time after consulted them, he did sign^k.

As the prince had now carried his point, the council and nobility who concurred with him, and indeed it does not appear that there were any who opposed it, thought it expedient to proclaim him immediately in the palace, with all the solemnity that could authenticate such an act. In the resignation of Don Alonso, it is said, that he renounces of his own proper will, and in virtue of his royal and absolute power, his kingdoms, in the same manner they were possessed by him, in favour of his brother ; but notwithstanding this, it was held improper for the infant to assume immediately the regal title ; he was therefore proclaimed regent governor of the kingdom of Portugal^l, of the arms and justice thereof, which seems to have been the stile of the duke of Coimbra while he governed the kingdom during the minority of Alonso the fifth. As soon as this proclamation was made, the people expressed their joy by the loudest acclamations ; and it is said that in the midst of their transports not a few cried, “ Long live “ the king Don Pedro ! ” which is probable enough ; but as to what some have affirmed, that the infant himself sought that title, it is by no means proved ; nor can there be any reason assigned, why, if this was truly his intention, he did not take the title of king in virtue of Don Alonso’s resignation. In respect to what others have asserted, that the queen had this more at heart, as having already in view her marriage with the infant, and being unwilling to return to the palace with a title inferior to that with which she left it, it is, tho’ much more plausible, yet not altogether free from objection. As for the infant, as a French historian^m and politician has well observed, he might easily see it to be his interest rather to assume the title of regent than of king ; because it was more suitable to the constitution, more consistent with the honour of a monarchy, and infinitely more compatible with the pretences on which this very extraordinary proceeding was founded. It took nothing from his power ; he had the full administration ; and though the stile of his brother was used, yet it was used by him, and not by his brother. Without the title of king he was enabled to do all that a king could do ; and with the title of a king Alonso remained a prisoner, and could do nothing. Besides, it was more consistent with his character, with that modesty and moderation he had shewn in all his actions : now if this was his real disposition, his conduct was perfectly just and natural ; but if this modesty and moderation was affected, then this very affectation tied him to act as he did ; for if he had immediately taken the title of king, it would have been a very impolitic discovery of his ambition ; and would have rendered it manifest to the whole world, that he had hitherto only acted a part : again, as to the queen, though the vanity of her sex, and the vivacity of her country, might prompt her strongly to aim at preserving this title ; yet the same prudence that induced her to lay it aside, the moment she entered the convent, might prevail upon her to wave it during the life of Don Alonso, that she might seem to have lost by the exchange, both her title and her fortune. The enemies of this princess affirm her to have been a very artful woman, and at the same time deny her the use of this art in this instance, where it was of the greatest importance to her. The reader will think for himself ; but whatever opinion he forms of this transaction, he will see, that after gratifying their ambition, and their inclinations, the prince Don Pedro, and the princess of Savoy, had no temptation to deny themselves the small merit of declining to accept a title, and a title, which, if they had accepted, must have been ridiculous, since distressed and deposed as he was, Don Alonso, so long as he lived, would still have been considered as a king ; and their quality, instead of being heightened, would in reality have been lessened by a stile to which they could have no just pretensions.

S E C T. IX.

The regency and reign of Don Pedro II. and of Don John V. to the treaty of Utrecht.

- ^a IT is certainly most proper to commence the regency of the infant Don Pedro from the time of his proclamation, since otherwise there would be no government at all in Portugal till the meeting of the states, which, however, was far from being the case, the regent acting all that time, at least as far as he thought proper to act, with the same authority as he afterwards held. At this time Don Pedro was in the twentieth year of his age, a young prince, very agreeable in his person, a strong, well-made man, rendered very robust by constant exercise, and of a capacity and character, which, if assisted by a proper education, would have rendered him, even young as he was, one of the most accomplished princes of the age: but this he wanted, though time, experience, and application, gradually supplied all defects. In the conduct of this business he was assisted, or, to speak with the freedom of an historian, he was directed by other heads. At the time his brother Don Alonso was seized, that unhappy king scarce perceived it; but as the evening drew on, and every body left him, he found he was a prisoner: upon which he sent to desire his brother to let him have John, who managed his dog-kennel, to keep him company. Some say he did this with design: be that as it will, when the message was delivered, the infant Don Pedro lost his usual calmness, and burst into a violent passion of tears, and immediately gave orders that some who were agreeable to him should remain in his apartment ^b. In this situation things continued till the meeting of the states. One would have imagined that the new government must have been extremely insecure, and subject to many disturbances both at home and abroad, whereas it happened quite otherwise. The count de Castelmelhor no sooner heard the infant proclaimed regent, than he judged it most expedient for him to quit the kingdom, which he did in disguise, retiring first to Turin, from thence into France, and lastly to Great Britain, where he was kindly received, and had a good pension given him ^c. Henry Enriquez, who was generally hated, was sent to prison and detained there; but as for Antonio Sousa de Macedo, he retired to his own house in the country, and betaking himself to his studies, not only remained undisturbed but received marks of favour and countenance ^d. The count de Schomberg, who had now the command of the troops without controul, kept the Spaniards in awe, and were themselves so weakened by intestine disputes, and the war with France, which was then breaking out, that they were in no condition to stir; on the contrary, they regretted the troubles in Portugal, as it seemed highly probable they might retard the peace ^e.
- ^d THE states of the kingdom met in the month of January, and without any difficulty took an oath to the infant Don Pedro, in quality of prince of Portugal; a title which implies as much as heir-apparent, and which, therefore, the king would never give to his brother, or suffer him to assume it. Upon mature consideration of the state of public affairs, of the king's resignation however obtained, and of the state of his understanding and health, they voted that the administration should remain to the prince Don Pedro ^f. The deputies of the commons were very earnest to give him the title of king, which the clergy would have approved; but the nobility, in support as they alleged of his royal highness's modest behaviour, declared in favour of the title of regent; but invested him with the royal authority, with which there is reason to believe he was fully satisfied ^g. The states also rectified many abuses that were crept into the government, took proper measures for augmenting the public revenue, and in all other respects complied with the prince's desires, who had by this time the principal nobility, ministers of state, and general officers about him ^h. He recalled old Pedro Viera to the post of secretary, who had held it in his father's reign, and in his mother's regency. He recalled many whom the late ministry banished: and adopted in most respects such measures as he thought would render him popular. In this his endeavours met with all the success he could desire. In one thing only he was thought blameable, that he supported and relied upon the power of the commons, which was but too great before his accession to the government ⁱ.

THE business of the marriage was next to be concluded; and to trace this mysterious intrigue from the beginning to the end, would require a pretty considerable volume; and it would be no very easy task to settle things clearly, and to explain them satisfactorily, even within that compass. To speak of this matter sincerely, as well as succinctly, the princess of Aumaule, as she is called by some, the princess of Savoy as she is generally stiled by others, and the consort of the deposed monarch, was the real author of this singular transaction^k. She was the youngest daughter of the duke of Nemours, by the daughter of the duke of Vendosme, and was herself consequently great grand-daughter to Henry the fourth of France. She was originally designed for the infant Don Pedro, and her eldest sister for the king; but that match not taking effect, the count de Castelmelhor determined the king should marry her^l. She had not been long queen before she found cause to repent of becoming so. She saw the infant as ill used as herself, and she affected to express a great concern for this. Don Pedro was young and very gallant; he was struck with the beauty, and caught by the arts of a princess somewhat older, and infinitely more capable of political intrigues than himself. Their two confessors acted as their prime ministers in this business; and it was chiefly by their contrivances that all things were conducted to a point, and the king and his favourites were driven from the government step by step, with much clamour, some violence, but no effusion of blood^m. At this time she pushed her divorce warmly before the chapter of Lisbon, and spoke of nothing but procuring the restitution of her fortune, and her returning to France, as if that had been her real intention: yet, while the cause was depending, a dispensation was procured from the cardinal of Vendosme, the uncle of this princess, whom the Pope had appointed his legate at the French court, upon an extraordinary occasion, from whence he was supposed to derive the power of granting this instrument, by which his niece was permitted to marry the prince regentⁿ. The scheme was well laid, and managed with great address; but the date was a little unlucky, since that was the thirteenth of March, and the sentence of nullity, by the chapter, did not bear date till the twenty-fourth of the same month; but though slow in coming it was remarkably clear and full, which will appear the less wonderful, when the reader is told that Don Alonso acknowledged the truth of what the princess suggested under his hand, gave no opposition to their proceedings, or ever attempted an appeal^o.

THE sentence of nullity having passed, and the states being acquainted with the intention of the princess to return into France, sent a solemn deputation to intreat her not to abandon them; but to stay and marry the prince, since they were not either able or willing to restore her fortune. The queen did not return them a direct answer. However, they next applied themselves to the prince, intreating him to espouse the late queen, as the most effectual means to preserve the nation; adding, that they would never approve his choice of any other woman. The prince regent told them, they had his consent, if they could procure the queen's; upon which, they returned in a body to the convent, and prevailed upon her at length to be as complaisant as the prince^p. Accordingly, on the Wednesday in Passion Week they were married by proxy, and on Easter Monday the prince went in state to the convent to fetch his bride, whom he conducted to Alcantara, where the marriage was consummated. Upon this occasion there were, as might be expected, very great rejoicings throughout Lisbon, and amongst the rest, ringing of bells and firing of guns were of the number. The royal prisoner could not help enquiring what fortunate event excited these marks of public satisfaction. Being told what it was, he appeared, as he very well might, not a little dull; but those who were about him could not help being surprized when he expressed the occasion of it; when, instead of lamenting the indignity offered to himself, he testified great concern for his poor brother, who he said would soon have enough of the French woman, and repent, as heartily as he had done, that he had ever any thing to do with her^q. But upon reflexion, however, he thought fit to send them his compliments upon their nuptials to Alcantara, with which strange circumstance, we will conclude for the present what we have to say of this singular marriage, which we judged it best to go through without breaking the thread of the narration.

Peace with Spain brought about by the judicious conduct of the English ministers.

THE next point of importance brought upon the carpet was that of a peace with Spain, never more needed, never more wished for than at present; yet there was a party who strongly opposed it. This was composed of general officers, who were gainers by it; of some who were secretly piqued against the marquis de Marialva and his brother, who had a been for many years the prince's confident; and of the French faction in general; for when Lewis the fourteenth invaded the Spanish Low Countries, under colour of his wife's title, he had entered into a treaty offensive and defensive with Portugal, and had sent over the abbe de St. Romaine, to reside at Lisbon as his ambassador. On the other side were all the true patriots, and that stiled the English party, who, upon this occasion (though indeed it has not often happened) outwitted and got the better of the French. Sir Richard Fanshawe, his Britannic majesty's minister at Madrid, had some years before entered into a negotiation with that nation, for terminating their differences with Portugal; and with much trouble and difficulty settled with them the draught of a treaty, favourable enough for Portugal; notwithstanding which, it was rejected by the count de Castelmelhor, upon a punctilio, and the French party took all imaginable pains to prevent its being revived. But Sir Robert Southwell, the English minister then at Lisbon, contrived to bring it about in a manner which they never so much as suspected. He insinuated to Don Gaspar de Haro Guzman y Arragon, marquis del Carpio, son to the famous minister Don Lewis, and heir both to him and the conde duke de Olivarez, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Evora, that the only way to obtain his liberty, was to procure full powers from Madrid for negotiating a peace; and the marquis readily closing with this proposal, he found means to convey his letters safely to Madrid, and to procure answers, which in a little time brought him as full powers as he could desire. The French party, who by this time had intelligence of what they were doing, exerted their utmost force to raise an opposition, but without effect, for Sir Robert applied himself to the judge of the people, who at the first word declared that peace was a good thing; and this being echoed by the magistrates and commons of Lisbon, the same sentiments spread itself through the states, so that the court was in a little time forced to acquiesce.

The arrival of the earl of Sandwich, with the title of his Britannic majesty's ambassador, and all the necessary authority and instructions from Madrid, gave the last stroke to this great affair, and produced the signing a treaty under the mediation of his Britannic majesty; which was as fortunate, and as honourable for the Portuguese nation as they could desire. The partizans of France, however, made a great noise, insinuating, that this peace was made when the Portuguese had most to hope from the continuance of the war: that it deprived them of the advantages they had reason to expect from their close engagements with France; and that the terms of their last treaty considered, it drew upon them the imputation of a breach of faith. To these it was answered in a paper, said to be drawn by the marquis del Carpio, that the war had lasted twenty-seven years, and that both nations had suffered sufficiently, and declined greatly in their figure and commerce; while some of their neighbours looked on very coolly, and were ready now and then to throw in what they stiled reasons and motives for continuing a war, by which, without all doubt, both nations would continue to suffer and decline. As to the second, it was alleged, that none but military advantages could be drawn from the French alliance; and that these, if the great points aimed at by the war, could be obtained by a negotiation, they had much better be without, since they consisted only in the ruinous victories, by which the country was depopled, and the nation impoverished. And to the last it was said, that the treaty of the Pyrenees was such a precedent as they had good reason to copy: since in that treaty France had abandoned Portugal, and had actually sent a minister to Lisbon to persuade the queen dowager to abandon herself and her family, and submit to the mercy of Spain. The states, entirely satisfied with these reasons, expressed great gratitude to the British nation, pressed the conclusion of the treaty without delay; to which the court consented. It was generally believed, that the prince regent himself was as well pleased with the peace as any of his subjects; and some have suspected, that though his consort opposed it with an appearance of vigour, yet this was no more than an appearance, that she might not lose her credit in, or the support that she derived from France. Soon after, a French fleet arrived in the river of Lisbon, on board which count Schomberg, and the auxiliary troops embarked, loaded with honours, but, in other respects, neither well satisfied or well treated.

ONE of the first good effects the peace produced was giving such a turn to the affairs at Rome, which perhaps they would never otherwise have taken. Cardinal Rospigliosi, very lately advanced to the papal throne by the name of Clement the ninth, had received an account of the queen's marriage by a dispensation from the cardinal of Vendosme, and of all the unusual circumstances that had attended it; and as the world reported, was by no means edified with the conduct of his legate in France. The cardinal de Vendosme excused himself with great humility; and amongst other things said, that he wrote a fair state of the case to his holiness ^a when the dispensation was first applied for: which was strictly true; but the French secretary of state, who was intrusted to send it by his courier, kept it very safe in his office, upon a supposition that the dispensation might go on as well without it ^a. These dark clouds at Rome began to disperse upon the news of the peace with Spain; and upon the arrival of the marquis de las Minas, to render obedience, in his master's name, to the holy see, the sky grew perfectly clear; inſomuch, that the queen's confessor, who came to submit her cause to the Pope, was very kindly received. However, according to the custom of the see of Rome, the whole cause was to be begun a-fresh: in consequence of which a bull was directed to the dean of the inquisitors at Lisbon, to hear and determine the case of the first marriage; and this being done, though not with so much care and caution as before, a sentence of nullity ^b was again pronounced, which, together with the dispensation, and second marriage, the Pope confirmed by his bull, assuring the prince, that he had done for him all that was in his power ^b. The great affair of bishops was next to be adjusted; and in that there was no longer any difficulty, as Spain gave no opposition, and as his holiness was to be a great gainer by the vast sums of money extorted under different pretences from every bishop. The regent, to express his sense of these favours, appointed the count de Prado his ambassador; but he did not arrive till cardinal Altieri was elected on the death of Clement the ninth, and assumed the name of Clement the tenth, who was still more indulgent to Portugal than his predecessor ^c. Interest directed this conduct, and there was now no danger attended it.

The king is sent prisoner into the island of Tercera, after the rising of the states.

At the rising of the states it was determined, that in the present situation of things it was ^c not consistent either with the safety of the prince regent, or the tranquility of the nation, to set the king at liberty; and as to the manner of his confinement they thought it indecent to offer any thing to the prince regent, considering that they were brothers ^d. But notwithstanding this, the confining him at Lisbon was attended with difficulties, and with circumstances disagreeable enough in their nature to both of them. The prince regent at last resolved to put an end to these, by sending his brother to a place with which he might be better pleased, and yet remain in equal safety ^e. A vessel was accordingly provided for him, and a squadron under the command of the count de Prado, ordered to escort him. Some persons of distinction were likewise appointed to accompany him; but the place where he was to spend his days was kept a secret ^f. This gave a check to the people's curiosity, upon which they ^d affected to be alarmed. They went so far as to give out, for in those days they talked very freely in Lisbon, that the loss of his crown and his wife were afflictions sufficient; and that it was going beyond all bounds to carry a king of Portugal to Guiney, and consigning him there perhaps to the custody of negroes ^e. The prince regent, who never intended any such thing, was very much piqued at these rumours; but having written a circular letter to foreign courts upon this subject, he suffered copies to be taken; and when the people once knew that he was to be sent no further than Tercera, and was to be allowed the whole island for his prison, they were very quiet, and in general seemed to approve the regent's choice (A).

(A) The prince regent's letter, mentioned in the text, was dated May the 25th, 1669, and conceived in the following terms (1). "Having a strong desire to procure my brother more liberty and greater ease than the assembly of the three estates thought fit to give him, and knowing also how ardently he wishes to be in a place where he may take exercise, and enjoy all the pleasures of the country, without trouble and without constraint; I was at the same time obliged to reflect, that if I sent him into any distant part of the kingdom, he would infallibly give occasion for renewing those complaints that were made in the beginning of his reign; and that his temper considered, his life and authority would be every moment exposed. Being willing to find an expedient, by which, without risking either his person or his dignity, he might enjoy those pleasures in which he naturally delights, I have resolved, to the extreme satisfaction of my brother, that he shall go and pass his time in the island of Tercera, as well because it is in the same climate as that in which we live, as because the physicians have given their opinion that the air may be very beneficial to him in regard to his natural infirmities. Besides all this, the island in itself is a most agreeable place, very proper for hunting, and abounding not only with necessaries, but also with all the conveniences and delicacies of life, leaving to the choice of the lords who accompany, and the domestics who attend him, to fix his residence in the borough of Praza, in the city of Angra, or in the royal fortress of St. Philip, provided the place of which they make choice be likewise agreeable to him, and convenient for his diversions; and that this voyage may be made with all possible honour and security, we have directed the count de Prado, our ambassador extraordinary at Rome, to escorte him with a squadron, assisted by the count de Atalaja, Don Juan de Sousa, master of our household, Don Lewis de Silveira, Miguel Carlos de Tavora, and several other lords, officers, and gentle-

^a THESE necessary steps being taken, the prince applied himself with all possible vigour and vigilance to the dispatch of business, and to qualify himself for administering the government with abilities and reputation. The duke de Cadaval, who had a great share in establishing his regency, and was also a prince of his blood, had his ear from the beginning, and enjoyed his confidence as long as he lived ^b. He shewed the like steadiness with regard to the rest of his counsellors, and paid great deference to their opinions. At first this might be, and very probably was, highly requisite; but by degrees it became less so. As he studied assiduously, and with a good will, his subjects would have been very well pleased, as they knew that none understood the state of the kingdom better, had he relied more upon his own lights, and trusted in most cases to his own opinion. He found that midnight diversions were far from ceasing with his brother's deposition and confinement: but he thought it very unjust that persons of any rank should commit with impunity offences that had cost his brother his liberty and his crown ^c. He did not take his measures hastily; but suffered for a time these adventures to continue the talk of the court, by which he came to discern the shortest and best methods of correcting them, which he prosecuted with such spirit, that they were effectually cured, and in this he made no distinctions; so that the friars, who were as much addicted to these amusements as the young nobility, were constrained to abandon them, and to pass their evenings in a manner more suitable to their character. He lessened the expences of government as much as possible, disbanded a great part of the troops, put his finances into the best order possible, and gave in his own person, and in the management of his court, an example of that frugality which he thought requisite for his subjects to imitate, that they might in some measure repair the mischiefs and miseries brought upon them by living so long under a foreign yoke, and by that tedious, though necessary war, which had been carried on in order to compleat their deliverance. He renewed the treaties subsisting with most of the powers of Europe, particularly with Great Britain and Holland; but was so circumspect in all he did, as to avoid contracting any engagements that might oblige him to take part in any of the broils which disturbed the tranquility of Christendom; for as he had no ambitious views of his own, he would not be made the dupe of his neighbours projects ^k.

In the course of a long peace one would have imagined, that these wise and moderate measures might have restored the public affairs of Portugal, at least in a considerable degree, and yet this did not happen. The fault certainly was not in the king, but in the genius of the nation. There was nothing so necessary as to bring in a fresh recruit of people, some considerable tracts of land, even in so small a country, being become utterly desert: this, however, was impossible, without tempering in some degree that religious zeal, or rather fury, which generally prevailed; and as no step of this kind was, or could be taken, no foreigners came, or at least remained in Portugal, except it may be a very few French, and even these were scarce considered as catholics ^l. It was as necessary to give the people some ease in their impositions and taxes; but that was equally impracticable. The Spanish kings had granted most of these to noble families, from whom it was not expedient, or even safe, for the house of Bragança to take them; so that trade was oppressed, and industry discouraged, while the crown was in real necessity. But what bore hardest on the whole nation, and was a grievance equally extensive and insupportable, was the prodigious sums annually raised, and carried out of the kingdom to Rome, by the agents and emissaries of the Pope, under pretences which in other Roman catholic countries would have been treated with ridicule and contempt ^m. Here, however, they were supported not only by ecclesiastical censures, but by the civil authority, and that for political reasons; which it is to be feared will always have too great weight, and which, by keeping this drain open, rendered all endeavours in Zeal and public spirit expressed by Don Pedro, in the management of public affairs.

A long peace, and a good administration, which after all only hinder things from growing worse.

"men, with the common consent and universal applause of the whole nation, of which we thought fit to give you an account, that being informed of my resolution, and of the sincerity of my procedure, you may communicate it at the court where you reside; and that in the public gazettes, and other relations, this matter may be treated with decency and truth. Given at Lisbon, May the 25th, 1669." This letter had a great effect at home as well as abroad, and procured that approbation for this measure, which it is artfully suggested had been already expressed. There has been, however, some difference in opinions as to this transaction; many believing that an island, in which there were various outlaws, was not the properest residence for a king (2); yet, taking in all circumstances, it will be difficult to find where he could have been placed with greater propriety; or how, when the resolution was taken of sending him there, it could have been better or more plausibly excused (3).

any other way to bring wealth and prosperity into this country altogether ineffectualⁿ. The interest of the Portuguese in India was continually sinking; and the navigation of the kingdom so much reduced, that the registered seamen did not exceed three hundred.

Differences with the court of Spain, and bringing back
Don Alonso.

THE French court, at the time of making war upon the states, which it was foreseen would bring Spain and Germany into the quarrel, were very desirous of prevailing on the prince regent to facilitate their designs by breaking with Spain, and making a formidable diversion; for which many plausible pretences were suggested, and prodigious promises were made. Don Pedro was almost left to himself in the debates on this subject; for his queen, and the greater part of his ministry, were in the interest of his most Christian majesty: and which is more extraordinary, national antipathy began to revive; so that however unreasonable or impolitic it might have been, this would have been a popular measure. But Don Pedro remained firm, though he gave soft answers, and laboured all that he could to keep measures with so great a king; yet he could not be brought to risk a new war, while his people so sensibly felt that weakness into which they were brought by the last^o. This was fortunate for the Spaniards, who made notwithstanding a very ill return; for in the month of September following, while the court was at the baths of Obidos, a very base and black conspiracy was discovered: the design, or at least the pretence to which was to restore Don Alonso; and in order to this the regent, his consort, and the infanta were to be murdered. Don Francisca de Mendosa, and Don Antonio de Cavida, with some of their accomplices, were executed, and very strong suspicions fell upon the Spanish ambassador, which occasioned a great coldness between the two courts^p. It was not long after, that the marquis de Govea, the Portuguese minister at Madrid, was grossly insulted in his own house; of which ill usage having complained to little purpose, he judged it most expedient to retire, which he did, and returned home^q. The regent bore this without suffering any strong marks of resentment to escape; but he began to alter his conduct, to repair the strong places on his frontiers, and to reinforce their garrisons. He took likewise another necessary precaution, and under pretence of some idle stories diffused amongst the people as to the ill usage of his brother in the island of Tercera, he sent a squadron to bring him back to Portugal; and upon his arrival, directed he should be carried to the castle of Cintra, not far from Lisbon, where he spent the remainder of his days in close confinement^r.

The dispute about the new colony in the Rio de la Plata compromised.

AFTER all the indignities that had been offered to the court of Lisbon, notwithstanding Don Pedro de Meneses had the title given him of duke of Caminha at Madrid; and notwithstanding that it had been asserted there publicly, and even in print, that the treaty made by the queen regent with the crown of Portugal was void; and that it was not in her power, as guardian to her son, to give away a great kingdom to the prejudice not only of that prince, but of his posterity, the prince regent offered his mediation to facilitate the conclusion of a peace at Nimeguen: a measure in itself well intended, and flowing from a generosity of mind truly worthy of a great prince. It was accepted in appearance; but in effect declined, or rather refused by France; in which the politics of Lewis the fourteenth failed him; for discovering upon this occasion something of contempt either of the regent, or of the crown, the affairs of which he administered, it occasioned his sending orders to his ambassador at Paris to meddle with that point no more; but to leave the most christian king, when he stood in need of a mediation, to seek it at Lisbon^s; but this was not all. It sunk so deep into his breast that he never forgot it; and some say, the remembrance of it cost the crown of France as dear as any error in the cabinet during that whole reign. In Spain it was also but indifferently received; on which Don Pedro expressed himself in so quick terms, that the Spanish ministry being afraid that a rupture on this side might change the general face of affairs, and being sufficiently sensible of their own weakness, dropped their haughtiness at once, disavowed having any hand whatever in the conspiracy, gave full satisfaction for the abuse of the Portuguese minister, and the strongest assurances to the regent that his catholic majesty had nothing more at heart than to cultivate a sincere friendship, and to maintain a constant good correspondence with the crown of Portugal^t. The regent received these marks of kindness very obligingly, and afforded them just the degree of credit they deserved. He acted with the like spirit in regard to the dispute which happened between the subjects of the two crowns in the Rio de la Plata (B).

(B) This dispute, though often laid asleep, continues undecided at this day; there having been, as the reader will see in the course of this history, several treaties made; which, because they were governed by reason of state, and not the reason of things, have never had any proper effect; but instead of extinguishing, have nourished

- ^a THE next point of importance brought upon the carpet of Lisbon, was the marriage of the infanta; which, if we take in the whole compass of the negotiation, as well as the issue of it, it will appear as singular as any that happened in the last age in Europe. The duchess dowager of Savoy was the elder sister of her who had been once queen, and was now consort to the prince regent of Portugal, and she judged it would be a very advantageous match for her son Victor Amadeus, if she could procure him the infanta, who was the sworn heiress of the crown^u. On the other hand, the consort of the regent, who had always a great influence over her husband, flattered herself with vast advantages from the marriage of her daughter with her nephew. The French court went likewise very heartily into this scheme, which was warmly promoted by her creatures at the court of Lisbon. An affair of this importance, however, could not be carried on precipitately; more especially, as there was one great obstacle in the way, which was its being directly in the teeth of the constitution. Yet the prince was so much beloved by his subjects in general, and his influence over the states was so strong, that upon an application to them even this seemingly invincible obstacle was got over; insomuch that they gave their consent, that for this time, and without creating any precedent for the future, the infanta might marry a foreign prince without prejudicing her right to the crown^w. This point once carried, the marriage treaty was quickly adjusted, and there remained nothing more than to make the preparations necessary for the celebration of this wedding, with a magnificence suitable to the distinguished rank of the parties, and the genius of the people, who delight in nothing more than in such solemnities^x. nourished and kept alive the jealousies and feuds subsisting between the two nations. It is, however, of consequence to set this matter in a true light, inasmuch as it is one of the most intricate points regarding the modern system of politics in Europe. The crown of Portugal holds the great country of Brazil, on the north; and the crown of Spain is in possession of Paraguay, or at least so much of that vast country as stretches along the south side of the Rio de la Plata, on the south. The Spaniards say, that their right to both sides of the river is out of question, and in the space of two centuries was never contested. On the other hand, the Portuguese justify their proceeding, and affirm, that in the course of this business they did nothing but what by the law of nations they had a right to do (4). In point of facts, Don Emanuel de Lobo, governor of Rio de Janeiro, sent a small body of Portuguese to take possession of a convenient spot of ground behind the island of St. Gabriel, almost opposite to the great Spanish settlement of Buenos Ayres, in the month of January, 1680; and to the little hamlet that was built there, he gave the name of St. Sacrament. The Spanish governor of Buenos Ayres, being a man of spirit, and having perhaps no great opinion for the firmness of his own court, resolved to take the step that in his own judgment he thought right, without waiting for any instructions; and accordingly in the month of August, in the same year, dispossessed the Portuguese of their new settlement, destroyed the place, and made the garrison prisoners of war, and treated them but indifferently. On the arrival of this news in Europe, Don Pedro, as we have shewn in the text, and in another part of our work, acted very cavalierly, and compelled the court of Madrid to repair the brisk conduct of their governor, by a deportment of quite a different kind. In short the court of Spain found itself so pushed by the prince regent of Portugal's recalling his ambassador, with a protest, that if within the space of twenty days, reckoning that for one on which the protest was made, the Spaniards did not make full reparation for this insult, it should be understood that a war was declared without any other formality, that they were forced to send an ambassador immediately to Lisbon, to give such satisfaction as should be insisted upon (5). This minister was fairly worth an army; it was the famous duke de Giovinazzo, who had baffled all the French arts in Italy, and who did all the Spanish ministers could possibly expect from him here; for he so mollified the prince regent, that in the end he prevailed upon him to conclude the provisional treaty, dated at Lisbon, May the 7th, 1681, by which, though ample satisfaction was given to the crown of Portugal, by stipulating the restitution of the place, the release of the garrison, the power of resettling it, the title to fortifications equivalent to those demolished, and the punishment of the governor of Buenos Ayres, yet the decision of the main point was reserved, and the free and undisturbed possession of the Portuguese was to continue only till the right should be amicably determined by commissioners, to be appointed by the two crowns (6). This was a point of very great importance; for though at that time the common opinion was rather in favour of the Spaniards, yet was there very little to doubt, that if the prince regent had been as peremptory at Lisbon, as his minister was at Madrid, he must have carried his point, and secured the new colony for ever. The prince Don Pedro was himself sensible of this, and could not help saying, "That though he understood very well what the duke de Giovinazzo aimed at by his commendations of his royal highness's modesty, moderation, and equity, yet he could not help being affected by them, nor had the power of preferring interest of state to the inclination he had to deserve the high character which this able minister had so artfully given him (7)." To remove this obstacle, and to redress the mistake made in this provisional treaty, we shall find no less than three new treaties made within the compass of this section; and all of them, though clear and strong in appearance, yet ineffectual at the bottom, as leaving everlastingly to the court of Madrid, the power of proposing an equivalent for this contested spot, of which the Spaniards cannot be more covetous than the Portuguese tenacious (8), so that possibly after a hundred years dispute, this affair may be at length determined by force of arms (9). It had, therefore, been for the interest of both crowns, if, in pursuance of this treaty, commissioners had met and determined the point.

That scheme
defeated when on the point of being accomplished.

THE preparations were long in making, and well they might. A squadron of twelve men of war was equipped at an inconceivable expence. The ships in general of which it was composed were gilt and painted; but above all, the admiral was gilt from stem to stern; the poop and prow down to the surface of the water, and the sides down to the gun-wale. The great cabin was painted by the best masters in Lisbon, and the floor laid in squares of ebony and ivory. The bed was most superb, and the royal standard all of cloth of tissue, with the arms of Portugal in the highest raised embroidery: in short, the splendor of this ship was such as seemed to justify the name bestowed upon her, Monte de Ouro. The duke of Cadaval was declared admiral, with whom went the flower of the young nobility; and Portugal being in no condition to furnish them, foreign seamen were hired to man this squadron, at a vast charge. The design was to fetch the duke of Savoy, who, as he was to obtain a crown by the marriage, could not think so short a voyage any hardship to procure him such a wife; and part of his equipage was actually arrived at Lisbon before the squadron was in readiness^y. At length it sailed, and arrived very safely at Villa-franca: but by this time things were much altered in the court of Savoy, where some of the wisest of the nobility undertook to demonstrate, that their young prince was cheated, and was on the point of throwing away a certainty for an uncertainty. They meant by this, that France would infallibly seize Savoy and Piedmont in his absence; and that it was not impossible the possessor of the crown of Portugal might have issue either by this, or some other princess. Full of these notions, it is said, they put a force upon the duke and upon his mother; while others are persuaded, that they made the duchess dowager see she had been in this affair duped throughout by France; and that if the marriage proceeded, instead of remaining regent of a sovereignty, she would speedily become the governess of a French province; and that being persuaded of the truth of this, she was herself a party to that contrivance, which, in spite of the treaty she had concluded, kept her son at home^z. However this might be, it is very certain, that, under pretence of sickness, the duke did not appear in public; and the fleet returned to Portugal, with great displeasure to the court at so outrageous an affront, and to the universal distaste of the people, at the useless waste of so great a treasure, at a time when their circumstances could so little bear it^a. But by degrees the storm, which at first swelled very high, subsided of itself.

the deposed king Don Alonso, which is soon after followed by that of the queen.

It is on all hands agreed, that the queen (as she was still called) supported, without any visible appearance of regret, this terrible disappointment; but it is thought it would have been better if her great spirit had permitted her to have given vent to that concern which proved fatal to her in the end, and which might perhaps have been dissipated if it had been more freely expressed. As for the prince regent, the equality of his temper defended him from such dangers; and perhaps it added not a little to his consort's chagrin, that at this very juncture he gave as many instances of his infidelity as ever, though it was some consolation, that, except a single French woman of the queen's own family, his mistresses were of the meanest of the people^b. While things were in this situation at court, where parties were very nicely ballanced, the unfortunate Don Alonso died suddenly in the castle of Cintra, on the twelfth of September, when he had born the title of king almost twenty-seven, had lived above forty, and had been a prisoner almost fifteen years. It is reported, that he should say in his last agonies, "I am now going, but it will not be long before the queen shall follow me, to give an account at the most awful tribunal of the wrongs she has done me^c." It is not impossible that this story was framed after the queen's death, since declarations of this kind are seldom made by persons who die of an apoplexy. Be that as it will, after a long and excruciating illness, of more than six months, which she bore with heroic firmness, his and his brother's queen departed this life on the 17th of December^d. The king appeared inconsolable upon her death, and the clergy took a great deal of pains to persuade the people that she was a saint; but the king Don Pedro, who had reason to know her full as well as they, was content to call her the wisest and most prudent of her sex^e; and some believe he did not give her this character so much on account of the advice she gave him in public, as often as he consulted her, which was commonly in all points of great importance, but for those private hints by which he really governed himself, and which were not always agreeable to her public opinions.

Several marriages proposed for the infant, which prove
all abortive.

It was not long after the death of the queen that the French ministers began to lose their credit at court, which was commonly attributed to that event; but was at least as much owing to the king's dislike of a faint attempt made by Lewis the fourteenth to enter into a treaty of marriage with the infant; which, according to the usual warmth of the nation, the mob of Lisbon improved into so furious a passion as exposed him to the danger of seeing a that princeſs raviſhed from him by force of arms. The king knew it to be quite otherwiſe, and believing it intended to amuſe and flatter him, declined giving any direct answer; and placed this to the account that had been opened on the rejeſting of his mediation ^f. He was ſtill labouring to reſtore the proſperity of his ſubjects, by every method that he could deviſe; and though it might not answer his purpoſe, yet it was certainly with this view that he raiſed his money twenty per cent. which, if it had no other good effect, ſaved the nation ſomething in her annual tribute to Rome; of which that court became quickly ſenſible, and the nuncio received orders to expoſtulate with the court of Lisbon, but to no purpoſe ^g. The king would willingly have done more, but there was nothing more to be done; for if he moved this way, he had the church directly againſt him, if that, the inquisition oppoſed his b meaſures; ſome uſeful ſteps to reformation claſhed with the intereſts of the nobility; others were repugnant to the humour of the people; ſo that he ſtill found his cares limited to this old object, of keeping things from growing worſe. A treaty of marriage propoſed between the infant and the hereditary grand prince of Tuſcany, was for ſome time upon the carpet; and it is thought would actually have taken place if the grand duke had not poſitively inſiſted, that his own Italian dominions ſhould belong to his ſecond ſon prince John Gaſton, in caſe the hereditary prince became king of Portugal, of which Don Pedro would by no means hear; and ſome very able politicians have thought that in this he was wanting to his own and his ſubjects intereſts, ſince if the ſucceſſion took place he gained a king to Portugal, and if it did not, his daughter and her poſterity were to enjoy the nobleſt duchy in Italy

c without controul ^h.

THE people of Portugal ſaw with regret their king a widower in the very flower of his age, and when themſelves were expoſed to diſmal apprehenſions in caſe of his deceaſe without iſſue male. It is believed that ſome of the Portugueſe clergy inſinuated their fears to Pope Innocent the eleventh; who wrote to the king in ſuch ſtrong terms, that at length he conſented to a ſecond marriage; and ſent his great miniſter the count de Villar-Major to demand the princeſs Mary Sophia, of Newburgh, in which he acquitted himſelf ſo well, and carried the honour of the crown of Portugal ſo high, that at his return he was created marquis of Alegrette ⁱ. On the ſecond of July he eſpouſed that princeſs by proxy at Heidelberg, and in the ſucceeding month ſhe arrived ſafely in Portugal, on board an Engliſh ſquadron, commanded d by the duke of Grafton, to the great joy of the king, and of all his ſubjects. She was a princeſs beautiful in her perſon, affable in her behaviour, pious in the way of the Portugueſe, extremely affectionate to the king, and without the leaſt tincture of that governing ſpirit, which had been ſo conſpicuous in the deceaſed queen ^k. The king is prevailed on to marry.

IT was generally expected, and the event answered the expectation, that this marriage would change the whole face of affairs in Portugal, where the queen quickly became pregnant, and the jeſuits thereupon boldly undertook that ſhe ſhould bring forth a ſon: in which they
e gueſſed right; but when they ventured to go farther, and to prophesy what mighty things would be done in the future reign of this young prince, they rendered themſelves altogether ridiculous, ſince he did not ſurvive to be three weeks old. Upon this a ſtranger thing came f into the head of the populace of that country, and was from thence propagated all over Europe; which was, that all the king's iſſue ſhould be ſhort-lived, and the ſucceſſion remain to the infant. This conceit procured that princeſs a very ſtrong party in the council at Madrid upon the demile of the queen of Spain; but the queen dowager and her party carried it at length for the reigning queen of Portugal's ſiſter, and thereupon count Mansfeldt was ſent into Germany to negotiate that marriage, and was ordered to take ſhipping at Lisbon ^l. He was extremely well received by Don Pedro, who ordered a frigate to be prepared for him: of which Lewis the fourteenth being informed, he ordered his miniſter to expoſtulate with Don Pedro, and to let him know, that as count Mansfeldt was a general in the ſervice of his Imperial majeſty, it was not impoſſible his paſſage might be cut ſhort by the French men of war. The depth of this reaſoning was quickly underſtood by the king, who deſiſted from his deſign; but at the ſame time placed this menace to the account before-mentioned. About this time a negotiation was commenced for marrying the infant to the electoral prince, brother to the reigning queen; which treaty, when it was pretty far advanced, was diſcontinued by the Portugueſe miniſters, for reaſons that were never made public, and with which the grand-maſter of the Teutonic order, who was the queen's ſecond brother, was ſo much offended, that he would not proſecute his journey into Portugal from Madrid, as he at firſt intended, or ſo much as receive the preſents that the king of Portugal ſent him ^m. Some attributed these events, and the king's discovering a new propensity to France, notwithstanding he had acknowledged the prince and princess of Orange for king and queen of England, to the dauphin's becoming a widower, and some propositions being made on his behalf in respect to the infanta, to whom he had been the earliest pretender, or rather the king his father in his behalf, even before that princess was marriageable. It is said, she shewed but very little regard to this proposition when made to her in her last illness, which, instead of a bridal bed, conducted her to her grave on the twenty-second of October, in the twenty-first year of her age. The French gave new, and greater offence than ever to the king her father, by publishing a groundless and malicious story, that she was removed by poison, to make way for heirs attached to the house of Austria ^a.

Endeavours used to engage the king to alter his conduct which are all ineffectual. As the conde de Castelmelhor had passed many years abroad, though from time to time he made excursions into Portugal, which were connived at, yet hitherto he had never appeared in public, or been received at court. He was entirely in the interest of the allies, had acquired a general insight into affairs, and was rather more capable of filling the post of prime minister than any other nobleman in Portugal. At the request of the emperor, it is said, the queen was prevailed upon, contrary to the whole tenor of her conduct, to interpose in his favour: but it was to no purpose; for either the king had so fixed an aversion to this great man, as hindered his desiring ever to see him seated in his cabinet, or was diffident of a subject who was under so many obligations to foreign princes, or which, after all, perhaps may be nearest the truth, those great men who had procured his fall had such an interest in their master, or were so useful to him, that he was unwilling to mortify them by a step of this nature ^b. It is perhaps no inconsiderable argument of the truth of this conjecture, that a great lady very unexpectedly made her appearance in the palace, and from her very entrance had a high influence there, and was applauded for the charms both of her person and mind even by the greatest. This was Donna Louisa, the king's natural daughter, who at the very time she was owned, was also legitimated, and had the title given her of royal highness. The French ambassador alone declined taking any step of this nature till he had orders from his court; but when they arrived, he laboured to excel in complaisance all who had gone before him ^c. This lady the duke de Cadaval demanded for his eldest son; to whom she was married about four years after: the nobility so much envying this honour, that few of them would be present at the diversions that attended it ^d. Another circumstance might probably prevent the count's coming again into credit, and that was the earnestness with which the allies pressed the king to come into the war against France; to which he had no inclination, because his subjects reaped great benefit from an open trade, and because no immediate advantages were proposed to balance the expence and the hazards with which it might be attended ^e. At length he gave out commissions, and directed levies to be made through his dominions, which at another time would have alarmed, but was now very welcome news at Madrid; where, to the amazement of all the old politicians, some of the young ones talked very confidently of demanding a body of auxiliaries against the rebel Catalans ^f. To confirm Don Pedro in these sentiments Katherine queen dowager of England, and his sister, returned into Portugal, taking her journey through Spain, where all possible honours were paid her. At Lisbon she had a palace of her own; where, except upon particular occasions, there was nothing of splendor seen, but rather the silence and frugality of a private life. At length, when the land forces of Portugal were in some measure complete, the king sent the marquis de Aronches his ambassador to Vienna, and the marquis de Cascaes with the like character to Paris, to make a tender of his good offices, which were now received with much more respect than at the close of the last war. To gratify the bigotry of his subjects, he permitted the inquisition at Coimbra to make an Auto de Fe, which was performed with great ceremony; and, to shew his own piety, he received kindly, and granted pensions to several Moors and negroes of distinction, who retired into Portugal, besought his protection, and became converts to the Christian faith ^f.

As the French privateers frequently took ships upon the coast of Portugal, and carried them into the river of Lisbon, the marquis de Cascaes had orders to complain of this, and to threaten, in case no redress could be obtained, the making reprisals; which was a language little expected at Paris from Don Pedro's minister, and yet in compliance with his interests at that juncture, Lewis the fourteenth bore these complaints with temper, and promised satisfaction ^a. On the other hand, the Spanish minister was in singular credit at Lisbon, paid his court assiduously to the king, and gave an opera in his own palace, on every anniversary of the prince's birthday: the like complaisance was shewn to the court of Madrid, and it was no secret that Don

- a Pedro thought he had as good or better claim to the crown of Castile than any other pretender; since he was descended in a direct line from the infanta Donna Maria, daughter to their catholic majesties Ferdinand and Isabella; and if the position could have been made out that was laid down by the Portuguese lawyers, that no stranger was capable of the succession in that kingdom, unless by the consent of the states previously obtained, Don Pedro's right was better than either the French or the Austrian candidates^w. It is not improbable that he was encouraged in these sentiments by some of the allies, who saw with great satisfaction the levies he was making in order to give weight to his pretensions. To defray the expences of this armament, and to keep on foot the forces he had raised, the king was obliged to have recourse to the cortes, or assembly of the states, who voted him an additional revenue of six hundred thousand crowns;
- b but after sitting six months to consider of ways and means, they at length broke up, and referred the manner of raising it to his majesty's pleasure, and he laid it upon tobacco^x. The French king was so little satisfied with the state of this court, that he sent the president Rouille, with the character of his ambassador, to penetrate the designs of Don Pedro; and to accommodate himself to the humour of the nation, he made a most splendid entry. The queen of Portugal being attacked by a fever, accompanied with an erisipilis, died after a short illness on the fourth of August. The king expressed his affection for her by remaining all the time of her sickness in her chamber, taking his repose on a piece of cork laid by her bedside: she had been his wife twelve years and seven months, and left him six children^y. There arrived in the autumn a fleet from Brazil, with about a ton and a half of
- c gold on board, which was the first considerable quantity of that precious metal the Portuguese had received from a colony so long in their possession, and which it is said they owed to a considerable body of outlaws, who had fixed themselves in a distant and desert part of the country, and who, after finding these rich mines, voluntarily submitted themselves to the crown of Portugal, and agreed to pay the king a fifth part of their produce. The French minister presently delivered a memorial to assert his master's claim to the river of Amazons, and to some of the islands in it, which, however, did not meet with much regard^z (C).

(C) The colony of Brazil had hitherto produced vast wealth to Portugal, from sugar and other rich commodities; though no great quantities of silver, and but very little gold had ever been brought from thence. Some short space of time before this of which we are treating, some very understanding persons had acquainted Don Pedro, that from the expulsion of the Dutch they had taken very wrong measures for the improvement of this fine country; that in reality the bay of All-Saints was of all others the least fit for such improvements; and that all efforts of this sort should be made either in the northern or southern extremities of Brazil. This advice was followed, and followed with great success, notwithstanding it was attended with disputes with the French on one side, and the Spaniards on the other. The latter were particularly disturbed with the new colony at Santos, which grew daily in numbers and in wealth, from their intercourse with the neighbouring Indians, who furnished them with some gold; and, which was still of higher consequence, furnished them with good grounds to believe that the countries from which they came, abounded in that precious metal (1). When it was once known that so much wealth was to be had in these hitherto uncultivated regions, there began very soon to resort thither abundance of adventurers of all countries and of all characters, when we say of all countries, we mean Spaniards as well as Portuguese, free Negroes, Mulattoes, and all the different mixtures that are to be met with in Brazil, down to the Caribbos, who are the offspring of Brazilian savages, by Negro women; and by different characters, we mean monks as well as laymen, soldiers, mechanics, broken planters, and in short, all that sort of men who are ready to go any where, or to do any thing to get a living. As these were quite a different race from those of the new colony before-mentioned, it is not to be supposed that they could dwell together, more especially as the former were the quietest and most simple, the latter the most riotous and turbulent people in the world.

These adventurers, therefore, took care to look out for a new settlement, and they found one of the properest places in the world for their reception, at no great distance. This was the thick and vast forest of Parnabaccaba, which overspread all the mountains at the back of this captainship, and in which hitherto none but wild beasts took up their dwelling. They soon cleared a part of this wilderness for their habitation, in which they established not only a new town, which they called San-Paulo, but a new republic also, in which they lived after the manner they liked best. At first this was over-looked, because the country was judged of no great value, and the adjacent captainships were very well pleased to be rid of those sort of folk who resorted thither. In the space, however, of a very few years they grew too strong to be dealt with; for receiving as they did all sorts of people, they quickly increased from two or three hundred to as many thousand men; and being a bold, hardy, enterprising, and daring crew, the governors knew not how to deal with them. In the first place they took care to fortify the avenues to their territory, which were naturally strong; and they seldom ventured abroad but in bodies of eighty or one hundred men; and in such parties they frequently traversed the whole extent of Brazil. These were the people who first discovered and wrought the gold mines, which must be excessively rich, since they were able to obtain vast quantities of metal, without any of those assistances which the Spaniards have in their settlements in Cbili. As this required, however, a great number of hands, they seized upon all the straggling Indians and Negroes they could meet with, and compelled them to undergo such fatigues as they thought proper. This new and extraordinary Commonwealth was denominated, from the place of their denomination, Paulists, and they would not suffer any of the Portuguese officers to enter their territories; yet they acknowledged the sovereignty of the crown of Portugal, and paid regularly what they said was the fifth of the gold they

AT Madrid a point of ceremony occasioned the Portuguese envoy to decline going to court; ^a and tho' the order which had occasioned this difference was revoked, that minister refused to appear there till he had received satisfaction. In the mean time, his catholic majesty died on the first of November, the news of which occasioned great concern at the court of Lisbon.

A. D. 1700.

The king had indeed an army on foot, and some of his frontier places were garrisoned; but he found no respect paid to his claim, and he was in no condition to enforce it. He knew that whether a prince of the house of Austria, or that of Bourbon, succeeded Charles the second, he would become at the same time heir to Philip the second, who had possessed Portugal, and he could not help foreseeing the consequences ^a. The prospect did not at all clear on the accession of the duke of Anjou: but, on the contrary, Philip the fifth, either to please the Spaniards, or from some other motive, was said to have assumed the arms of Portugal, ^b which at Lisbon was immediately understood to be a direct violation of the treaty subsisting between the two crowns; so that with all his prudence, and all his precaution, the king found himself every day more and more embarrassed, more especially when he saw Philip take possession of the whole Spanish monarchy, without opposition ^b.

Concludes, under these circumstances, a treaty with France and Spain.

THESE perplexities were not a little increased by the information the king received from Pacheco, his envoy to the States General, who informed him of a treaty between France and Spain, by which the former engaged to enable the latter to conquer Portugal, which was to be an equivalent for the Low Countries that were in that case to be at the disposition of France. Upon this, overtures were made to the allies, and with them a declaration, that in case they were not accepted, his Portuguese majesty would find himself under a necessity of ^c closing with the two crowns; and accordingly such a treaty was soon afterwards set on foot ^c.

In the month of June an alliance was concluded between Spain and Portugal, by which king Philip renewed the treaty between the two crowns particularly those made by Don Sebastian and with the late Don Alonso the sixth: promised full satisfaction to the Portuguese company, which had been established for supplying the Spanish settlements with negroes, which was accordingly given by a separate treaty, concluded about the same time. Philip likewise renounced all his pretensions to the island of St. Gabriel, and promised that upon any scarcity of provision in Portugal, he would permit the sending corn thither from any part of his dominions. On the other side, Don Pedro guaranteed the testament of Charles the second, declared himself an enemy to such as should make war on Philip on the score of that succession, and both ^d kings reciprocally undertook not to give shelter to rebels or criminals that fled from the justice of either state. His most christian majesty became the guaranty of this treaty ^d. The true design of Don Pedro in making it, was to establish a neutrality for the present, and to be entitled to as good or better terms in case he was either inclined or obliged to change sides. Upon the first news of the death of James the second of Great-Britain, the court of Portugal went into mourning, which was to avoid a notification in form; and, therefore, when the French ambassador pressed him to follow his master's example, in respect to the succession in that kingdom, he refused to hear of it upon any terms. In pursuance of the treaty before mentioned, and upon the approach of the English fleet, the king ordered the duke de Cadaval to assemble forces for the security of the coasts, while the king himself went to Salvaterra, in order to avoid the persecution to which he was exposed from the memorials of the Im- ^e perial and French ministers, count Waldstein and the president Rouille ^e.

In America his majesty of Portugal took care to avail himself of the concessions made him by the French, who, upon his demolishing two or three little ports of no consequence, admitted his right to both sides of the river of Amazons, and quitted their own pretensions to the island of Marañon; for by this time, the importance of his friendship was so well understood at Versailles and Madrid, that whatever he insisted upon was immediately complied with ^f. This in some measure consoled him for the very different usage he had met with in the former part of his reign. Sir Stafford Fairbone, with an English fleet obtained, which in the year 1691, amounted to one thousand marks, or eight thousand ounces; which shews that at that time they drew annually from the rivers and mountains in their possession forty thousand ounces of gold. They took care, however, every time they paid the tribute, to declare, they did it freely and of their own accord, out of respect to the crown of Portugal, and not from any sort of fear or sense of obligation (2). These people in process of time, notwithstanding, were brought to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the crown of Portugal, chiefly thro' their desire to farm and work other rich mines that were discovered without the extent of their territory; but the town of St. Paul is, notwithstanding, regarded as the capital of the mines, and a strong garrison is maintained in it for their security (3).

a being upon his coast, the king demanded a maritime force from France, capable of affording him security; and the ambassador of that crown having fairly told him that the thing was impossible, Don Pedro replied, he must then have recourse to a neutrality, and ordered his minister at Madrid to make the like declaration. To which cardinal Portocarrero answered, "That nothing better was to be expected from the rebel duke of Bragança." This angry speech, and the Spanish minister's giving the king a hint at Lisbon that he must chuse his side, for that a neutrality would never be admitted, left him much more at liberty, inasmuch that he received the prince of Hesse-Darmstadt with much civility, and the admirante of Ca- A.  frontiers, and the artillery ordered thither that had been removed to the coast, the Spanish minister began to take umbrage: and having demanded an audience, talked to the king in a very high stile. To which Don Pedro answered calmly, "That his own behaviour was the c "cause of these measures, since it plainly betrayed an alteration in his master's sentiments, "against which it was but natural for him to secure himself in the best way he could." By degrees the treaty, that had been long upon the carpet, was at length brought to bear, and was actually concluded and signed on the sixteenth of May, by the duke de Cadaval, the marquis de Alegrette, the count de Alvor, Don Roquo Montero Paim, and Don Josepho de Faria: on the part of his imperial majesty, by the count de Waldestein: on the behalf of the queen of Great-Britain, by Mr. Metbuen: and on the part of the states-general of the United Provinces, by the sieur Schonenburgh ^b. By this treaty the emperor declared the archduke Charles king of Spain, and his majesty of Portugal agreed to acknowledge him as such, and to bring into the field of his own troops twelve thousand foot and three thousand horse: his Imperial d majesty was to take thirteen thousand Portuguese troops into his pay, at the rate of a million pieces of eight a year. Other subsidies were likewise stipulated; and the sending a maritime force sufficient to protect the coasts of Portugal, by a separate article, which was to be kept secret. The archduke engaged, in quality of king of Spain, to yield to his majesty of Portugal, in perpetuity, the towns of Badajoz, Alcantara, Albuquerque, and Valenza in Estremadura; as also Bayonne, Vigo, Tuy, and Gardia, in Galicia. By another separate article, he stipulates likewise to renounce all pretensions to the countries in dispute on the Rio de la Plata ¹. As Don Pedro was not obliged to declare till the new king of Spain was actually arrived in Portugal, the treaty was not made public: however, the report of it was so strong, that Lewis the fourteenth sent a new minister to Lisbon; who in an audience he had of Don e Pedro, told him that his master advised him, not only out of friendship but out of compassion, not to engage in leagues with distant and weak allies, who in his distress might be unwilling, or if not, would be certainly unable to assist him. In answer, his majesty assured him, that he had a true sense of his master's friendship, and hoped he should never stand in need of his compassion. At the same time, to shew how much he was in earnest, he ordered every peasant in his dominions, who had two sons, to register one of them for his service, and forbid the holy office to disturb, on the score of his religion, any officer or soldier in the service of his allies ^k.

ONE great motive to the king's concluding this alliance ceased, almost as soon as it was The war great number of transports, with near ten thousand men on board, and was received with all possible demonstrations of affection and esteem by his Portuguese majesty. The French minister affected to declare in public, that he would leave the kingdom as soon as the archduke arrived: which it is probable he would have done; but Don Pedro, to wipe out one article in the long account before-mentioned, sent him orders to quit Portugal in twenty-four hours ¹. His majesty quickly published his motives for declaring war; in which are deduced a long train of insults, some of which have been before-mentioned. King Philip a published his manifesto also; and, which was more to the purpose, was first in the field with a good army: having the duke of Berwick under him, he took eight or ten places, and amongst them Castel-Branco, where the soldiers found a great quantity of stores, and the tents of the two kings: at the same time the duke of Berwick surprised, and defeated the corps of troops commanded by baron Fagel m. To balance these losses the marquis das Minas, at the head of a Portuguese army entered Castile, defeated Don Pedro Ronquillo, and took some small places. The autumn campaign was not more favourable than that of the summer: the two kings took the field, having received a reinforcement from England; but meeting with some disappointments, returned very soon to Lisbon. Don Pedro was no sooner there than he wrote to queen Anne to recal the duke of Schomberg, who by pressing him continually for his father's arrears, was become very disagreeable. The duke was equally weary of his command, having predicted all the misfortunes of the campaign, though he had not authority enough to hinder them. The queen complied with both their desires, and sent him a successor. As for baron Fagel he maintained himself in the king's good graces, notwithstanding his misfortune; but then he differed with his prime minister the duke of Cadaval, whom he held to be no great friend to the war, and perhaps in that he was not mistaken: he also fell out with the marquis de Ruigny, or, as we stile him, lord Galway, whom the queen had sent to succeed the duke of Schomberg, and not being successful in this dispute, discovered strong marks of discontent. These unlucky jealousies and misunderstandings were fatal to the service; and the Portuguese ministers were so intent on making the most of the subsidies and succours that were sent from England, that, if the troops had not been relieved by the fleet under the command of Sir George Rooke, they might have suffered more through want of provisions, than from the superiority of the enemy; which in the first campaign was sufficiently felt, and would have been more so if the Spanish generals had not done all in their power to cross the duke of Berwick n. The admirante of Castile had also his share of vexation; so that the year ended with complaints on all sides, and the dismantling of Portalegre, and several other places in Portugal, which the Spaniards demolished before their retreat.

At the very opening of the year the king was attacked with a very dangerous swelling in the throat, attended with such violent symptoms, that he immediately made his will, and appointed the queen dowager of England regent o. The general of the jesuits taking this opportunity to command the king's confessor, who was of his order, to quit his employment, the king sent him word, that, if he insisted upon it, himself and the rest of his order should quit the kingdom. He had, not long after, a return of his distemper, which obliged him to leave the reins of government in the hands of his sister; but as soon as he found himself in any condition to use exercise, he applied himself to military affairs, and quickening the motions of his troops, so that he might have them early in the field, and in this he met with all the success he could desire. Baron Fagel, who commanded the Dutch troops in chief had acquired the confidence of this monarch, and of king Charles. It was proposed to open the campaign with the siege of Badajoz, which he disliked, because it was a large well fortified place, and he apprehended the army too small to invest it: he added, that the siege would be of a considerable length; which might give the Spaniards time to attempt its relief, and he was unwilling to risk a disappointment. Besides, he thought the end of the war ought to regulate the progress of it, and as that was the setting king Charles upon the throne, he was for penetrating directly into Castile. His sentiments were followed, and the campaign opened by the siege of Valenza de Alcantara, which was taken p. Alburquerque was next reduced; but when, in pursuance of this project, Alcantara should have been attacked, the proposal was rejected; and it was carried in the council of war to retire into quarters of refreshment. Before the army reparated there was another great council held, at which the admirante of Castile assisted, in order to determine the operations of the fleet and army of the allies, with whom king Charles was to go in person: he was for alarming the coasts of Spain during the summer, and return at the season for action to reduce St. Lucar, in order to fix the seat of war in Andalusia, rather than in Catalonia. In this he was supported by the English and Dutch generals; but in his return from the camp to Lisbon, he died of an apoplexy q. Baron Fagel came to court in the beginning of July, where he found the operations of the confederate fleet, and of the Portuguese army in the autumn regulated without his concurrence. The siege of Badajoz was resolved on, and he was prevailed upon by the king of Portugal to assist at it, though against

- a. his opinion. When he came before it, he advised destroying the Spanish magazines as far as Merida, previous to the siege; but that was postponed: when the army of the two crowns took post near the place, he was for fighting; but that was rejected. In the course of the siege a bomb from the castle blew up one of the principal magazines in the camp. Lord Galway and baron Fagel repairing to the place to remedy the disorder this accident had occasioned, the former lost his right arm by a cannon shot; after which, through the negligence of the Portuguese, some posts were surprised, and the baron was forced to raise the siege. Upon this, and in consequence of leave obtained from the states, he returned to Holland, having much the same opinion of the court he left as the earl of Peterborough, who is said to have written to the queen, that they had but one friend in the council (meaning the king) and he had not the greatest weight. About this time the queen dowager of England resigned the regency in great discontent, on account of the king's cancelling an order of her's to the Pope's nuncio to leave the court; and it is thought this went so near her heart as to be in some measure the occasion of her death, which happened on the last day of the year, in the sixty-eighth of her age. She left all the immense wealth she had saved to the king her brother, to the no small disappointment of the priests.

- By the great attention of the king Don Pedro, the troops were in a condition to be in Madrid taken very early: the army was commanded by the marquis das Minas and lord Galway. The former was for besieging Badajoz, because it was a place of great consequence to Portugal, and which they were to keep by treaty: the latter was for besieging Alcantara, for the reasons which had been before given by baron Fagel. The matter being left to the king, he sent positive orders to attack Alcantara, preferring the interest of the common cause to that of his own. The place was strong, and had a good garrison; yet it was quickly taken. The Spanish writers will have it that there was money in the case; but that seems to be improbable, as the governor twice refused the terms that were offered him. Some other places of less consequence submitted upon the approach of the allies, who advanced as far as Almaraz, and lord Galway was for proceeding directly to Madrid, as the forces under the duke of Berwick were by no means able to oppose them. The Portuguese generals were of another opinion, and they prevailed. The city of Barcelona was at this time besieged by king Philip, and his competitor in it. The Portuguese believed it would be taken, and if it was, their communication with Portugal, upon their advancing into Castile, might be easily intercepted; and therefore they proposed besieging Ciudad Rodrigo, a place of some importance in itself, and of great consequence to them. Lord Galway procured the king's orders in favour of his project; but they came too late to prevent a siege: the place surrendered on the twenty-sixth of May; and by this time, they had an account that the siege of Barcelona was raised, and the concerns of king Philip in the utmost confusion. Lord Galway pressed them to resume his scheme; but in vain; they said there were great hazards to be run and the heat was insupportable; but upon the arrival of the king's positive orders, it was agreed to. As soon as they began to move, courier after courier was sent to hasten the march of king Charles from Barcelona, and to give him the more time they moved but slowly; so that it was the twenty-sixth of the month before they arrived there; but then indeed they made themselves masters of Salamanca and Toledo in the way. However, king Charles was so little in haste, on account, as some say, of the want of a magnificent equipage, or as others with more probability assert, from the desire of being invited thither by some grandees of Castile, for fear he should seem to be too much obliged to the English and Portuguese, that at length it became impracticable. King Philip having joined the duke of Berwick, dislodged the Portuguese, who in their retreat experienced some of the hardships they had foreseen. Here the single opportunity was lost of placing king Charles upon the throne, since if he had arrived in time at Madrid, the seat of war must have been transferred into Navarre. As it was managed, the Portuguese sustained some loss in their retreat; while in their absence the marquis de Bay had made an irruption upon their frontiers and had recovered Alcantara by scalade. Lord Galway was extremely blamed here, and he in his apology laid a great load upon the marquis das Minas: notwithstanding that, all things considered, neither of them was much to blame. At their return into Portugal the army went into winter quarters and the king gave out commissions for levying an additional corps of eleven thousand men, as being fully determined to carry on the war with greater vigour than ever. While he was occupied with these thoughts he retired to Alcantara, which is the Versailles of Portugal, and at a very small distance from Lisbon, he caught cold by sleeping in the open air after having warmed himself with exercise. This happened on the fourth of December, and he thought himself much better the next day; on the sixth, however, he was attacked by a

(D) Don Pedro the second was born on the 26th of April, 1648, at Lisbon (4). In his person he was above the ordinary size in point of stature and bulk, of a very serene, and towards the close of his life, grave aspect, but not accompanied with any thing of severity or haughtiness, for his character was in nothing more conspicuous than in his modesty. He was active, vigorous, loved manly diversions, and excelled in them most of his subjects. In respect to parts, his apprehension was quick, and his judgment solid; very sensible and sedate, which, however, towards the end of his life, degenerated into melancholy. So temperate in his diet, that he eat commonly alone, sitting upon a piece of cork on the floor, attended by one servant, never drinking wine himself, or suffering any to approach him that did. In his religion, zealous, and very sincere, as is evident from his distributing large sums in charity, with all the secrecy he was able. He spoke Spanish very well, and his own language incomparably. His coming young into business, and his constant attention to it, supplied the defect in his education, and qualified him so well for the transactions of the cabinet, that foreign ministers found it easier to deal with his ministers than with himself; for though he treated them with great sweetness, as well as perfect civility, yet when he felt he had the better of an argument, he would push it to the utmost, and render this victory complete (5). The duke de Giovinazzo was almost the only one too hard for him: but he vanquished like the Tartars, by flying; for having confessed the truth of all that the king suggested, he desired that the treaty might not be definitive, but provisional, for the sake of the Spanish ministers, and his own, who he said durst not give up the point, though ever so just; and that his majesty's rights, being so very clear, could suffer nothing by being left to such a discussion. His want of learning, however, exposed him to two inconveniences: the first was that in the evenings, and when he could not have recourse to exercise, he amused himself with inferior company, and listened to all the secret history of Lisbon. The other was a greater evil; he indulged himself in great liberties with the sex, and his mistresses were, generally speaking, mean persons. These irregularities weakened alike his mind and his body, and brought upon him diseases from which his temperance and exercise would otherwise have defended him (6). Through the course of his reign, the welfare of his subjects was the invariable object of his government: and if the affairs of Portugal had been retrieveable, there is no sort of doubt they had been retrieved. In point of justice he was inflexible, without cruelty; he punished for the sake of example, and not for resentment; and which was no easy thing to do, he checked the too great power of the nobility, and put an end to the insolence of the people; he raised the value of money, but he recoined it when half clipped away, and took the loss upon himself; he studied in all transactions with foreign powers to promote the interest of the Portuguese commerce; and in his regulations at home he aimed at augmenting the number, and enlarging the immunities of his subjects, in which, if he was not very fortunate, it was by no means his fault;

he entered into the general alliance with great prudence and spirit; he was well acquainted with the genius of Lewis the fourteenth; he was nettled at the usage he met with from him, and he made him feel the weight of that power in conjunction, for which in its separate capacity so little consideration had been shewn. It is true he treated with both Philip and Charles as monarchs of Spain; and, perhaps, it may be true that he made the treaties concluded with one of use to him when he negotiated with the other, in which, if he cannot be totally excused, we may at least venture to assert, on his behalf, that he treated other princes as other princes treated him (7). He was a sincere ally to Charles the third; and approved the advice given him by the admiral of Castile, which was to have transferred the seat of the Spanish war into Andalusia rather than Catalonia, which in the end appeared plainly to be the best advice, though it did not appear so till it was too late (8). In reference to his children, he had by his first wife, the infanta Isabella Maria Louisa Josepha, born January the 6th, 1669, and who died unmarried October the 21st, 1690. By his second queen he had Don Juan, prince of Brazil, who died in the seventh year of his age; Don Juan, who succeeded him; the infant Don Antonio Francisco, born May the 15th, 1695; Don Manuel, born August the 3d, 1697; the infanta Donna Theresa Josepha, born February the 8th, 1696, and who died when just turned of eight years old, after being promised in marriage to Charles the third of Spain; Donna Frances Xavier, born January the 30th, 1699, and who died at Lisbon July the 15th, 1736, unmarried. He had besides many natural children; but of these only one daughter and two sons were acknowledged. The former, Donna Louisa, married in 1695 Don Lewis Ambrose de Mellos duke of Cadaval; and after his decease in 1702, she espoused Don Diego de Mello, duke of Cadaval; his half brother, and died herself, without issue by either marriage, December the 23d, 1732. Don Michael, born October the 15th, 1669, espoused in 1715 Donna Louisa Antonietta Casimira de Nassau y Soufa; and upon the birth of his eldest son, Don Pedro, in 1718, she was created dutchess of Lafoens. Don Joseph, who was the king's other natural son, going with his brother before mentioned to hunt on the other side the Tayo, and returning in the afternoon of January the 13th, 1724, the boat was overfet within less than a mile of the shore, by which Don Michael unfortunately perished, and Don Joseph was with great difficulty saved. He was sixteen years afterwards promoted to the primacy of Braga. Don Pedro, duke of Lafoens, had the title of highness given him, by decree of the supreme tribunal, in 1722, and when he was of age succeeded his father in all the commanderies, and other posts of honour and profit, which he had possessed (9). The death of this great monarch, Don Pedro, was occasioned by his catching cold at his palace in the village of Alcantara, scarce a mile from Lisbon, which he neglected till it degenerated into a kind of lethargy, from which he was a little relieved by bleeding in the foot; but it speedily returned, and proved mortal before those who were about him apprehended him to be in danger (1). It was at a very critical conjuncture for the allies, to whom this

- a Don Juan the fifth was turned of somewhat more than seventeen when he succeeded his father, and as he delayed his proclamation till the first day of the new year, this gave some countenance to a rumour, that the French party were inclined to set up Don Francisco, his second brother, and to appoint a certain grandee regent during his minority. After this ceremony was over, the new king gave the strongest assurances to the ministers of the maritime powers, that he would steadily adhere to his father's engagements; and would neglect nothing that appeared to him necessary to carry on the war with vigour^z. These promises were so well executed, that lord Galway and the marquis das Minas actually penetrated into Castile, and even arrived without much opposition on the frontiers of the kingdom of Valencia, and this so early as the beginning of April. King Charles came to the army, and great hopes were entertained of effecting this campaign what had been proposed in the last. Lord Galway was for acting offensively, and his sentiment prevailing against that of the king, and those in whom he most confided, that monarch thought fit to retire from the army, taking with him a regiment of dragoons, and, as some say, another of foot^a. The army of the allies consisted of about sixteen thousand men, with which the marquis das Minas and lord Galway destroyed several of the enemy's magazines, and at last laid siege to Valena. The duke of Berwick marched with the army of the two crowns to its relief, and being much superior to the allies in cavalry, advanced through the plain of Almanza to give them battle. Upon this lord Galway prevailed upon the generals of the allies to quit the siege of Valena, and march on the twenty-fourth of April early in the morning to attack the enemy, tho' it is on all hands agreed, that they had no distinct intelligence of their force. The misfortune of that day is too well known, and has been in another place too largely insisted upon to be repeated here. The blame was thrown by the English general upon the Portuguese, and upon the count of Barcelona. The marquis das Minas, who fought very gallantly himself, was wounded, and is said to have had his mistress killed by his side in the habit of an Amazon, ascribed the loss of the battle to fighting in a plain, their being borne down by the Spanish horse, and the troops having lost their spirit and strength by the fatigue of a long march. It must be allowed, that the Portuguese escaped better than their allies, and that the marquis das Minas shewed great conduct in his retreat. This misfortune, however, exposed the frontiers not a little; so that the marquis de Bay, who commanded king Philip's forces, pretended to have levied contributions almost to the gates of Lisbon. The Castilians also, before the end of the year, recovered Ciudad Rodrigo, after a short siege. Notwithstanding all which disadvantages, the Portuguese minister at London presented a memorial; in which he declared, that his master did not look upon these mischiefs as without remedy: that he remained still firmly attached to the common cause, would contribute to the utmost in its support, as being firmly persuaded, that the independency of his own crown, and the commerce of Great Britain, could never be safe while the duke of Anjou remained in Spain^b. This memorial answered the end proposed, and procured that crown all the assistance that could be given.

John V's accession to the throne of Portugal.

- c THERE had been in the life-time of his father an intention of marrying the prince of Brazil to an archduchess, and his majesty had declared more than once his resolution to execute that engagement; which was highly acceptable to the allies. The count de Villa-Major was named in the spring to go to the court of Vienna to demand this princess. He took the Hague in his way, in order to solicit the payment of the subsidies due to his master; of which he obtained a very round sum, but which hardly defrayed the expence he was at in equipping a train of one hundred and fifty persons that were to attend him to Vienna. His appearance at that court struck every body with amazement: he was treated with all possible respect: the archduchess Mary Anne, second daughter of the emperor Leopold, was granted to his master, and the marriage soon after celebrated, in which the emperor himself was proxy^c. Lord Galway returning from Catalonia into Portugal, found there two commissions from the monarch had intimated the expediency of making a good peace in the midst and at the height of their victories; for he began to perceive whatever glory, whatever conquests might be acquired, by continuing the war in Spain, it was not like to end in the restitution of that monarchy to the house of Austria. There is no doubt that if the peace had been then made, when his troops had but just quitted Madrid, he would have found his account in it, in a very conspicuous degree, both as to security and advantage (2). As it was, he left all to the management of a very young prince, whom the allies, by the address of their ministers, and by his marriage, thought to gain entirely to themselves, as in reality they did for some years, till, by overstraining the cord of their connections (3), they had forced him to resume Don Pedro's maxim, that a prince may be very faithful to his allies, without preferring their interest to his own.

queen his mistress; the one appointing him general and commander in chief of all her forces, and the other ambassador extraordinary to his majesty of Portugal^d; but the situation of affairs in Flanders prevented the sending the succours intended to Portugal so early as had been designed; and therefore the summer and the autumn campaigns afforded nothing remarkable, except a singular regulation, that the peasants on both sides should be exempted from the miseries of war. The queen of Portugal, whose marriage had been celebrated the ninth of July, set out on the eleventh; and having been splendidly entertained in her passage by the king of Prussia, arrived on the seventh of August at Wezel, where she embarked on board the yachts of the states general, and arrived safe at the Hague on the nineteenth. She went from thence to Rotterdam, where she embarked on the eleventh of September on board an English squadron commanded by admiral Baker; but meeting with bad weather, and contrary winds, she did not arrive at Portsmouth till the fifth of October. She was complimented on the part of the queen by the duke of Grafton; and received and bestowed very rich presents. She embarked on board admiral Byng's squadron on the eighteenth, arrived safely in the river of Lisbon on the twenty-sixth^e, and on the twenty-eighth the marriage was consummated. Soon after arrived the richest and the greatest fleet that ever came from the Brazils, consisting of one hundred sail, and having on board in diamonds, gold, sugar, and other rich commodities, a cargo valued at six millions sterling^f. Some attempts were made by the French party to withdraw the king from his engagements; but without success. On the contrary, he made all the requisite dispositions for having a flourishing army in the field, and for supplying his magazines, so as that the troops might be able to take the field early the next year, to repair the unavoidable inactivity in which they had spent this; and the new levies were made with all the success that could be desired. As the allies knew the great consequence of this to the common cause, their ministers complimented him highly on his firmness.

proves unsuccessful.

As there had been some rumour of a convention to render more effectual the agreements for protecting the farmers and peasants, it gave some umbrage to the ministers of the allies, who could not divest themselves of an apprehension that it had the appearance of a neutrality. The Portuguese ministers answered, that it was a proposition that came from the enemy: that they were unwilling to be thought less humane, or attentive to their subjects interest; but that, after all, the convention was embarrassed with so many difficulties, that it was more than probable it would come to nothing. The earl of Galway, in quality of ambassador extraordinary, made a public entry into Lisbon with great magnificence; which highly pleased the court and the people^g. The king, however, was not very complaisant in providing, or suffering the earl to provide for all the French refugees he brought over. His majesty thought it very unequal that the private men of a battalion should be his subjects, and the officers strangers. However, so much care was taken, that the army was early in the field, and on the fourth of May the Portuguese, under the command of the marquis de Fronteira, encamped on one side of the Caya, the marquis de Bay, with the Spanish forces lying on the other: the latter were superior in horse, and the former in foot. The Portuguese writers say, that the earl of Galway was desirous to fight, in order to wipe out the memory of his misfortune at Almanza; but he asserted, that he opposed fighting. However, being insulted by the enemy, the allies passed the river on the seventh. The Spanish relations say, that the marquis de Bay permitted them to pass, and to form without any interruption: the reason is clear, there was a plain on the other side, which gave an opportunity for his cavalry to act. Both the right and the left wing of the allies were quickly beat, the Spanish horse pursuing them a full league. On the other hand the Spanish infantry behaved ill; that of the allies formed into a square battalion; but the marquis de Fronteira made a regular and noble retreat to Campo Major. The English, who brought up the rear, suffered much. The enemy took twenty-two field-pieces, and fourscore waggons, but there were no great consequences followed this action, only the earl of Galway, at his return to Lisbon, induced the king to change his sentiments, and to consent, that there should be a large proportion of foreign officers in the new regiments of horse and dragoons he was about to raise. In the autumn campaign the Spaniards besieged Olivenza; but were obliged to raise it with some loss. In the winter the king obtained a free gift from the clergy, enquired into the conduct of the campaign, and broke such of the officers of his cavalry who had behaved worst. But the discontent this occasioned was felt afterwards in many instances^h.

THERE happened in the winter of the preceding year a dispute on a point of ceremony, which was now revived, and of which it is necessary to give a full account: first, because it became in its consequences a thing of the last importance; and next, because it is so little known, that it will be a difficult thing to find any traces of it in any book written in our a language. The king Don Pedro, while he was regent, that is, upwards of thirty years before this time, had found it necessary to suppress what was called the franchises of foreign ministers; and he conducted his design with so much prudence and temper, that it occasioned no sort of complaint, neither had there been any dispute within this period of time. But now the bishop and prince of Labach being at Lisbon with the character of ambassador from his Imperial majesty; but incognito, as not having yet made his entry, which in this country is a point very essential, conceived it a great affront for officers of justice to pass by his house with their white rods in their hands, which are the ensigns of their office; and therefore sent a Swiss, who was his porter, to turn them out of the street; and upon their refusing to go back, he beat one of them severely. The king was no sooner informed of this, than the secretary of state wrote to the ambassador to let him know, that he must discharge his porter, or forbear coming to court. This affair was, however, at length terminated. But after it had slept some months, count Stampa, ambassador from king Charles the third, by the advice and instigation of the bishop, revived it, and more than once sent his servants to compel the officers of justice, and even judges who were passing by his door in their calashes, to go back, and return out of the street. The secretary of state wrote to him, that the king would not endure this; and that if he persisted in such notions, he must forbear coming to court. Upon this count Stampa demanded a conference; at which assisted the prelate who began this bustle, the prince de Cienfuegos, envoy from king Charles, the earl of Galway her Britannic majesty's minister, and monsieur de Schonenberg, minister from the states general, who made what they called a common cause of this, and declared their unanimous resolution, that no officer of justice should pass before their houses without dropping his white staff. The secretary of state represented to them, that while these franchises continued, there was no such thing as peace or justice in Lisbon, which induced the late king to suppress them: that the Portuguese ministers neither claimed nor enjoyed any such franchises at their respective courts: that this was no common cause as they pretended, since the Pope's nuncio, who had the first rank amongst foreign ministers, and the Prussian minister, who was the oldest then in Portugal, had publicly disclaimed any concern in this affair: that what they did was of their own heads, and without any instructions from their respective courts; and that this kind of proceeding was of such a nature, as might have very dangerous effects with regard to the common cause; for which reason he exhorted them not to carry things to extremities, or deceive themselves with notions of expedients, since the king was resolved to be the sole master in his capital, and would be obeyed. The ministers stuck by each other; the king ordered them to quit Lisbon in twenty-four hours, and at the same time ordered four regiments of horse into the city; and thereupon the ministers submitted till they received the orders of their respective courts in regard to this dispute: and their courts were too wise to revive it¹. This unluckly affair quite disconcerted things in Portugal: the king considered it in a strange light, and began to grow jealous of foreign officers and foreign troops, from an affair that began wildly, and ended meanly. The estates had also a private and particular grievance in respect to an imposition that had been laid upon salt at St. Ubes: on the other hand, the king of Portugal ordered the count de Tarouca, his ambassador at the Hague, to insist upon the payment of two years subsidies which were due to him. Their high mightinesses found it expedient to pay him one. We shall presently see what the consequences were of these misunderstandings. The count de Villa-verde commanded the army of Portugal, in the place of the marquis de Fronteira: the battalions were far from being complete; and the six new regiments that were to be in the queen of Great Britain's pay, were not above half raised; so that during the summer campaign they acted on the defensive, which was prudent enough, considering that the marquis de Bay had an army equal to theirs in Estremadura, and there was besides a corps of ten thousand men in *Andalusia*². In the middle of August general Stanhope beat the troops of the two crowns at Almenara; on the twentieth they gained the great victory of *Saragossa*³; upon which expresses were dispatched from the army of king Charles, to press a junction with the army of the Portuguese at Almaras. The answer was, that having no magazines, such a march as this was impossible. It was then desired that a detachment of four or five thousand men might be sent, but this was refused for the same reason⁴. All this time king Charles was marching to Madrid, against his own will, and against the sentiments of count Staremborg. General Stanhope, whose measure this was, pressed the court of Portugal for the troops in the queen's pay. At last he demanded the English regiments; and the secretary of the embassy offered to furnish the expence, the earl of Galway being by this time recalled; but this was likewise refused. All that the Portuguese would do was besieging and taking a place or two of no great consequence, to alarm and distract the enemy ; after which the army separated and went into winter quarters. To this conduct of the court of Portugal the ruin of king Charles's affairs is commonly ascribed ^a. In answer to this the Portuguese allege, that they had once before made themselves masters of Madrid, and suffered severely in their retreat ; that notwithstanding this they marched a second time into Castile, and smarted for it at Almanza ; that to have marched the whole army now, was to have left Portugal at mercy, since king Philip's troops in Andalusia might have wasted it at pleasure ; that to have sent a great detachment, instead of lessening, would have increased the difficulties of king Charles, who did not leave Madrid thro' want of force, but thro' want of food which it was not in their power to supply. As to the joint application of all the ministers of the courts, allies to the court of Portugal, upon this occasion, we have shewn how that came to have but little weight. The facts are fairly stated, and the reader will judge for himself. In the winter arrived the earl of Portmore, in quality of her Britannic majesty's minister and commander in chief ; and was received with all possible marks of kindness and respect ^o, agreeable to that particular regard which king John always expressed for this nation, and which it may be might have been improved more to our advantage than it was.

A. D. 1710.
The allies complain of the king's conduct, who makes heavier complaints in his turn.

IN the winter the king endeavoured to restore his forces, and declared his intention to act with fifteen thousand foot and five thousand horse in the spring : but at the same time complained of the difficulties he was under to fill his magazines with corn, and to provide horses, of which there was a great scarcity. In answer to this, the ministers of the maritime powers talked in a very high tone, which has very seldom any good effects on princes. His Portuguese majesty answered, that if he had not done what his allies expected, the fault lay in their expectations and not in him : that he had lost the best part of one army by marching it to Madrid at their request, at a vast expence, paying for every thing, not to disoblige the Castilians, who were supposed to be well affected to king Charles, whereas it proved otherwise ; that he lost a second army almost entirely in the campaign of Almanza, the remains of them having served in Catalonia ever since ; and that after this it was no great wonder that he should not be in a condition to act so vigorously as he and they could wish. It happened unluckily that the Imperial minister, on whose credit they had talked in this high strain, appeared about this time to be disturbed in his senses ^p. The count de Villa-verde acted offensively in the summer campaign ; took Miranda and some other places, and levied great contributions in the enemy's country. He afterwards passed the Guadiana and took Zafra ; but while he was thus employed, the marquis de Bay entered Portugal, and actually bombarded Elvas, which obliged the Portuguese army to return ; and upon this the Spaniards retired. In the mean time the Portuguese minister, count Tarouca, pressed the Dutch for the payment of several years subsidies, and made other complaints, which were but indifferently answered ; but to balance these, it was suggested to that minister, that they had some fears as to the sincerity of his master in regard to the common cause. These informations came from the duke of Savoy. The count acknowledged, that propositions had been made by an emissary of the marquis de Bay ; that an answer had been returned, importing, that Portugal would treat only in conjunction with her allies : that under pretence of not having received this answer, the marquis wrote a second letter ; upon which a copy of the former answer was sent him, and his emissary obliged to leave the country. It appeared afterwards there was no foundation for these suspicions ; for that on the one hand the French gave out that they had made a secret treaty with Portugal, to alarm the allies ; and on the other, had actually made propositions at Lisbon, in order to amuse the Portuguese, while they were attacking them in America. The autumn campaign produced little or nothing. The preceding year the French had made a rash attempt upon Rio Janeiro, and had been repulsed with great loss. This year they sent a strong squadron to revenge it, which they did to some purpose, and which had a terrible effect upon the affairs of Portugal. It happened unluckily, that, when the count de Tarouca complained that the states had not performed their engagements, in sending squadrons to protect the coasts of Portugal, he had received for answer, that if they had not sent squadrons to Portugal, they had however done what amounted to the same thing, by watching the Dunkirk squadron ; whereas it was this very squadron, under the command of Gue Trouin, that had done all this mischief at Rio de Janeiro ^q.

Military affairs go as untowardly this campaign as they went the last.

AT the opening of the ensuing year the affairs of Portugal were in a very perplexed situation ; their loss in America appeared to be greater than had been at first imagined ; and by the comparison of their own with the French accounts could not fall much short of a million sterling, exclusive of four men of war that had been burnt in the bay. To lessen the king's chagrin, and to put it in his power to take the necessary measures for protecting their commerce, the nobility and clergy made him considerable presents, in ready money and in plate. His majesty appeared to be extremely satisfied with these testimonies of duty and public spirit ;

- a but remained still under great uneasiness from the conduct of his allies. He knew that some overtures had been made on the part of France, and he disapproved them. In the month of March the count de Tarouca presented a memorial of his master's demands, in which he insisted upon the restitution of the whole Spanish monarchy to the emperor Charles, as a measure requisite for the security of *Portugal*¹. Some apprehensions there were that the French would pay a third visit to Rio de Janeiro, which occasioned a warm application from a Dutch squadron, with little effect. He was likewise directed to insist upon the subsidies, and with great difficulty obtained bonds for the amount of one year, and which he discounted, as he had done those the year before, at ten per cent. loss. This supply was very acceptable at Lisbon; where, as the season of action approached, they found themselves under fresh difficulties; for the French
- b had a squadron upon their coasts under the command of the sieur Coffart, who gave out that he would force a passage up the river of Lisbon, while the marquis de Bay had a superior army upon their frontiers, and threatened to send a great body of horse to the very gates of *Lisbon*². The count de Villa-verda and the earl of Portmore were in the field, with an army so small that they could not hinder the Spaniards from making incursions, and raising contributions; and besides, the earl made no scruple of owning that he expected orders every day for embarking the British troops. It happened fortunately for this crown, that the heats were so violent that the armies were forced to go into quarters of refreshment sooner than usual; and the marquis de Bay receiving soon after orders to detach three thousand horse for Catalonia, the armies were brought more upon a level. In the autumn campaign, however, the marquis besieged Campo
- c Major, which was so well defended, and the count de Villa-verda took his measures so well, that towards the end of October the Spaniards were obliged to raise the siege. But to balance this small success, major-general Pearce, who commanded the English troops, separated from the Portuguese, and declared his intentions to embark. At the same time the English court refused to pay any longer the Portuguese troops in Catalonia; and the king of Portugal, finding himself pressed by his enemies and deserted by his allies, was constrained to negotiate a suspension of arms at the Hague, which was concluded and signed at Utrecht on the seventh of November, by the count de Tarouca and Don Lewis d'Acunba on one side, and by the marshal d'Huxelles, the abbe de Polignac, and Mr. Mesnager, on the other. The Portuguese troops in Catalonia had orders to separate from those of the other, and to march home by land. Towards
- d the close of the year the Brazil fleet arrived safe in the river of Lisbon, to the great joy of the whole nation, who had been very apprehensive of its being attacked by the French in its passage; and notwithstanding all their pressing instances in Holland, were not able to obtain any succours, not so much thro' any coldness, as thro' the inability of the states, who found their forces and their finances equally exhausted by the war. The birth of Don Pedro, prince of Brazil, served A. D. 1712. to console both the court and the people in the present perplexed state of their affairs; and the solemnity of his baptism was, according to the custom of the country, celebrated with the utmost magnificence, his Imperial majesty Charles VI. his Portuguese majesty's brother-in-law, and his own sister the infanta, being sponsors. This young prince died about two years after³.
- e It was generally understood at Utrecht, and at the Hague, that in the course of negotiations Treaty of Portugal would take the same steps with England. This judgment was sensibly formed, and peace with was verified in the event; and yet the king of Portugal was in sentiments directly opposite to France. those of the queen of Great Britain, and had expressed this in a letter to that queen. His plenipotentiaries also were men of abilities and spirit, incapable of becoming the creatures, or being made the dupes of France; and yet from their conduct at that time many were of another opinion. Whereas in reality they had no other method to take; for Portugal unsupported was by no means able to dispute with Spain, more especially when governed by a prince of the house of Bourbon, who had reduced all its kingdoms into so many provinces, and, under colour of necessity, had established a kind of military government. Don
- f Juan himself was by no means inclined to the French interest; but many of his nobility, and some of his ministers, who had married French women of quality, were entirely governed by their wives, which was so far from recommending them to favour, that at this very time several of them threatened to quit the court; but the king, by some compliances, prevented what at so critical a season might have been attended with various inconveniencies. The armies were still on the frontiers, and the Spaniards finding a favourable opportunity, surprised Valenza de Alcantara, which might have renewed the war, if the court of Lisbon had been in better circumstances; but, as things then stood, the king thought it adviseable to leave the dispute this had occasioned to be decided by the queen of Great Britain. The peace between Por- tugal and France was signed on the eleventh of April ^a, being the very same day it was signed with Great Britain. By this treaty the prisoners on both sides were to be set at liberty without ransom: whatever privileges or exemptions his Portuguese majesty granted to the French in his dominions, the French king was to grant the like to the Portuguese: the commerce between the two nations was to be put on the same foot as before the war: the French quitted all right and all pretensions to the countries lying about the North Cape, between the rivers of Amazons, and that of Vincent Pynson, acknowledging the crown of Portugal to have the sole property and sovereignty of the south as well as the north shores of the river of Amazons, annulling the treaty concluded with Don Pedro the second, and permitting his Portuguese majesty to restore those forts which that monarch had been obliged to demolish. It is very certain that the Portuguese were very well treated in this negotiation; but it is not easy to say how this was brought about. It was asserted by the English ministers, that they had insisted upon these terms: on the other hand, the plenipotentiaries of the crown of France openly declared, that they were the pure effects of his most christian majesty's generosity. Things, however, remained still open with respect to Spain, and great pretensions were formed by that court with regard to Portugal, which, it was intimated, ought to be settled, before any progress could be made in an affair of so great consequence as a definitive peace. France however promised her good offices, and the court of Lisbon, from a principle of œconomy, reduced their forces to the establishment upon which they stood before the war, and quartered them on their frontiers. At the latter end of the year arrived the fleet from Brazil, with a cargo valued at more than a million and a half sterling, and this, notwithstanding the king's duty at the mines had been stopped to indemnify the people for the loss sustained by the French depredations at Rio Janeiro ^c.

THE perplexity of the cabinet at Lisbon increased daily, from the refractory dispositions of some in the Brazils, from a discontented humour that spread itself amongst the populace, and from some intrigues amongst the nobility. The king, who was a prince of much temper and moderation, dissembled his dislike to things that could not be amended, temporized with the house of Bourbon, and represented to his old allies how much it was their interest to draw him out of so unpleasant a situation; since if they abandoned Portugal, they had no means of giving check to that vast power which they had thrown into the hands of Spain. On the sixth of June the queen was happily delivered of the infant Don Joseph, the present king of Portugal; and the king immediately took this occasion to desire Lewis the fourteenth to be his sponsor, and named an ambassador to his court, and another who in due time was to repair to Madrid. All this time the peace seemed farther off than ever, the court of Spain insisting upon satisfaction for two ships, taken, as they affirmed, before war was declared, which they estimated at several millions: they declined any positive answer as to the demand of the restitution of the new colony which they had taken from the Portuguese, near Buenos Ayres; and they insisted, that the whole estate of the family of Aveiro should be restored to the duke d'Arco, who had married the eldest of that duke's daughters. To give weight to these claims, the court of Madrid augmented their forces on the frontiers, raising magazines, and gave out, that after the reduction of Barcelona, the troops in Catalonia should march into Estremadura. Don Juan persisted in the same steady behaviour; but at the same time, as his last resource, represented to Lewis the fourteenth, that this was not the way to maintain the quiet of Europe: that it was against his interest to delay the general peace; and that events were not in the power of the greatest captains, or the wisest politicians. The French court gave fair words; but it is uncertain what would have followed from them. However, two things fell out before the end of the year, which altered the face of things exceedingly; one was the death of queen Anne; within a week after which the lords justices signified to his majesty of Portugal, that they would oblige the crown of Spain to give a categorical answer, and if this was inconsistent with the original plan of peace, he might depend on speedy and effectual assistance ^e. The other was the arrival of a very rich fleet from Brazil, with the news, that all the ill humour in that country was dissipated by the discovery of a new mine, for working of which those who had been most dissatisfied now bid the highest. King John immediately gave orders for visiting his fortresses, erecting magazines, and levying men, as if he was satisfied the war would break out again, and this had the desired effect. The court of Versailles interposed its influence, and that of Madrid became more tractable every hour; so that there scarce remained a doubt the peace would be signed before the suspension of arms expired. ^f

Peace at length concluded with his catholic majesty at Utrecht.

IN this conduct, however, there was somewhat of artifice, as it was founded on an expectation that Portugal would recede in some of her pretensions, or at least would admit some of the claims insisted on by the court of Madrid. King John proving inflexible, Lewis the

- a fourteenth declared to his minister, that he had employed his good offices with his grandson, without being able to prevail. A declaration of the same kind was made to the court of Great Britain. King John persisted in his steadiness : the Spanish plenipotentiary at the beginning of this year proposed to the Portuguese ministers at Utrecht, to adjust the treaty amongst themselves. When this was done, the court of Versailles was consulted ; and upon an answer coming from thence, a resolution was taken to sign it when the world least expected any such thing : but for some reasons it was thought proper this should be done very secretly, and without any of the ceremonies that usually attend the conclusion of acts of such high importance. The method taken was this ; the plenipotentiaries brought each a copy of the treaty with him, and, under pretence of taking a walk in the Mall, they met, and signed it
- b upon one of the benches on the sixth day of February ^y. There were present only five persons, the duke of Ossuna, the Spanish plenipotentiary, the count de Tarouca, and Don Lewis d'Acunha, the ministers of Portugal, Mr. Zancorra, secretary to the duke, and Mr. de Lima, who stood in the same capacity to the count and Don Lewis. This gentleman had the address in framing the treaty to name his own master first, and to satisfy the Spanish plenipotentiary that it was agreeable to the form ; in which it has been thought that he was a little too cunning for him. However, it established a precedent that Portugal will hardly depart from, and gave the hint to that expedient which was universally admitted at the conclusion of the last general peace. The reason of the secrecy observed in signing was the duke of Ossuna's having sent a courier to Versailles, to desire the solution of some difficulties, who returned a little after midnight with
- c a full approbation of the duke's conduct : so that the transaction was made public the very next day.

By this treaty Portugal was in all respects a gainer. It was agreed, that the limits of the two monarchies should be the same they were before the war, and in consequence of this his catholic majesty consented to restore the castle of Noudar, and its territory, the island of Verdoejo, and the territory and colony of St. Sacrament, renouncing for himself and his heirs all claim and pretensions to them, and annulling the provisional treaty of 1681 ; but with a reservation of a power of offering an equivalent for these places within eighteen months, which, if not accepted, the right was to be absolute in the king of Portugal. His catholic majesty also agreed to pay six hundred thousand crowns by three equal payments, to extinguish all demands d in relation to the Affiento company. He also admitted the three ships belonging to Buenos Ayres, seized at the beginning of the war, to be good prizes. On the other hand, his Portuguese majesty undertook to restore Albuquerque and Puebla in the condition they then were, without demanding any thing for the additional fortifications, artillery, or military stores : he relinquished all the claims and pretensions arising from the Affiento company, renewed the concordat of Don Sebastian for the mutual delivering up of criminals, and the treaties between the two crowns of 1678 and 1701. This treaty was declared to be under the guaranty of Great Britain, and also of all such kings, princes, and republics, as within the space of six months should become and be accepted as guaranties by their majesties. The relation of this event brings us happily to a conclusion of this part of our work.

The History of NAVARRE.

S E C T. I.

Rise of this sovereignty, and the history of its princes to the accession of Sancho the Great.

Obscurity of the ancient history of the kingdom of Sobrarva or Navarre.

WE have already so often mentioned to the reader the great difficulties that occur in ascending to the rise of the several kingdoms in Spain, after the Christians began to rescue that great country out of the hands of the Moors, that he will not be surprised at the repetition of these complaints as to the origin of a sovereignty which the French and Spanish, and even the historians of this country themselves acknowledge the most perplexed and the most obscure of them all^a. He will also remember, that in treating of the kingdom of Aragon, we referred the principal difficulties to the formation of that principality, to this part of our work, where he will have a right to expect we should set them in a proper light, inasmuch as we dissent in opinion from the common current of historians: a step, which, as it ought ever to be taken in order to follow truth, so ought it never to be allowed but where it is supported by reasons, and even by proofs. In respect to the other kingdoms, we have derived some lights to ourselves and to the reader, by explaining the etymology of their names, and by a succinct description of their situation and boundaries; but in reference to the present case, we can draw no assistance from either, the first being so intricate and dubious, that nothing relating to it can be relied on; and there being so much uncertainty and variation in respect to the latter, that to give it the reader here would only serve to mislead and to deceive him.

Several etymologies of the word Navarre, which are altogether vague and uncertain.

As to the name of Navarre, it is of equal or rather earlier antiquity than the sovereignty; but what it means, or whence derived, is very far from being clear. Some say that one of the most conspicuous mountains on the frontiers of this kingdom bears the name of Navaca, from whence Navarre might be formed by corruption^b. The more general notion is, that Nava signifies a plain spot of ground cleared from wood, and that erria, in the ancient Cantabrian language, signified land; and taking these together, the country was first called Nava erria, which was gradually changed into Navarre^c. It is somewhat more certain that Nava signifies in Spanish, but perhaps they borrowed the word from the Moors, a valley with rocks on both sides; and the reader may read the decisive victory gained by the Christians over the Moors at the Nava de Tolosa, which is as much as to say the pass of Tolosa^d. As this country contains many such vallies, or nava's, it is possible the appellation might come from thence. On the other hand, it is just to observe, that the first time the appellation occurs, it is in Latin, and is Navarri^e, and is applied not to the country, but to the people, which makes against all these etymologies, which justifies what we said of them, that they are dubious, and little to the purpose.

Mariana's account of the origin of the principality of Sobrarva or Navarre.

MARIANA tells us, that the inhabitants of the Pyrenees, taking the advantage of their situation, defended themselves against the Moors, but without being subject to any regular form of government, till they were induced to erect a principality by the following extraordinary accident^f. There was a pious hermit, whose name was John, who in these times of distress and desolation retired to the steep mountain of Uruela, in the neighbourhood of the city of Jacca; and upon one of its eminences, built in the best manner he was able, though but meanly, a chapel, which he dedicated to St. John the Baptist. There he remained with four of his disciples; and dying with the odour of sanctity, there resorted incredible multitudes of people to his funeral. Amongst the rest there were no less than six hundred gentlemen; but whether they resorted thither purely by chance, or that this meeting was concerted by some of the most distinguished amongst them, so it was that they took occasion to discourse together on the miseries to which their country was exposed, the rage and cruelty of the Moors; the glory that would result from throwing off their yoke; the natural strength of a the adjacent country ; its vicinity to France, from whence they might hope support ; and the example given them by their neighbours in the Asturias, who had proclaimed and supported Don Pelagio against the whole force of the Infidels. After mature deliberation, they unanimously elected Don Garcia Ximenes for their chief. It does not appear that he was of royal descent, or so much as of the blood of the Goths ; but rather judged to be descended of the ancient Spaniards : however, he was a person of great distinction, being lord of Amescua and Abarfusa, in that neighbourhood ; and he had espoused Donna Iniga, who was also of an illustrious race. It is not agreed whether he was properly king of Sobrarva or Navarre ; but he recovered Ainsa, which is the principal place in the first-mentioned country, out of the hands of the Infidels, and built a noble church where the chapel of St. Juan de la Penna had stood, and appointed it to be the burial-place of himself and his successors. A custom very frequent in this and many succeeding ages. A. D. 758.

On the demise of this prince succeeded his son Don Garcia Inigas, equally distinguished by his valour and his talents for government. He extended his territories as far as the country of Biscay, or at least made himself master of Alava. Under his reign Aznar, the son of Eudes the Great, took from the Moors some places near the river Arga, to which Don Garcia gave the title of a county, and received homage from him as the first earl of Arragon. He was succeeded by his son of the same name, who left his county to Don Galindo, by whom it was transmitted to his son Don Ximenes Aznar. Don Garcia Inigas, at his demise, left his dominions to Don Fortune Garcia his son, a prince highly celebrated for his valour and his virtues. He was present in the famous battle of Roncevaux, in which the emperor Charlemagne was defeated ; and in which Don Ximenes Aznar, count of Arragon, lost his life, whose sister Theuda was married to the king Don Fortune. He had by her Don Sancho Garcia, who conquered the country now known by the name of Navarre, and fixed his residence at Pampeluna. He is reported to have been slain in battle against the famous Moor Muza, and to have been succeeded by his son Don Ximenes Garcia, who with his wife Donna Munia lies interred in the monastery of St. Salvador de Leira, in whom the royal family became extinct ; and an interregnum ensued, during which that famous code was made, which is intitled Los Fueros de Sobrarva, or the laws of Sobrarva, from whence all the boasted privileges and immunities of the people of Arragon were derived. 802.

d At the time the Moors subdued Spain, it is evident from the concurrence of the historians of all nations, that they pushed their victories to the utmost limits of the monarchy of the Goths ; and not satisfied with reducing the whole continent of Spain, laboured to seize so much of Gaul as had been in their possession^e. This brought them to have some dispute with Eudes, duke of Aquitaine, who defeated Zama, one of their generals, before the city of Tboulouse, and cut him off in his flight^b. In order to strengthen himself more effectually, not only against these barbarous enemies, but also against Charles Martel, who then governed the French monarchy, he gave his daughter in marriage to Munnuz, a Moorish general, who had revolted in *Catalonia*¹. Abderamen, who had then the supreme direction of the affairs of the Moors in Spain, marched with a prodigious army to reduce him, to punish the duke of Aquitaine, and to penetrate into the more fertile provinces of France. The two first parts of his design he executed, taking Munnuz whom he put to death, and ravaging and destroying the dominions of the duke of Aquitaine ; but advancing imprudently with his numerous army into the neighbourhood of Poitiers, he was attacked by the French, under the command of Charles Martel in front, and when the battle was at the height, by Eudes duke of Aquitaine in rear, which brought on one of the most signal and total defeats of which there is any mention in history^k. This broke the power of the Saracens, and in all human probability saved Christendom. Pepin, the son of Charles Martel, recovered Narbonne, and compelled Suleyman, who held Barcelona, Gironne, and the best part of Catalonia, to become his vassal^l. The defeat given the Saracens at Poitiers opens a passage for the French into Spain. 721.

e f On the accession of Charlemagne, some of the Moorish governors, who were desirous of shaking off the yoke of the miramamolin, sought his assistance, and offered him their homage. Amongst the chief of these was Eben-al-Gabra, lord of Saragossa, who, having given him his son as an hostage, pressed him to enter Spain, which he did with two great armies, one passing through Catalonia, and the other, which he commanded in Spain, through Navarre, where he took Pampeluna, and pushed his conquests as far as the Ebro. In his return, however, after demolishing Pampeluna, he met with a very severe check in the valley of Roncevaux, where he lost some of his best officers, and a great part of his army, and all his baggage ; but, however, he wisely continued his retreat ; neither did this misfortune deprive him of the places he had occupied on the march or frontier of Spain^m. In order to understand this matter clearly, we Charlemagne enters into and recovers part of this country from the Infidels. 778.

must consider the several nations by whom the chain of the Pyrenees, and the countries at the foot of them on both sides, were occupied. These were the Moors, who held some fortified places, as conquerors in right of arms; the Goths, who had retired into the inaccessible mountains, in hopes of enjoying freedom and their religion; and a third people, who were the Vascons, Bascons, Basques or Gascons, for it is all but one name and one nation^a. If there is any distinction to be made, those on the Spanish side of the mountains are usually stiled Vascons, and that of Gascons belongs to those on the French side. They were an active, martial, fickle, turbulent, and cunning people, who availed themselves of their situation, took that part by which they could get most, and left it when they could get no longer. These were the people who defeated Charlemagne, and who, in point of numbers and power, exceeded both the Goths and the Moors; that is to say, in this country of theirs, which tho' ill governed was well peopled.

Navarre at this juncture belonged to him, and to several of his successors.

CHARLEMAGNE having given Aquitaine, with the conquests on the side of Spain, to his son Lewis, with the title of king, he turned his arms against the Infidels; and having made a successful expedition into Catalonia, passed from thence into Arragon, and returned thro' Navarre into France. At this time he recovered Pampeluna, which was again fallen into the hands of the Moors; and in the history of this expedition we first meet with the word Navarre^b. After these conquests he established, according to the mode of the times, and of the Gallic government, counts in all the considerable places which he reduced, and which, the reader will please to observe, comprehended the new kingdom, and its dependent county, which the Spanish historian has described, wherever situated or however bounded; and as we have the histories of those times written by some who lived in them, we must have had some notice or hint at least of these princes, if there had been any such^c. About eighteen years after this, under the reign of the emperor Lewis le Debonnaire, a French army, commanded by two counts, was sent to drive the Moors out of Navarre, which they performed, and having secured Pampeluna, marched back into France; but the monarch of Cordova having the Vascons, or Gascons, in his interest, they attacked, and totally defeated them in their passage, taking both the counts prisoners. One of them, whose name was Ebba, they sent to the king of Cordova, and the other, whose name was Aznar, they set at liberty, because he was their countryman^d.

Aznar revolts from king Pepin, and establishes himself amongst the Spanish Vascons.

THE emperor Lewis having given Aquitaine, with the title of king, to his son Pepin, that prince some way or other disoblged this count Aznar, who withdrawing from the French, retired amongst the Spanish Vascons, and in the country of Sobrarva, by the assistance of his relations and dependents, excited a revolt; and here in reality commenced that sovereignty, of which we have undertaken to give an account: but in what manner this revolt was carried on, or to what extent he carried it, does not appear, the brevity with which things are mentioned in ancient chronicles not permitting us to expect, and the laws of history forbidding us to invent any circumstances^e. However, from this deduction the reader cannot but discern, that what has been before reported of the ancient kingdoms of Sobrarva and Pampeluna, are mere fictions, at least in the manner in which we have seen them related; for during the period in which those principalities are supposed to have existed, we have shewn that these countries belonged sometimes to the French, sometimes to the Moors, but never to any independent sovereign great or little. We have likewise made it evident, that this principality did not spring, as that of Asturias did, from the valour of the Goths; neither was it erected, properly speaking, at the expence of the Moors, but by throwing off the yoke of France. It must, however, be admitted, that the most authentic histories of the kingdoms of Oviedo and Leon assert^f, that their monarchs were sometimes masters of Alava, Biscay, and part of Navarre; nay, and even of the city of Pampeluna, which may be, and, as we have shewn elsewhere, probably is true; but then this is so far from confirming, that it is a farther proof of the impossibility of the foregoing relation, since there is not the least mention in those histories of these kings of Sobrarva, or counts of Arragon; but the expeditions of the French, and the efforts of the Moors, are recorded there; and therefore all that we have related is as consistent and as well attested as can be expected, considering the great obscurity of these times, and the short and unpolished method in which their chronicles were written.

The reign of count Aznar.

COUNT Aznar, by his revolt from Pepin king of Aquitaine, gave beginning to this sovereignty^g; which is a fact naked indeed of circumstances, but not destitute of proof. We know little of those times, and amongst the little we know is this, that count Aznar retired with the Gascons, who would follow him out of the more accessible vallies on the side of France, into the almost impenetrable mountains on the frontiers of Spain; where he provided in the best manner he could for the subsistence of his people in a wild and barren country, and

- a for their safety against the Moors on one side, and several Christian princes on the other, none of whom had any reason to consider either him or them in a very advantageous light. The disturbances that happened in the imperial family hindered Pepin king of Aquitaine from pursuing this rebel, though it is not altogether certain that he continued such during his life: it is more probable, that he either compromised his quarrel with him, or that he was received into his friendship as an ally, since he is thought to have lost his life in the quarrel that ensued upon the emperor's bestowing the dominions which his son Pepin had enjoyed upon his other son Charles, to the prejudice of the children of Pepin^u, whose part was taken by the lords of Aquitaine, and even by this count Aznar, who, though he revolted from their father, died in the field in their cause and his own; being sensible that whoever was strong enough to spoil them of their patrimony, would never allow him to possess, in the manner he desired to possess it, the little country he held, where or whatsoever it might be. A. D. 837.

Don Sancho, the brother of the deceased, succeeded him in his small estates, and governed them according to his maxims, paying sometimes great respect to Pepin the second, and at others affecting to acknowledge no superior. He extended his territories in such a manner as to join part of Arragon and Navarre to Sobrarva; and he also treated with the princes his neighbours so as to live with them on tolerable terms^w. He had likewise some transactions with Charles the Bald, to whom he sometimes gave fair words, and acknowledged him in general terms for his prince; but this was with a design to have recourse to his protection, in case Ordogno king of Asturias should form any pretensions to his prejudice; for that prince having reduced the Gascons in the province of Alava, was suspected of a design to carry his arms farther, against which count Sancho took the best measures he was able. We have it not in our power to speak with any certainty of the extent of his territories, or the place of his residence, the few contemporary writers we have being content to report, that the people of Navarre were at this time Christians, and were governed by a prince whose name was Don Sancho. He died at a very critical juncture, and left his principality, then in great danger of being overwhelmed by the power of Charles the Bald, to his son, who was either wise or fortunate enough to avail himself of that very danger to shake off all dependence^x, and become truly a prince.

Don Garcia, at his entrance on the government, found all the sovereignties about him in the utmost confusion. Muza, governor of Saragossa, who is generally reputed to have been a Christian and a Goth by birth, but who had raised himself to the highest honours by the display of his military virtues amongst the Moors, understanding that his old master was dead, revolted from the new king of Cordova. Charles the Bald, having shut up the sons of Pepin in a monastery, gave the kingdom of Aquitaine to his son; which disobliged many of his subjects, and none so much as the Gascons. Upon this many of their little chiefs resorted to Don Garcia, to take his advice, and to demand his protection. He received them kindly, and denied them neither. He told them, that brave men in a country strong by situation might be always free, and gave them broad hints, that in a situation like theirs submission must be necessarily attended with slavery at least, if not extirpation. This induced them to fix under his government for their own security, and rendered him much more formidable than his predecessors. In order to strengthen himself still more, and that he might have nothing to fear from that side on which his dominions lay most open, he thought fit, perhaps with the advice of those chiefs who had lately submitted to his authority, to espouse the daughter of Muza, whose revolt had been attended with such success that he assumed the title of king, by which, as a royal author^y observes, there were now three monarchs in Spain; that is, Ordogno king of Oviedo, Mohammed king of Cordova, and this new king Muza, which is as clear and decisive a proof as can well be desired, that hitherto there was no king of Sobrarva, Pampeluna, or Navarre; so that all Mariana and other writers have published on this head must pass for fable and fiction, as far as it regards royalty at least; for that there might be some degree of truth hid under the stories they have related, we pretend not to deny, and how much this truth may amount to, we have been labouring to point out chiefly from facts, and from deductions founded on them where facts failed.

This prince of the Gascons, who was in truth a great politician, was also very brave; but as his prudence did not go so far as to make him afraid of war when it was necessary, so his martial spirit never suggested to him disturbing his neighbours purely to enlarge his dominions. He thought it more suitable to his circumstances to bring what he had acquired into regular order, and a good condition: with which view he began to erect some fortresses, and to enlarge the towns within the compass of this little principality. The same conduct he pursued, he recommended also to Muza, who, that he might carry on the war against the king of Cordova with greater vigour, resolved to fortify the town of Albayda, that it might cover his country from the incursions of the Christians of Asturias. The king Don Ordogno taking a umbrage at this, and being apprehensive that, when his affairs should be in better order, the king of Saragossa might from thence make irruptions into his territories, assembled an army, and laid siege to Albayda as soon, or perhaps before its fortifications were finished. This obliged Muza to march to its relief and his son-in-law Don Garcia made no scruple of joining him with a body of auxiliaries. They encamped upon a mountain not far distant from the place, in hopes perhaps that this might induce Don Ordogno to raise the siege. But that monarch, who had a great confidence in the valour of his troops, resolved, notwithstanding the strength of their camp, to attack them without delay; which he performed with so much vigour that the Moors were quickly broke, and Muza having received three dangerous wounds, made his escape on a horse given him by one of Don Ordogno's officers out of personal friendship. But Don Garcia having either advanced too far, or disdaining to save his life by a retreat, was killed upon the spot, to the great grief of his subjects², who with great reason revered the virtue and valour by which he established so regular and powerful a principality.

Don Garcia
first king of Navarre.

Don Garcia Iniguez, as he is called by some, or Don Garcia Ximenes, as he is styled by others, succeeded his father, and either at his accession, or within three years after, assumed the title of king, as appears by authentic charters, and was, properly speaking, the first monarch of Navarre. There our history falls in, at least in some measure, with that of Mariana, who after the interregnum, in which, he assures us, the famous body of laws were made, affirms, that Inigo Arista, count of Bigorre, was unanimously chosen by the nobility for their monarch, leaving the old title of Sobrarva, assumed that of king of Pampeluna or Navarre, which he transmitted to Don Garcia Ximenes his son². We differ from him for want of seeing his authorities, and in respect to those which we have cited; but we agree entirely in the character he gives to this young prince, who was equally distinguished by his courage and conduct; who enlarged his territories by the one, and by the other rendered his people happy. He governed them twenty-three years with great reputation, and is said to have married Donna Urraca, the sister, daughter, or niece to a count of Arragon, for authors do not well distinguish which. That there were many chiefs in his country who assumed the title of lords, or something equivalent to it, is certain, and that one of these might be in possession of the county of Arragon is more than probable, since there is mention of such a person in a charter of this prince, who therein styles himself king of Pampeluna, and the name of the count Arragon there mentioned is Galindo^b. This monarch, Don Garcia Ximenes, founded the monastery of St. Salvador de Leyra in the Pyrenees, which, by the bounty of his successors, was rendered very rich and famous. The archbishop Don Roderic of Toledo, who was himself a native of Navarre, commends the valour of this monarch highly, and asserts, that having gained many victories over the Moors, he was at length slain by them in battle; which, however, is not very certain, or consistent with the authentic histories that remain of those times^c. At the time of his demise he left two sons, Don Fortune Ximenes, and Don Sancho, who had afterwards, as some say, the surname of Abarca, as also a daughter Donna Sancha.

Don Fortune
Garcias.

Don Fortune Garcias, the eldest of his sons, succeeded his father, which, however, is doubtfully reported by Mariana. This great historian seems at length to have perceived, that Don Garcia Iniguez, or Ximenes, was the first king of Navarre; for after his account of him, he adds, so obscure is the origin of this kingdom. He makes his successor Don Sancho Abarca; but suspicious of the guides he followed in this respect, he breaks out into a warm invective against those who introduced fiction amongst facts, and by interlarding fables have given us romance instead of history^d. The reader will see he met with sufficient provocation in the notes (A). But to return to Don Fortune Garcias, he governed his dominions many years

(A) We have observed in the text what strange confusion there is in respect to these ancient reigns; in our account of which we differ entirely from Mariana, who bestows the surname of Abarca upon Don Sancho, the brother of Don Fortune Garcias, and the son of Don Garcias Ximenes; and this leads him to insert the following relation concerning what passed at his birth, and in his infancy (1). It is true that he takes it from ancient writers, and that he speaks of it with the contempt it deserves; and the reason we transcribe it is, that this rare instance may justify our manifold omissions, and render the reader thankful for not having his memory burdened with many more of these strange tales. "At the time the king Don Garcia was slain in the cause of the Moors, his consort Donna Urraca, who had accompanied, fell with him likewise. A generous a years both wisely and worthily, as we gather from effects, and from the high character given him in the old chronicles of this nation. He was a great benefactor to the monastery of St. Salvador de Leyra, upon which he bestowed large possessions. In this charter he not only assumes the regal stile himself, but adds, that he was the son of the king Don Garcias. About four years after this he thought fit to retire into this monastery, which accordingly he did; and having sent for his brother, he first gave him his blessing in a solemn manner, and then placed the crown upon his head. He spent the remainder of his days in that monastery in great tranquillity. In those days perhaps this might not be an act of weakness or superstition. What little learning there was the monks possessed, and were consequently of great use in the regulation of these little kingdoms, the laws of which manifestly prove they were made by men of sense, and lovers of liberty. They found means to connect this not only with a martial spirit, but a martial government; and as in those days it was absolutely necessary that princes should be very active, and command for the most part their armies in person, so when age or infirmities rendered them unfit for this, it was really an act of prudence, and a testimony of public spirit, to retire, as this monarch did, after a glorious reign of twenty-five years, that the government might avail itself of the abilities of his brother: who was in the flower of his age, and consequently fit to defend and enlarge his dominions by feats of arms against the Moors. Neither is it at all improbable that he might from time to time have recourse to his brother for advice; so that the state had a double advantage, from the wisdom of the one, and the prowess of the other. As these remarks are founded on facts, and as they serve very much to illustrate the history, the reader will not be displeased to find them here, or be unwilling to extend them farther than it would be proper for us to do in this place.

Don Sancho Garcias, thus seated on the throne by the resignation of his brother, found himself quickly called upon to deliver his countrymen the Gascons on the other side of the mountains, who being attacked by the Normans, solicited his assistance. He marched accordingly through the passes of the Pyrenees; and having accomplished all they could desire, disposed every thing for his return. But Aben Lop, governor of Saragossa, and vassal to Abdallah king of Cordova, judging this a favourable opportunity to fall upon the people of Navarre, when their king and the best part of his forces were absent, and at such a distance as seemed to render it impracticable for them to return time enough to give any disturbance to his plan, communicated it to Abdallah, and having received a numerous reinforcement, marched with the whole force of the Moors at the entrance of winter, and invested Pampeluna. The inhabitants were but in a very indifferent condition to sustain a siege, and the Moors pressed the place with all possible vigour. Don Sancho, informed of the distress of his subjects, immediately began his march for the Pyrenees, but found the frost so set in, and the rocky passages so very slippery, that his men were able to make no progress. In this unfortunate situation he ordered the greatest part of the animals of all sorts belonging to the army to be killed, and directed his soldiers to tie pieces of their skins with packthread about their feet, with the hair next them, by which they were enabled to get over those precipices which obstructed their march. As this kind of shoe, still in use amongst the peasants, is called in the language of the country Abarca, so many have thought he received that surname from being the inventor. The reader, however, will see that this is not quite so certain, and that those who give him this surname, confound him with another prince. However that matter may be, it is out of dispute, that, arriving unexpectedly, he attacked the Infidels with such spirit and success, that he

But it happens unluckily that this was not the Sancho that had this surname, but his grandson (3). It is by giving credit to these old authors, who, to cover their ignorance, made no scruple of exerting their invention, that this great historian, and those who follow him, introduced so many impertinent improbabilities, which it is a pain to read, and at the same time impossible to believe (4).

His glorious reign and

THE very next year Don Sancho Garcias attacked the castle of St. Stephen, which the Moors had fortified to the utmost of their skill, and into which they had put a strong garrison, and after an obstinate defence, reduced it. This success encouraged Don Sancho to prosecute the war, and to sweep all the fortresses along the river Ebro, which he performed as far as Milagro. He afterwards passed that river, reduced Najera, and the fortress called Bilibio, since better known to the world by the name of the castle of Haro. This inspired him with the hopes of driving the Moors out of the whole province of Rioja; which, having reduced Logroño, Alcandra, Calaborra, and Tudela, he happily effected^l. The war carried on by Don Ordogno, king of Leon, being very favourable to his designs, he pushed his conquests still farther, and having reduced Terrazona and Agreda, extended his dominions as far as the sources of the river Duero. But being well apprised that conquests were of little value that were not well secured, he not only applied himself with diligence to repair such as might be most serviceable to him, but also gave directions for fortifying Pampeluna so regularly and so effectually, that he rendered it in the estimation of those times a place impregnable. He next cleared all the country between the rivers Arragon and Ebro from the Infidels, and projected some other expeditions of still greater importance; but finding his health much impaired by the fatigues he had already undergone, he retired to the monastery of Leyria^m, and placed his son Don Garcia at the head of the army; but without resigning to him the crown, as either hoping to recover his health, or esteeming him as yet too young.

THE Moorish governor of Saragossa applied himself to Abderamen the fourth king of Cordova, in order to obtain such a supply of forces as might enable him to restrain the Christians of Navarre within their ancient bounds. His project was so plausible in itself, and supported by so many arguments, that the Moorish monarch approved, and resolved to carry it into execution: in order to which he drew over great numbers of men from Barbary, and having joined these with the whole force of his dominions, sent them under the command of an experienced general to the general rendezvous appointed by the governor of Saragossa, in the neighbourhood of Agreda, of which place, together with Terrazona, Tudela, Logroño, Vigueira, and Najera, they soon became masters; after which they entered the kingdom of Navarre by the way of Viana and Estella. The king Don Sancho came out of his monastery, and assembled a considerable body of troops that were to be employed as a corps de reserve, while the infant Don Garcia, with the army of Navarre, retired into Alava, where he expected Don Ordogno king of Leon. The junction being made, the Christian army under these two princes advanced towards the Moors, who gave them battle at Val-de-Funguera, near Salinas d'Oro, where, after a warm and obstinate engagement, the Christians were totally defeatedⁿ. After the battle Don Ordogno retired into his own territories, and the infant Don Garcia towards Pampeluna. As the whole force of the Christians in Spain was in a great measure broke by this unfortunate action, one would naturally imagine that it must in its consequences have been extremely fatal to them, and advantageous to the Moors; but the very reverse happened. The general of the Moors, seeing the country open before him, destroyed it in a cruel manner with fire and sword; and then penetrating through the passes of the Pyrenees, made an irruption into France, where his forces advanced almost as far as Toulouse, and acquired an immense booty. While he was thus employed, the king of Leon, having recruited and augmented his army, made a bold expedition into the Moorish territories, and wasted them without mercy. The king of Navarre, on the other side, marched with his corps de reserve, and possessed himself of the passes, that he might reckon with the Moors at their return. The greatest part of their army, commanded by their general in person, took the road of Rontel; where, after being harrassed for several days, they were at length totally broken and dispersed, and their general stabbed by a woman; so that none of them escaped, and all their booty fell into the hands of the Christians. The other corps repassed the Pyrenees by the same way they entered them, and without much opposition; but Don Sancho pursuing them, prevented their passing the Ebro, and attacked them with such fury that very few of them returned home^o. About this time Don Sancho is reported to have recovered his health in a miraculous manner by the interposition of St. Peter^p; and in conjunction with his son, and by the assistance of his good ally the king of Leon, retrieved all the places he had lost, and remained in full possession of what is now stiled the Upper Navarre (B). (B) The design of this note is to describe the kingdom of Navarre in as succinct a manner as possible. Its form is what the mathematicians call a trapezium, or, to use a more common word, a lozenge. The upper point, regarding the north; the Pyrenean mountains lie on the east, and the country of Biscay on the west; the a unite more closely the interests of Leon and Navarre, a marriage was concluded between Don Ordogno, and the infanta Donna Sancha; but who this princess was admits of some doubt: most writers make her the sister, others the daughter of Don Sancho; but Ferreras^a inclines to think she was the daughter of the infant Don Garcia, for otherwise she must have been advanced in years, which is not very probable. Neither of the kings survived this match long, the former dying immediately on his return home, and Don Sancho much about the same time in the monastery of Leyra, full of years, and covered with glory. Mariana indeed says he was killed in battle by Don Ferdinand Gonzalez, count of Castile; and in this he has been followed by the bulk of modern historians; but the error has been learnedly refuted by the judicious father Moret^r, who has done more towards the recovery of this history than all the writers who went before him.

the southern point, terminating on the frontiers of Aragon, has that kingdom on the east, and part of the same country and Old Castile on the west. Each of its sides, for they are nearly equal, extends about ninety English miles (5). The climate is as pure and healthy, and withal as temperate and as pleasant as can be desired, which may compensate for some defects in the soil, that, generally speaking, is none of the most fertile. In some of the vallies, however, they have very good corn, excellent wine, both white and red; the former equal to any in France, the latter very little inferior to Burgundy. It abounds in good pastures, exceedingly well stocked with sheep and goats. They have likewise a tolerable breed of black cattle, and a very good one of horses. The mountains are covered with timber; and very few countries have venison and wild fowl in greater plenty. The inhabitants are taller, have better complexions, and are more robust than the Spaniards; as active and as martial, but not so capricious or so volatile as the French; and though not comparable in point of size, yet it is equal in its number of people to any of the Spanish kingdoms. It can scarce boast of any great river except the Ebro, and this serves only for its frontier. The Aragon, the Arga, and the Ega, water some of its towns; but would scarce deserve to be mentioned if this country had any better (6). This kingdom was anciently divided into six provinces, or, as they stile them in their own language, merindades. The first of these is that of Pampeluna. On the east, towards the kingdom of Aragon, lies the merindad of Sanguessa, which comprehends a city, twelve large towns, and one hundred and sixty-eight villages. Sanguessa, which is the capital, and was anciently Iturissa, stands on the river Aragon, and was heretofore a place of strength and beauty. It is somewhat more than twenty miles from Pampeluna, and was looked upon as the key of Navarre on that side; at a small distance, on the north-east, stands the famous old monastery of St. Salvador de Leyra, to which the bishops of Pampeluna retired while that place was in the hands of the Moors. The merindad of Olita lies in the heart of the country. It contains one city, nineteen large towns, and twenty-six villages. Olita, the capital, received the title of a city from Philip the fourth, in 1630. It is a well-built pleasant place; and the remains of the palace, built by Don Carlos the third, and in his days the finest in all Spain, are yet visible. The country about it is the very best of Navarre, abounding in corn, vines, fruit of all sorts, such as apples, pears, plumbs. It produces also flax and hemp; and being well watered by several little streams, there are excellent pastures covered with sheep. The merindad of Tudela, which lies on the right of the river Ebro, contains two cities, and twenty-two large towns. The city of Tudela is rather larger and better built than that of Pampeluna; but as it lies on the frontiers of Navarre, Castile, and Aragon, it labours under the imputation of giving shelter to assassins and banditti, who retire thither to escape the hands of justice; Puente de la Rina, which lies on the Arga, is famous for its red wine, as Peralta, which is six leagues from Tudela, is for its white wine, which is stronger and better flavoured than the Vin de St. Laurent, so much esteemed in France. The merindad of Estella is on the frontiers of Biscay, and comprehends one city, twenty-four towns, and one hundred and six villages. The town of Estella stands on the Ega, in the midst of an agreeable plain, and had formerly a well fortified castle. Within this district lies the city of Viana, over against Logroño, on the river Ebro, which formerly gave the title of prince to the heir-apparent of Navarre. The sixth merindad, is that which is now called the Lower Navarre, and belongs to France (7). The north-east side of this kingdom is bounded by the Pyrenean mountains, which boundary is two and twenty leagues in length. Through these mountains there are ten passes into France, seven or eight of which are dreadful, difficult, and dangerous. To the north of Pampeluna there is the valley of Baztan, which runs from north to south, and is seven leagues long, and three and a half broad, containing fourteen parishes. Their habits are of a very ancient mode, particularly the women's. The men are all bold, nimble, and dextrous in the handling of their arms, and are all gentlemen by their blood. The valley of Roncevaux lies to the north-east of Pampeluna, and carries you through a village called Burguet, which is the last in Navarre to St. Juan Pie de Port, in the Basse Navarre. This is the easiest and most frequented pass, and is famous for the defeat of the emperor Charlemagne. In the church of Roncevaux, which is an hundred paces beyond Burguet, they shew you two clubs covered with iron, which were taken in the battle of Roncevaux, and one of the stirrups of Orlando the great champion of France, and the slippers of Turpin the historian and archbishop of Paris, who accompanied the emperor in that expedition. The battle is painted upon the wall; and not far from the church is Turpin's tomb, and those of several of the French champions that fell there (8). Thro' the valley of Roncal, which is still more to the east, is another of the passes into France; and this valley is remarkable for the defeat of Abderamen, king of Cordova, upon his return from France through that pass. The extreme parts of this valley, towards the north, are the boundaries between Spain and France, on that side the principality of Bearn, being the next country adjoining, with the borders of which province these of Roncal having had many conflicts and disputes about certain rights and privileges, it was at length agreed that the inhabitants of the mountains, on the side of Bearn, should submit to be feudatory to those of Roncal (9). A noble instance of the martial, independent, and heroic spirit of these people.

Don Garcia Sanchez succeeded his father in the flower of his age, and when his reputation for courage and conduct was fully established. He saw the Moors much embarrassed by foreign wars, and factions amongst themselves: he laid hold therefore of this opportunity not to extend, but to strengthen his dominions, and to put every thing into the best order possible. With this view he repaired some towns, and built others: he fortified several places on his frontiers, and appointed officers of great experience to command in several provinces; and amongst these was Don Fortune Ximenes, count of Arragon: at whose request he visited, and granted many favours to the monastery of St. Juan de la Pegna^a. He supported his near relation Don Sancho against his brother the king of Leon; and for that purpose entered into a close friendship with Don Ferdinand Gonzalez, count of Castile. Afterwards when Don Sancho, upon the death of his brother, succeeded to the kingdom of Leon, and was driven out by his rebellious subjects, with the assistance of his old ally the count of Castile, Don Garcia received him with open arms, sent him to Cordova to be cured of the dropsy, and in conjunction with that Moorish monarch restored him very honourably to his dominions^b. The method concerted between the two monarchs required that Don Garcia should advance into the territories of Castile, in order to hinder the count from assisting his son-in-law, while Don Sancho, with his Moorish auxiliaries, entered his own dominions. The count Don Ferdinand Gonzalez of Castile, the most active, and the most ambitious man of his time, was so much piqued by seeing the king of Navarre at the head of his forces in his territories, that he marched with an army to give him battle, though he was sensible that Don Ordogno could not bring troops enough into the field to look his enemy in the face, and himself had married Donna Urraca, sister to the king of Navarre, through whose mediation peace might have been easily restored^c. His impetuosity brought on an action near a place now called Ciruena, where his army being defeated, he was himself taken prisoner, and carried to Pampeluna. There Don Garcia entertained him as a brother-in-law; but that Don Sancho might have time to establish himself in his kingdom of Leon, he protracted things as much as he could; and when there was no farther danger of the count's embroiling matters any more, he very nobly set him at liberty, without exacting from him any thing more than that for the future he should let his neighbours be quiet; which was a strain of disinterestedness not very common in those times^d.

death.*

THE remaining part of the reign of Don Garcia, who lived to a very advanced age, was spent in cultivating the arts of peace, in the improvement of the territories that had descended to him, and in fortifying those which he had acquired. The accounts that are given by Mariana and the historians who have followed him, are so confused, so indistinct, and so ill supported, that it would be giving the reader a great deal of needless trouble to produce, and to refute their errors; and from doing this we could derive no merit, since all we have to say must be derived from those learned and judicious authors, who, with wonderful sagacity and incredible diligence, waded through all these perplexities, and ranged the few facts regarding the history of this country in a proper method. The corpse of Don Garcia was deposited in the church of St. Stephen, with those of his ancestors, where the simplicity of the inscriptions, and the frequent repetition of the same name, has been one great source of that obscurity which has been so loudly and so justly regretted in most of the writers who have meddled with this subject^e.

Don Sancho Abarca succeeded his father, with abilities suitable to his rank, and to that juncture of affairs in which he was called to the government. He had not long enjoyed the sovereignty before the Moors invaded the dominions of count Garcia Fernandez, and threatened the reduction of Castile. The count immediately addressed himself to the kings of Leon and Navarre for assistance, tho' they were then in amity with the Moors, for which reason the former refused it; but Don Sancho, who thought the unjust invasion of his neighbour an indirect breach of the peace with himself, marched with a great body of forces into Castile; and having joined the count Don Garcia, advanced towards the Moors, attacked and defeated them with great slaughter^f. This exceedingly provoked Mohammed Abenamir Almanzor, alhagib or vizir to the king of Cordova, who brought the next year a vast army into the field, with which he over-run great part of Castile, which induced Don Sancho of Navarre to strengthen his frontiers, and to content himself with sending a smaller body of troops to the assistance of his cousin count Garcia. This war continued for many years, and was one of the most unfortunate in which the Christians were ever engaged. Almanzor was so great an enemy to all the disciples of the gospel, that, provided it promoted their destruction, it was indifferent to him on which side he turned his arms^g. The frontiers of Castile he turned into a desert; the city of Leon he took, and, after putting the inhabitants to death, burnt it to the ground. He used no less cruelty in Catalonia, where he also sacked and destroyed Barcelona. These a facts are mentioned to shew the genius of this conqueror, and the motives Don Sancho had to embark in this war.

At length, having opened the passages into Navarre, he advanced with a numerous and victorious army towards Pampeluna, which he invested. This expedition he undertook from His reign and death. two motives: the first was to restore Don Vela to his county of Alava, on whose behalf this war was said to be made; and the other was reducing the last and strongest place in Spain, which he flattered himself would quite dispirit the Christians, and prevent all future and further resistance. But Don Sancho Abarca, who had considered the situation he was in very attentively, had provided his capital in all respects so well, and placed therein so good a garrison, that the Moors found themselves opposed in such a manner, as created infinite trouble, and a great expence of blood. At length, when their vigour was abated, Don Sancho advanced with his army, and gave them battle with such success, that he gained a great advantage over them, and prosecuted it with such vigilance, that they were constrained to quit his dominions^a. There are many victories of greater éclat, but few of more importance, recorded by the Spanish historians, since it gave the first check to the most fortunate of the Moorish captains, and who, from a principle of false piety, prosecuted the total destruction of the Christians with indefatigable industry. The calamities that had fallen on their respective dominions having taught the Christian princes their true interest, the kings of Leon and Navarre entered into a close alliance with Don Garcia, count of Castile, which quickly brought things into better order, and gave them besides a probable expectation of future success, which, however, did not fall out, till Don Sancho Abarca was in his grave. He deceased after a reign of twenty-four years, and was interred with his ancestors in the church of St. Stephen^b, after adding to the security of his dominions by fortifying several places. A. D. 990. 994.

He was succeeded in his dominions by his son Don Garcia Sanchez, surnamed the Trembler, which some say was occasioned by his shaking violently when he entered into action; not thro' fear, but from a kind of tumult in his mind, which, however, quickly subsided when the engagement grew more warm. Some charters there are of this prince, in which mention is made of his brother Don Ramiro, who in them is stiled king of Arragon; and of their mother Donna Urraca: and in other charters we read of another brother, Don Gonzalo, called likewise king of Arragon; but as Mariana well observes, the authority of these pieces is scarce sufficient to establish these facts as certain, more especially as the historians and ancient chronicles have preserved nothing concerning these princes^c. It is, however, not at all improbable, that in those days such young princes were intrusted with the government of provinces; and on the score of their high birth might assume some title superior to that of count; and as we have no distinct relations of the manners of those times, it may be that we consider as marks of possession what in reality were only phrases of compliment. However this might be, there is nothing more certain than that Arragon made a part of Don Garcia's dominions; in defence of which he acted vigorously against the Moors, from the very time he ascended the throne. This kind of war, however, appeared in process of time injurious to the honour and to the interests of all the Christian princes concerned; who therefore entered into a closer alliance, by which they engaged to act jointly, and with their whole force, against the common enemy, which ever of the confederates he should next attack, and this the rather, because some advantages gained by the Moors had drawn over many adventurers from Africa, who flattered themselves with the hopes of having settlements assigned them in the new conquests, which, if ever they attained, it was not at all difficult to foresee that the Christians might be quickly reduced to as bad or worse circumstances than those from which their ancestors had emerged by their valour^d. A resolution founded in good sense, and which came in time to stem this torrent that had been hitherto irresistible.

MOHAMMED-ABENAMIR-ALMANÇOR advanced with a potent army, after sacking and destroying Compostella, into the territories of the count of Castile, as far as Osma, where he was length beat. met by the Christian army, which was not only composed of the troops, but commanded by all the three princes in person. Don Bermudo, king of Leon, being disabled by the gout from mounting on horseback, was placed in a chair at the head of his own guards. Don Garcia, at the head of the forces of Navarre and Arragon, was in the other wing, and the count of Castile in the center. The battle lasted, as we have shewn elsewhere, till night, and seemed to end doubtfully; but the Moorish general, decamping in the night, abandoned the field of battle to the Christians, and himself to despair; so that refusing to take any sustenance, he expired at Medina Cæli, and with him the fortune of the Cordovan Moors^e. It is true that his successor Abdilmelech endeavoured to revive the war, by making an irruption into the kingdom of Leon, from a presumption, that upon the death of the king he should find things in some confusion;

but the count Don Garcia of Castile hastened thither with all the force he could raise, and being intrusted with the intire command of the troops of that kingdom, he obtained another complete victory, which changed the face of affairs, raised the courage of the Christians, and abated the spirit of their enemies^f.

The Christian exiles restored. THE progress of this war taught the Christian princes in general, from the light of experience, what sound policy might have taught them long before. They saw that a general war, more especially for any length of time, had a necessary consequence, which it was their business to avoid, that of keeping the Moors in a manner by force closely united, and in perfect harmony with each other. They likewise found, that as the original source of the war was the instigation of the malcontents, fled from Castile and Leon to the court of Cordova, and more especially the family of Vela, so, in the course of it, most of the misfortunes they had met with arose from the assistance they gave the enemy; from their instructing them in the military maxims and discipline in the Christian armies; and from the intelligence they held with their relations and friends in their respective countries^g. This, therefore, determined them to recall those exiles, particularly the sons of Don Vela, count of Alava; and this resolution being taken at a time when a change of fortune rendered those banished persons more inclined to return, as being not so much caressed by the Infidels as formerly, it took place according to their wish; and after long absence from their own countries, these exiles were not only recalled, but restored to their honours and their patrimonies, the surest and most prudent method, no doubt, for extinguishing all jealousies and heart-burnings; but which, notwithstanding, in its consequences was not found altogether successful. They had met with much kindness, and formed many friendships amongst the Moors; they had done many injuries to the Christians; and by degrees, as the motives to their pardon and reconciliation grew out of remembrance, the instances of resentment they met with from the latter, put them upon renewing their correspondence with the former, which proved the occasion of fresh disturbances, as we have already shewn in other parts of this history, and as we shall be obliged to shew likewise in the course of this^h. So dangerous a thing it is to drive great families to despair, and so difficult to recover to a right temper minds that have been once tainted.

The death of Don Garcia. WE have no other particulars in regard to the reign of Don Garcia the Trembler, only it is said that the best historians have doubted whether the tenor of his government, and the temper of his mind, deserved praise or blame. He was, it seems, liberal to a degree of excess, not only to abbies and other religious foundations, but to all who approached him on any occasion: a conduct which, tho' it exposed him to the censure of those who survived him, made him generally and deservedly beloved by those with whom he lived. Authors are much divided as to the name of his queen; but Mariana is positive she was called Donna Ximena, and it is very likely he is in the rightⁱ. By her he had the infant Don Sancho, whose education he intrusted to a religious person of the same name, abbot of the monastery of St. Salvador de Leyra, who was a person of learning and probity, and who took care to infuse into his pupil not only the principles of religion, but the maxims also of good sense and honour, which his own experience taught him to frame into a scheme of policy, much superior to any that had been known to his predecessors^k. Don Garcia left him his dominions after a short reign of six years. Authors are not agreed as to the place of his burial, which some say was in the church of the monastery of St. Juan de la Pegna, and others in that of the monastery of St. Salvador de Leyra^l. With his reign the obscurity of this history in some measure ends; so that for the future we shall be able to proceed with greater perspicuity, as having more numerous guides, and those of more established authority.

S E C T. II.

From the reign of Don Sancho the Great to that of Don Sancho V. who united this kingdom to Arragon.

IT is very uncertain at what age Don Sancho succeeded his father; but it is impossible that he should be in his infancy, as some have written ^a, because we find him married the next year; and as improbable, what others have asserted, that this was his second marriage, which is a fable devised to support the story which we have elsewhere related of his erecting Arragon into a kingdom in favour of his son Don Ramiro ^b. It appears from indisputable authority, that he began his reign by entering into a close alliance with the house of Castile; which he strengthened by marrying Donna Munia Elvira, the daughter of Don Sancho, and the granddaughter of the count Don Garcia, which marriage, though it seems to have proceeded chiefly from inclination, contributed not a little to his interest ^c. He did not, however, take any share in the disputes that arose between his father-in-law Don Sancho, and his own father the count Don Garcia; nor does it appear that he embarked in the war against the Moors, carried on by the last of these two princes, and in which he was slain ^d. In all probability our king of Navarre was desirous of settling and improving what his ancestors had acquired before he engaged in any military expedition; but when this was once done, he passed the river Gallego, and began to expel the Moors out of most of the places they held on his eastern frontier; and having performed this, he prosecuted the war with such success, that he swept the vallies of the country of Sobrarva, and the county of Ribagorça, of the Infidels: which is a plain proof that if the first sovereigns of this country were really settled in Sobrarva, they held but a very small part of it, though the whole is far from being large, or otherwise had lost it again to the Moors while they were extending their dominions towards the west ^e.

WE must, however, observe, that in these conquests Don Sancho was very much assisted by the natives, of whom a great number were Christians, and consequently very desirous of being freed from the yoke of the Moors. There was also a certain count of Ribagorça, whose name was William, and who was master of a part of this country, who looked with a jealous eye upon these conquests of Don Sancho; and though he had not been able to drive out the Moors, attempted to dispossess him ^f. The consequence of this act of rashness was, that he was intirely defeated by Don Sancho, and lost his dominions, or at least his independency, by his ambition. But while he was thus employed in the eastern extremity of his dominions ^g, Mundir, alcaide or governor of Saragossa, thought a fair opportunity offered for ravaging Navarre, and for recovering part of the places that had been taken from his predecessors. In the first part of his scheme he succeeded, and loaded his army with booty; but in the latter he failed intirely: for Don Sancho, returning with his victorious army, fell upon the Moors with such vigour, that he intirely routed them, and obliged them to repass the Ebro with great loss, insomuch that it may be doubted whether they ever recovered the weight of this blow ^h. As the ancient boundaries between this monarch's dominions and the country of Castile were become very doubtful and precarious, and as this might in succeeding times prove the occasion of very fatal disputes, Don Sancho and his father-in-law appointed persons in whom they could confide to settle these limits effectually ⁱ.

THE king Don Sancho, observing that the monks throughout his dominions had lost much of their primitive sanctity of manners, which of course rendered them very unfit instruments for government in the instructing his subjects, he sent deputies to Adilon, abbot of the famous Benedictine monastery of Clugni, to inspect the regulations of that house, and to bring back with them some persons of piety and probity, capable of reforming the monasteries in his dominions. This being done, he placed Paternus, who was the chief of these reformers, in quality of abbot in the convent of St. Juan de la Pegna, and sent others to St. Salvador de Leyra, and to St. Maria d'Yrache ^k. By their vigilance and care the monks were every where brought into good order, and the king by their advice repaired and restored the ancient abbey of St. Victoria. He beautified likewise the cathedral of Pampeluna, and regulated the limits of the diocese very exactly. These facts are mentioned to shew, that in these ancient times the piety of princes was in a great measure the true point of policy, adapted in all respects to the nature of their government, and calculated alike to maintain tranquillity amongst their subjects at home, and to inspire them with that zeal which was so absolutely necessary to procure success in their expeditions against the *Moors*¹. A circumstance which, duly attended to, will enable us to a form a true judgment of these times.

His accession to the county of Castile.

THE family of Don Vela, count of Alava, having taken some fresh umbrage at the count of Castile, had withdrawn themselves into the territories of the king of Leon, where, at the distance of many years, they took a bloody revenge, by murdering the young count Don Garcia Sanchez, the last heir male of the family, and the son of the prince, with whom they quarrelled^m. By the death of this prince, his brother-in-law the king of Navarre saw himself legally intitled to this noble county, in right of his wife, of which he accordingly took possession, and immediately invested the castle of Monçon, into which the assassins had retired, and having reduced it, put all he found therein to the swordⁿ. This was a very great accession of territory, and might very probably alarm his neighbours; for even in these times b the Spanish princes were exceedingly jealous of each other, and bore with great impatience such considerable additions of power. An accident which soon after fell out blew the smothered embers of discontent into a flame: the king Don Sancho resolved to restore the ancient city of Palentia, and committed the direction of this work to the bishop of Oviedo, one of the worthiest prelates of that age^o. The reason of this is said to have been, that the king hunting in a wood which now shaded the ruins of the old city, pursued a wounded stag into a cavern, where he perceived an altar, and is said to have felt his arm so numbed that he was unable to use it. Upon inquiry this was found to have been a chapel dedicated to St. Anthony, which induced him to make a vow to restore the city, and to build a cathedral upon that very spot in honour of this saint; which he accordingly did, and which still remains^p. In c proof of this there are as authentic vouchers as a thing of this kind can require; and yet Mariana and some other historians, who are well enough pleased with miracles in other cases, reject this^q. The rebuilding of Palentia so disturbed Don Bermudo the third king of Leon, that he took up arms; but Don Sancho entered his dominions with a superior force, and took Astorga: on which the principal prelates and peers in his dominions interposed, and obliged him to make a peace; the principal articles of which were, that he should give the district in dispute to the infanta Donna Sancha, who was to espouse Don Ferdinand the younger, son to the king of Navarre, who was to have the country of Castile, with the title of king^r. This seems to have been a very fair and equal agreement, and was confirmed by both kings at the monastery of Sabagon, where the marriage was performed with great magnificence^s. But on d the part of the king of Leon, as it afterwards appeared, it was a reconciliation only in shew.

his estates.

A D. 1034.

Don Sancho having thus restored the public tranquillity, applied himself to reform the monasteries in Castile upon the same plan which he had pursued in respect to those in his hereditary dominions. In compassion likewise to those who made pilgrimages to the tomb of St. James in Compostella, he caused a new and safe road to be made through his dominions, by the foot of the mountains Birbiefca and Amaya, and so through Carrion, Leon, and Astorga, to Compostella: this raised his reputation highly, and was at the same time very advantageous to his subjects^t. As he was advanced in years, he was desirous to see the four princes his sons settled in his life-time, and therefore divided his dominions amongst them in the following manner: to Don Garcia he gave what is now stiled the kingdom of Navarre, with the noble e country of Biscay, then stiled, as some affirm, the duchy of Cantabria, and the province of Rioja; to Don Ferdinand, Castile; to Don Gonçalo, Sobrarva and Ribagorça; and to Don Ramiro, Arragon^u. As to the fable upon which this division is said to be grounded, we have given the reader an account of it in another place, and to have mentioned it once is full enough. Having sent all his sons into their respective governments, where they assumed the titles of kings, he ended a long life and a glorious reign in the month of February following^v. He was first interred in the monastery of Ona, from whence his son Don Ferdinand caused his body to be removed to the city of Leon^w. As to the tale of his being slain by assassins, in a pilgrimage to Oviedo, we have already declared our reasons for rejecting it, and therefore we need not dwell upon them here. It may be we ought to pass the same censure upon what is f said of his assuming the title of emperor of Spain; as to which the more ancient writers are silent, and those who report it without authority scarce deserve to be believed^x.

Don Garcia Sanchez of Najara, so called from the place of his birth, succeeded his father in his hereditary realm of Navarre, but despoiled of so much of Arragon as had ever been united to it, and of the new conquests in Sobrarva and Ribagorça. Mariana assures us, that this monarch was gone in pilgrimage to Rome at the time of his father's demise, in order to obtain absolution there for the false charge he had brought against his mother, which, however, is refuted, as well by the charter still remaining, which shews he was then in Navarre; as by his mother's continuing to reside in his dominions, which assuredly she would not have done if he had been guilty of such an act of baseness towards her; and she had in resentment caused him to be despoiled of Castile and *Arragon*². Fiction is often plausible, but true history is always consistent. The quarrel that happened between the kings of Castile and Leon, gave Don Garcia an opportunity of shewing his fraternal affection, by sending a corps of auxiliaries to the assistance of Don Ferdinand; but when by the defeat and death of Don Bermudo, he became, in right of his queen, who was that monarch's sister, the heir of that kingdom also, it is supposed that Don Garcia began to entertain some jealousy of him, which, however, will appear improbable from the sequel of their history; and, perhaps, so long as the queen their mother lived, the brethren, at least in outward appearance, were upon good terms with each other, of which the first step of consequence made by this king, after his accession, will appear to be an incontestable instance³. He had concluded a marriage with Donna Estafana, infanta of Catalonia; and going to Barcelona to solemnize his marriage, he passed through the dominions of Don Ramiro and of Don Gonsalo, and was treated by both with all the marks of affection and esteem possible. He returned the same way, and visited in his journey the monastery of St. Juan de la Pegna, as appears by an authentic privilege belonging to that monastery, which is still preserved⁴. We have, therefore, no reason to believe that the seeds of dissension were hitherto sown amongst the descendants of Sancho the Great; but that soon after they were, and that they produced an abundant harvest of mischief, will be our business to make appear, and we shall thereby justify Mariana's sentiment, that Sancho the Great hazarded the safety of Spain by thus dividing his dominions.

A. D. 1038.

THE very same year his brother Don Gonsalo was barbarously murdered in passing the bridge of Monclus by a servant of his, one Ramonet, whose motive to that detestable action was never known⁵. Immediately on his demise, his subjects called in his brother Don Ramiro king of Arragon, who by this means united Sobrarva and Ribagorça to his dominions. We do not find that Don Garcia gave him any disturbance upon this occasion; but contented himself with endeavouring to provide for the happiness of the subjects he had, without invading his neighbours⁶. Besides, at this time the country of Navarre was eaten up by locusts, against which plague, when all methods of prudence failed; he demanded the advice of Pope Benedict

the ninth, who sent Gregory bishop of Ostia to visit the country, to preach repentance to the people in general, and regularity to the monks. It seems, before this fall of locusts produced a scarcity, this kingdom was in a state of full prosperity, and the people, from thence fallen into luxury, were gradually declining from that high character which the virtues of their ancestors had obtained⁷. These circumstances encouraged Don Ramiro, who had already attacked, and rendered tributary to him several little princes amongst the Moors, to think of spoiling his brother of some places which lay convenient for him; and accordingly having assembled an army, under pretence of prosecuting his designs against the Infidels, he suddenly summoned his Moorish auxiliaries, and very unexpectedly entered the kingdom of Navarre, where he laid siege to Tafalla, a place of some strength, and of great consequence⁸. The king Don Garcia assembled a considerable body of his father's old troops, with whom he seemed disposed to intrust the defence of Pampeluna; but marching from thence in the evening, he surprised the army of Arragon in the depth of the night, forced their camp, and obliged his brother to fly on a horse without saddle or bridle⁹. Don Garcia having thus relieved Tafalla, finding his army reinforced by the arrival of several fresh corps of troops, marched directly into Arragon, where most of the great places opened their gates, and his brother, unable to resist him, retired into the mountains of Ribagorça; from whence he sent certain bishops to assure Don Garcia of his sorrow for what was passed, and to intreat him to remember he was still his brother: upon which the king of Navarre, having first admonished him not to forget that himself, retired into his own dominions, and quitted all the places he had taken¹⁰. These events, for want of attending to chronology, are strangely disfigured by Mariana, who has had, notwithstanding, many followers.

THIS war thus happily over, Don Garcia applied himself with great spirit and diligence to regulate the domestic affairs of his kingdom, and, in imitation of his predecessors, laid the foundation of the superb abby of Santa Maria de Najara; but, while he was thus employed, the Moors made an inroad into his country, and, having carried off a considerable booty, lodged it in the fortrefs of *Calahorra*¹¹. This gave the monarch of Navarre a fair opportunity of annexing that place to his dominions, and he took his measures for that purpose with so much secrecy and celerity, that he not only invested, but took it by storm, before the Moors were in any condition to relieve it. This added highly to his reputation, more especially as he immediately restored it, and made it a bishop's see ^k. In Biscay the clergy complained that they were scandalously oppressed by the nobility and gentry, who treated them very little better than slaves, and even obliged them to breed up and feed their dogs. The king interposed, and rendered them all the justice they could desire, settled their livings in such a manner as that they might live comfortably upon them, and thereby merited great commendation ^l. We must here put the reader in mind, that from these facts, which are related nakedly, and admit of no contradiction, he ought to frame in his own mind a character of this prince, upon which will depend all the credit due to the remaining part of this history; upon which, to save time, we shall avoid making any remarks, but leave them intirely to his sagacity, with a moral persuasion, that after a little reflection he will see things in a true point of light.

Is said to have designs somewhat injurious towards his brother, who seizes his person in revenge. THE vast expence incurred by building the new monastery of our lady of Najara, exhausted the treasury of Navarre, and made it very difficult for Don Garcia to perform his purpose. Upon this he applied himself to the convent of St. Millan, and desired to borrow a part of their wealth, in order to perfect his new foundation. The abbot was not altogether averse to this; but the prior, whose name was Dominick, obstinately opposed, and prevented it; which so provoked the king, that he ordered the abbot to exclude him the cloister ^m. Not long after Don Garcia fell dangerously ill; upon which his brother Don Ferdinand, king of Castile, came to Najara to make him a visit. It is said that the latter claimed this very city, with the province belonging to it, and some other places, as having been anciently dependent on the kingdom which his father had given him: whereas, on the other hand, Don Garcia asserted, that in the same instrument by which the king gave his brother a kingdom, he expressly assigned to him these places which he kept, and would keep ⁿ. However, he received Don Ferdinand with all the kindness and respect possible; but in a little time it was infused into the head of the Castilian monarch, that his brother had an intention to secure his person; and he thereupon retired as suddenly and as secretly as possible into his own territories, highly offended at the injury which had been offered him, not yielding any credit to the assurances that his brother gave him, that he was imposed upon by some of his favourites, and that never any such design had entered into his head ^o. Some historians of Navarre would persuade us, that Don Ferdinand was so well satisfied as to come a second time into Navarre, and returned without the least injury or molestation. But however that might be, some years after, this prince being extremely sick at Burgos, Don Garcia went thither to see him, where, though he was at first received with all imaginable affection and regard, yet was he very speedily seized by his brother's order, and sent prisoner to the castle of Cea ^p. He remained not long there, but, by flattering or bribing his guards, made his escape; and on his returning into his own dominions he began to raise forces, in order to take a severe revenge. It is said that, to do this the more effectually, he solicited the Moors of Saragossa and Tudela, to lend him their assistance, which they very readily did; so that he was quickly in a condition to invade Castile with a very numerous and potent army ^q.

Don Garcia having made his escape, invades Castile, and is slain in battle. As his long illness was attributed to his offending prior Dominick of the convent of St. Millan, so all that happened afterwards is referred to another quarrel with the same holy person; who having prevented the king by a miracle from removing the body of their patron to his new convent at Najara, was by him so roughly handled, that he withdrew into the dominions of Don Ferdinand, where he became abbot of Silos, and was employed with other venerable persons by the king of Leon and Castile to mediate with his brother, and to make up this difference. But Don Garcia was inflexible; so that when his preparations were over, and his whole army assembled, he, in the latter end of August, began his march into Castile, and advancing directly towards Burgos, in a plain between Atapuerca and Afes, about nine miles from that city, Don Ferdinand met him with his troops, and on the first of September the two armies engaged ^r. The dispute continued for a long time equal; but at length an officer, whose name was Sanchez Fortune, who had deserted the service of Don Garcia, and entered into that of his brother, penetrated the guards of the former, and piercing the king through with a lance, bore him with his horse to the ground. Others say, that two deserters out of his own guards, being well acquainted with his person, singled him out in the battle, and each of them ran him through with a lance at the same time. Being thus slain, through a private pique, his army retired, and are said to have left the Mohammedans to be surrounded, and cut to pieces ^s. His corpse was interred the third day after his death in the royal a monastery of our lady of Najara, which had cost him so dear. Some ancient writers say, that the king of Castile availed himself of this victory to dismember from the kingdom of Navarre the countries which had given rise to the dispute between him and his brother; but a very accurate and judicious historian has shewn the fact to be otherwise, and that he gave his nephew no disturbance. The deceased monarch is said to have left behind him four sons, and as many daughters: these were Don Sancho, who succeeded him; Don Ramiro, to whom his father gave the feignory of Calaborra; Don Ferdinand, and Don Raymond: the infantas were Donna Ermefinda, Donna Ximena, Donna Major, and Donna Urraca^t.

Don Sancho Garcias ascended the throne after the unfortunate death of his father, and, as some writers say, proved a prince no way distinguished either for wisdom or valour. He stood much in awe of his uncle Don Ferdinand, and though he hated him for his father's death, and was jealous of his exorbitant power, yet at first he seemed to take in good part such excuses as he thought fit to make, and also to comply with whatever terms he judged it proper to demand^u. But when thoroughly established in his government, he entered into a close correspondence with his other uncle Don Ramiro of Arragon, who having the same interests, and the same fears, proposed to him a defensive alliance, as the most effectual security for them both, against a king who was equally formidable to his Christian and to his Mohammedan neighbours. This treaty produced in a great measure the desired effect; but the king of Leon and Castile chancing to die, divided his dominions, leaving Don Sancho Castile, Don Alonso Leon, and Don Garcia Galicia and Portugal^w. Before this Don Ramiro, king of Arragon, was killed in a battle against the Moors of Saragossa, whom the king of Castile had taken under his protection: this induced Don Sancho of Navarre to renew his treaty with his cousin Don Sancho of Arragon, which enabled him to repel the invasion of Don Sancho of Castile, who was thoroughly beaten by the allied princes; though afterwards turning his arms against his brethren, he united once more all his father's territories, and consequently became in every respect as formidable to his cousins as ever his father Don Ferdinand had been. But the death of that ambitious prince soon released them from their apprehensions, notwithstanding his brother Don Alonso, whom he had forced to take refuge amongst the Moors of Toledo, succeeded him in all his dominions^x. Some facts there are which seem to contradict the character before given of this prince; for when Don Sancho of Arragon attacked the Moorish king of Saragossa, our Sancho of Navarre received him as his tributary, and thereby secured him from being the victim of his cousin's ambition^y. He also resisted all the importunities of Pope Alexander the second, who pressed him to lay aside the old Gothic form of celebrating divine worship, and introduce the Roman liturgy, and this notwithstanding the king of Arragon yielded to his demand. But he did not at all oppose the holding a council for reforming simony, and other vices, which prevailed amongst the clergy; on the contrary, he took care that the canons made for that purpose were duly executed. He was also steady, in conjunction with his cousins, in treating with the contempt they deserved the wild pretences of Pope Gregory the seventh, who by a scandalous and ridiculous forgery, as we have shewn in another place, pretended to render all the Christian princes in Spain feudatories to the see of Rome, than which there could not be any thing more idle or preposterous, notwithstanding the learned cardinal Baronius undertook to defend it^z. These seem to be proofs that Don Sancho of Navarre was not either a weak or pusillanimous prince, though he was of a very pacific disposition; or it may be that some domestic misfortunes restrained him from endeavouring to raise his reputation by feats of arms, in the same manner his father and other illustrious ancestors had done: but we can only guess at these things, the story of his reign being particularly obscure, and even the few facts that are preserved being differently related, and some of them with contradictory circumstances: however, we must take them as they are, and without pretending to help them by conjectures.

Don Raymond, the brother of the king of Navarre, being seduced by some young men, with whom he had contracted too great an intimacy, began first to treat his brother with less respect than was due to him, and next endeavoured to diffuse this spirit of contempt amongst his subjects. He treated his piety as meanness of spirit; ridiculed his constant attention to business as unworthy of his dignity; and complained that he had made no additions to his territories by conquest^a. He made no impression upon the bulk of the people, who, persuaded that their sovereign had nothing so much at heart as their happiness, were intirely devoted to his service; but he drew his sister Donna Ermefinda into his intrigues, and had a numerous set of ruffians, who were his partizans, and whom he protected from the punishment which the laws would have inflicted for their offences, which made them so insolent that they committed openly the greatest violences, to the terror of all the sober part of mankind^b. The king, ^a having at first tried all methods possible to reclaim him, at length declared him and his associates rebels and public enemies. Don Raymond, who either persuaded himself, or was persuaded by his bravoës, that if his brother was dead, the people would set aside his children, and receive this gallant prince for their king with universal applause, having caused some castles to be fortified, and drawn about him as great a number of these mutinous people as he was able, he began to practise against his brother's life, and soon brought his barbarous designs to bear, though authors differ a little about the manner in which the assassination was perpetrated. Some say, that Don Raymond sent a considerable number of his attendants into the city disguised, in order to defend the person who was instructed to kill the king, and that at length this was executed at Roda, where Don Sancho was stabbed by his brother's appointment^c. Others assert, that, while he was hunting on the mountains between Funes and Milagro, Don Raymond, who was reconciled to him in appearance, observing that the greatest part of the company were left behind by the king's eagerness in pursuing a wild boar, he and his associates took that opportunity to throw him and his horse over the rocks, by which he was beat to pieces^d. This execrable act was committed on the fourth of June, when the king had reigned twenty-two years. His body is said to have been interred in the church of the royal monastery of St. Maria de Najara, universally lamented by his subjects^e.

^a THE generality of historians tell us, that this king espoused Donna Placentia, and had by her three sons, of whom the eldest was Don Ramiro, and both the others were called Garcia; ^c but this is a mistake, for in reality Don Ramiro was not his son, but the two Don Garcia's were, and being very young at the time of their father's death, were carried for safety into the territories of Castile. The confusion was so great, that very few knew what they were doing, or what they would have done; in this only they agreed, that the stain of this treason could be effaced by nothing but the blood of the infamous Don Raymond and his associates; upon which he fled immediately to Almutadir, king of Saragossa, who, in pity to his distress, gave him a subsistence^f. Don Ramiro, lord of Calaborra, laboured to pacify the minds of the people, and engage them to place him on the throne with his brother, to no purpose; for they persisted in the strange resolution they had formed, not to admit any of the family. Don Ramiro upon this immediately proclaimed in Calaborra Don Alonso king of Castile and Leon; ^d and on his detaching a considerable body of troops to his assistance, seized the provinces of Rioja and Biscay; all which wrought not in the least on the people of Navarre, who, in pursuance of their own inclinations, called in the king of Arragon, shewing no concern for the children of their deceased king, who were left to the compassion of the king of Leon and Castile, who caused them to be well educated, the younger dying a child, and the elder being killed in battle by the Moors, as some say, though Ferreras conjectures, from their being both of the same name, that one was illegitimate, and that both died in their childhood^g. As Don Sancho brought a great body of troops with him to Pampeluna; and as Don Alonso reinforced his army in the province of Rioja, it looked as if the possession of Navarre was to be decided by force of arms; but the prelates and peers interceding, and representing ^e to both princes, that they were fighting the battles of the Infidels, in fighting against each other, it was at last agreed that each should keep what he had already obtained, and that the river Ebro should be the bounds of their respective dominions^h. It was by this unfortunate event that the kingdom of Navarre lost those fertile and great provinces, all communication with the ocean, and that part of Old Castile which had been hitherto annexed to it. As for the infant Don Ramiro, and the infantas Donna Urraca, Donna Major, and Donna Ximena, they withdrew into Castile, and were treated with all the regard due to their birth, and all the kindness their distressed circumstances demandedⁱ. And thus having shewn how the realms of Navarre and Arragon were again united, after a separation of upwards of forty years, we shall conclude this section.

From the reign of Sancho the fifth to that of queen Joannia, who by marriage united this crown to that of France.

- ^a DON Sancho Ramirez, or Don Sancho the fifth, thus mounted the throne of Navarre by the consent of the people, and assumed the title of Don Sancho the fifth. As we have given the history of this prince already, in speaking of his hereditary kingdom, we shall confine ourselves here to such facts as have a strict relation to Navarre. He found himself frequently obliged to pay much higher respect to Don Alonso, king of Leon and Castile, than he was by any means inclined, and that on two accounts; one because of his pretensions to Navarre, which were at least as good as his own; and the other because he gave a protection in his dominions to those who had a better title than either. It was this that engaged him to assist at the siege of Toledo, where, to conceal his jealousy of that monarch's power he contributed not a little to make him much more powerful than he was. On the other hand, Don Alonso, not satisfied either with those provinces which he had torn from his kingdom, or with the submissions paid him by Don Sancho, secretly hated him for the acquisition he had made of Navarre, and for this reason protected the Moorish princes, their common neighbours; so that during their whole reigns these monarchs lived in apparent amity and private enmity with each other, till it wrought the death of one of them^a. In his domestic government king Sancho was equally zealous for the welfare of his subjects and the glory of his crown. He made many good laws that are contained in a code that bears his name^b; he built the city of Estella, or Stella, in a pleasant plain, on the banks of the river Erga, covered by a strong castle, and which is now looked upon to be the second place in the kingdom; he made restitution and did penance for having taken the treasure of the church to support his wars against the Moors, who in the times of public confusion had found means to seize several places in the mountains, of which he dispossessed them; to prevent which inconvenience from ever happening again, he gave the countries of Sobrarva and Ribagorça to his son Don Pedro, in his life-time, and this, as some say, with the title of king^c. The last great action of this monarch's life was that which put an end to it; for having invested the city of Huesca, which was defended against him by the whole force of the Moors, not without the assistance of some Castilians, he was shot, as he extended his arm in giving directions, under it with an arrow into his body, of which wound, being carried into his tent, he speedily expired, as some say, on the first, but as others, on the fourth of June, when he had reigned in Navarre eighteen years^d. A.D. 1094.
- ^d DON Pedro, reputed by some king of Sobrarva several years before, succeeded his father in all his dominions; and having, in conjunction with his brother Don Alonso, promised never to put an end to this war till Huesca was reduced, he, to fulfil that promise, gave battle to a numerous army of Moors, under the king of Saragossa, and of Christians, under the count of Cabra, in the great plain of Alcoraz, and by their total defeat made way for the surrender of that place. It was in this battle that the historians of Navarre pretend that St. George was seen fighting on horseback, at the head of one of their squadrons, and from thence they have a particular devotion for that saint^e. The best part of his reign was spent in several expeditions against the Infidels, from whom he took many strong places, and thereby extended his dominions on every side. But if he was fortunate in his wars, he was very far from being so in his family, since his son the infant Don Pedro, and his daughter the infanta Donna Isabella, died both on the eighteenth of August, and himself, as some say, on the twenty-eighth of September following, partly of a lingering disease, and partly of grief for his children, when he had governed the kingdoms of Navarre and Arragon ten years^f. He was interred with his children in the church of the monastery of St. Juan de la Pegna, and was the last king buried there, unless it may be his successor, though in respect to this there is no certainty. Don Pedro's short reign. 1096.
- DON Alonso succeeded his brother, who died without posterity, and became in a very short space of time, from the younger brother of a little king, the most powerful of the Christian monarchs, which, since the ruin of the Gothic kingdom, had reigned in Spain. He was the first of his name who had reigned either in Arragon or Navarre; but after his marriage with Donna Urraca, he intitled himself Don Alonso, the second of Leon, and the seventh of Castile; but that he ever intitled himself emperor is, if not false, of very doubtful authority^g. have said so much of this gallant prince in the histories of Leon, Castile, and Arragon, that it is unnecessary to dwell upon his great actions here. We shall therefore only observe, that he reduced Saragossa, Tudela, Terrazona, Calatayud, Daroca, and all the country on the south of the Ebro, which he annexed to the kingdom of Arragon^h. He was the first who carried the arms of the Christians into the fruitful province of Andalusia; and so brave in his person, and so fortunate in his military expeditions, that he obtained the surname of the Gainer of Battles. His valour was no less conspicuous in France, where he took Bayonne, than in Spain, and the very fame of his exploits drew, as the custom of that age was, to his standard, the most gallant knights from all the countries in *Europe*ⁱ. But this noble, and, in the general acceptation of those times, pious prince, persisting obstinately in the siege of Fraga, and giving battle to a much superior army of Moors, who advanced to the relief of it, was totally defeated on the seventeenth of July; and having lost upon the spot most of the generous cavaliers that came to him out of foreign countries, and the flower of the nobility of both his kingdoms, escaped with difficulty to the monastery of St. Juan de la Pegna, and there died in two days of grief, as cotemporary writers say^k; so that there is not the least reason to credit the fables reported by some authors of his surviving this action several years, and leading a retired life in the guise of a hermit near Jerusalem^l. He died without issue; and by his will, which was made at Bayonne, left prodigious legacies to the church, and both his kingdoms to the knights templars; but his subjects were wise enough not to suffer themselves to be disposed of in that manner; and therefore, as soon as they had recovered the great consternation they were under, they convened an assembly of the states^m.

It was of the greatest consequence to come to a speedy election, and the greatest part of the assembly had cast their eyes upon Don Pedro Atarez, a man of great virtue and ability, and descended from Don Ramiro the first, king of Arragon. Against this, however, Don Pedro Tizon de Cadreita, and Don Peregrin Castellezuelo set themselves violently, affirming, that he was a person of austere manners, and already excessive proud; so that raising him to the throne would be making themselves and their countrymen miserableⁿ. Warm debates arising, the assembly was transferred to Moncon, where it quickly appeared that the only means to prevent a civil war consisted in the elevation of Don Ramiro, brother to the deceased king, to the throne, though a monk, and in priest's orders^o. The nobility of Navarre seeing this, retired home, and assembling at Pampeluna suddenly, unanimously elected Don Garcia Ramirez, and having sent for him from Moncon, declared him king^p. All authors agree that he was of the royal family; but many, and Mariana among the rest, will have him to be the son of Don Ramiro, and the grandson of Don Sancho, whom his brother assassinated^q: yet upon a strict examination of the charters, and other authentic instruments of those days, it very clearly appears that he was in reality the grandson of Don Ramiro, the brother of Don Sancho, who retired into Castile during the troubles of Navarre; so that his new subjects might be truly said to render him that justice which they had refused his grandfather. He was in the flower of his age, and very capable of that high dignity to which he was advanced, personally brave, but politically cautious: jealous of the honour of his crown, but tender of his people's safety: in a word, very able to maintain war when forced to maintain it; but by no means disposed to disturb his neighbours, or to expose those who had chosen him for their protector, to gratify his ambition.

Difficulties to which he found himself exposed immediately on his accession.

He had scarce felt the weight of a crown before he found two princes equally desirous of easing him of his burden: the first was Don Alonso Raymond, king of Leon and Castile, who pretended to the sovereignty of Navarre, as being descended from Don Sancho the Great in a direct line; the other was Don Ramiro, king of Arragon, who conceived that, as the heir of his brother, he was as much intitled to one kingdom as the other^r. Don Garcia with great address wound himself out of these difficulties. He went to pay his devoirs to Don Alonso, and by this condescension concluded a treaty with him much to his own advantage. With the like dexterity he insinuated to the nobility of Arragon, that a war would be fatal to both nations; and that though he had just pretensions as the heir of Don Garcia de Najara upon the sovereignty of Arragon, yet he was content to remit things to an arbitration: the result of which was, that his right to Navarre was acknowledged, the nobility of Arragon being satisfied that Don Ramiro would have enough to do to govern one kingdom. They insisted only, that, in reverence to his age, Don Garcia should pay him a kind of homage, which he very readily performed, hoping, in case he survived him, to be chosen his successor^s.

^a Castile, and having received a rough answer from the emperor, for so Don Alonso was now styled, he entered into an alliance with Don Alonso Henriquez, prince of Portugal, and endeavoured to obtain it by force of arms; but failing in this, the dispute was at length compromised^b. This was succeeded by a new quarrel with Don Raymond Berenger, who, on the abdication of Don Ramiro, had assumed the title of prince of Arragon, and was count of Barcelona in his own right. The emperor Don Alonso assisted his brother-in-law Don Raymond in this dispute; but Don Garcia managed the war with so much courage and conduct, that he beat the prince of Arragon, and obliged the emperor to raise the siege of Pampeluna; and at length the peers and prelates of his realm interposing, the emperor concluded a treaty with him, by which an end was put to all their differences, and, for the confirmation of it, his son Don Sancho married the infanta Donna Blanch of Navarre^c. The war with Arragon was still continued; in which Don Garcia gained several advantages; but his queen Donna Margaret dying, he thought fit, to promote his own interest, to marry Donna Urraca, the natural daughter of the emperor; who compromised the disputes with Arragon, and engaged both princes to assist him in his wars against the Moors; which they very honourably performed, and the emperor, by their assistance, managed that war with great success^d. This was one of the last great actions of Don Garcia's life, who, after managing very prudently that perplexed state in which he found the affairs of his monarchy, and having restored it to its ancient independency, died in peace at Pampeluna on the twenty-first of November, and was buried in the cathedral church of that capital, equally regretted by his subjects and by the princes his allies^e.

Don Sancho, surnamed the Wise, succeeded his father, and very steadily pursued his maxims. He delivered his sister, who had been married while a child, and who was now become a woman, to the infant Don Sancho; and at the same time his mother-in-law Donna Urraca returned to her father's court^f. The war with Arragon being revived, he carried it on with great spirit and success, notwithstanding the emperor assisted Don Raymond, and at length obliged the latter to terminate the disputes that had lasted so long between the two crowns by an equitable and solid peace. After the death of the emperor he attempted the recovery of the places that, to the prejudice of the crown of Navarre, had been annexed to Castile; and though he failed in his first attempt, yet taking afterwards a more favourable opportunity, he succeeded, and by the like prudent management hindered the coalition of the small Moorish principalities, by assisting the weaker against the stronger, by which he kept their forces still divided, and at the same time employed in ruining each other^g. It was from the exercise of these refined arts of policy, as well as from his diligence and attention to domestic improvements, that he obtained the surname of Wise, and retrieved and restored the broken forces of his monarchy in such a manner, that he begun to be as much considered, both by the Christian and Moorish princes, as any of his predecessors had been^h. An extraordinary instance of this comes in properly here, and shall be the more largely explained, because, tho' occasionally mentioned elsewhere, yet the particulars were reserved for the history of Navarre and the reign of this prince, to both which they naturally belong.

Don Sancho VII. or the Wife.

ⁱ We have shewn in how uneasy and precarious a situation Don Sancho's affairs stood with regard to the kings of Arragon and Castile, and the injuries he received from both; and we have likewise shewn upon what motives he assisted the Moors: the point now in hand is to give the reader a clear idea of the immediate advantages which resulted to him from a measure that seemed to promise but very remote benefits at the most. The Moorish prince he assisted was Mohammed Aben-lop, king of Valencia and Murcia, whose dominions were scarce contiguous to his, and with whom therefore it might have been apprehended he had little to do^j. His auxiliaries were commanded by Don Pedro Ruiz d'Azagra, by whose assistance he not only repulsed and defeated his enemy, but likewise besieged and made himself master of Granada^k, and out of gratitude for so signal a service, the generous Moor made him a present of the town and fortrefs of Albarracin. This is a small place, but of great strength, standing on an eminence near the Guadalavir, commanding a pleasant district on the frontiers of Castile and Valencia, as well as Arragon, within which kingdom it lies^l. The king of Navarre gave Don Pedro leave, and furnished him with the means to fortify this place, to people it thoroughly, and to keep a strong garrison in it; so that, before they were aware, the kings of Castile and Arragon saw a new sovereignty erected, equally troublesome to both; though Don Pedro, to save appearances, styled himself the vassal of our lady of Albarracin, because the cathedral was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin^m. This new prince, who had a long head, as well as a stout heart, acted constantly in conjunction with his old master; and whenever he

By his concurrence and advice Don Pedro Ruiz d'Azagra becomes sovereign of Albarracin.

A. D. 1161. endeavoured to enlarge his western frontier, the lord of Albarracin was sure to make a diversion in his favour, by an excursion into the very heart of Castile. On the other hand, if the king of Arragon invaded Navarre, Don Pedro was presently at his back; so that by the help of this ally, the wise Don Sancho stood no longer in awe of either, or of both these princes. Such were the effects of this singular expedient, nothing similar to which is perhaps to be met with in any history. But we pass to instances, though of a less striking, yet of a more general nature, which will give a true idea of this prince's government.

Other instances of Don Sancho's prudence and policy, by which Navarre was restored to a great degree.

We must allow the historians of Navarre to have had a just right to set this monarch on a level with any of those who flourished in his time: he entered on his dominions when they had been harrassed by a long war, and curtailed through a series of ill-fortune. He had scarce a single power that was sincerely allied to him, and even in his own territories some inclined to the king of Castile, and more to him of Arragon. To balance this, he kept at first on the defensive; entered into a league with Lewis the seventh of France, which subsisted during both their reigns; enlarged the privileges of most of the great towns, built some new ones, and fortified all; exempted the inhabitants of the vallies that were most barren from taxes, by which indulgence they were always ready to take arms as occasion required. His court was the asylum of the injured and oppressed, whether Christians or Moors; so that he had ever in his service men of distinguished courage and great experience. He was, for those times, a prince of learning, which he encouraged amongst his clergy and nobility. He had a good correspondence throughout Europe, and so good intelligence, that he let slip no opportunity of recovering the places that had been torn from his predecessors. His alliance with Portugal was of great use to him: and his industry and activity in time of peace enabled him to make or sustain war sooner and steadier than any of his neighbours. He lost several battles, and some towns; but he rejected all offers of peace till these were restored; and his abilities and experience furnished him with such resources, that sooner or later he procured his own terms. His generosity in the usage of such as he made prisoners gained him an high reputation, and was in other respects very useful; his modesty and his silence rendered his designs impenetrable; and his readiness in forgiving past offences, brought back into his dominions most of those who had retired into Arragon or Castile. He first introduced the title of count into Navarre; and was so ready to acknowledge whatever services were rendered him by the nobility, and paid them so much respect upon all occasions, that they let slip no opportunity of expressing their zeal, or of conforming to his will, by which he wrought so great a change in the order and œconomy of the state, that at the same time he raised his own revenues, the people in general were much richer than before his accession to the crown. His address and his experience might have given him a boundless authority, if he had sought it; but, except in great emergencies, he did nothing but by the advice of the states, or at least with their consent; and was so far from abridging the liberties of the people, that in many instances he extended them. When he found it impracticable to recover all Biscay, he insinuated to the lords of it, who were vassals to the crown of Castile, that hostilities might prove the destruction, but could never turn to the advantage either of the Biscayners, or the people of Navarre; and therefore he advised them to keep a tacit and perpetual neutrality when the two crowns were at war, the advantages of which were quickly so apparent, and the lords of Biscay became by this means so independent, that the monarchs of Castile could never engage them to break through it, while the kings of Navarre drew little less benefit from that province than they would have done if it had been held of them; which benefit, though foreseen by him, was not felt in its full extent but by his successors.

This monarch defeats the confederacy formed for conquering and dividing his dominions.

Don Alonso king of Arragon, count of Barcelona, and master of several fair estates in France, could never divest himself of the passionate desire he had once entertained of being master of Navarre; and finding the like disposition in Don Alonso the third of Castile, he took advantage of their having concluded a truce with the Moors, to propose the conquest of that kingdom, in order to which a kind of convention was settled between them: as both princes had numerous armies on foot, and had bound themselves by reciprocally depositing certain fortresses for the due performance of their engagement, Don Sancho was never in so great peril before. At the time appointed, the troops of Arragon entered Navarre, and took several places; but they were so well and so long defended, that by the end of the campaign the army was much reduced. On the other hand, the king of Castile in person penetrated almost as far as Pampeluna with a superior army, Don Sancho retiring before him all the way, and suffering him to burn and pillage the country at his pleasure; but in his retreat he harrassed his troops exceedingly, and recovered a great part of the booty. The next year the war was carried on in the same manner; but while the king of Arragon pleased himself with the a taking of several small places, he was alarmed with the news that Don Sancho had made an irruption into Arragon, had taken Cajuelos, and was preparing to cut off his retreat. As for the Castilians, finding the country in the same manner as they left it, and meeting with no opposition, they were afraid of advancing too far, from an apprehension of suffering by that famine which they had caused. Events of the like nature followed in several campaigns, till at length all parties, weary of a war by which none were gainers, consented to leave all their disputes to the arbitration of Henry king of England, to whose court each of the princes sent ambassadors, and gave security to submit to his decision^p. In the mean time a cessation of arms took place, which continued for several years. It was in this interval of peace that two queens of Navarre died almost at the same time, Donna Sancha, sister to Don Ferdinand king of Leon, and aunt to Don Alonso of Castile, who was buried in the cathedral at Pampeluna, and Donna Urraca, the widow of Don Garcia Ramirez^q. The use Don Sancho made of this calm was to build in the province of Alava the beautiful town of Vitoria, to cover his country from irruptions on the side of Castile; and he chose the situation so happily, that in process of time it became a fine city, and the capital of this country, after it fell, during the reign of his son, under the dominion of the crown of Castile, to which it has been united ever since^r.

A. D. 1181.

THE decision of king Henry of England was not accepted, and yet the truce still continued. But the king of Castile reflecting, that while this misunderstanding continued, it would be always the interest of Don Sancho to hinder as much as in him lay the success of his expeditions against the Moors, and also that the campaigns against that monarch were attended with great loss of blood, and little or no profit, while the common enemy was increasing in strength, which must be attended with great ill consequences in process of time, he demanded an interview with that monarch; in which, once for all, they adjusted the disputes that had so long subsisted, settled the frontier between both their kingdoms, and gave each other, according to the mode of those times, security for the due performance of this treaty, which was one of the greatest and happiest events in his reign^s. The king of Arragon also, tired out with unsuccessful expeditions, and desirous of applying his attention to affairs of another nature, took the like method, and concluded a definitive peace. Thus Don Sancho carried his two great points, and obliged both his potent neighbours to renounce those pretensions which ambition suggested, and which for such a length of time had been seconded by force^t. One thing aimed at by this treaty would have been very injurious to the interests of Navarre had it taken place. The two kings of Castile and Arragon had thoughts of attacking and reducing Don Pedro Ruiz de Azagra, whose independency gave them great disquiet. The opportunity was favourable: the king of Navarre could not now defend him; and against the combined forces of the two crowns, it was impossible he should defend himself. In this desperate situation Don Sancho suggested to the two crowns he might demand the protection of the Moors; and in that case, instead of being easily suppressed, he might prove a more formidable enemy than ever. The confederates, having considered this, resolved to pursue their true interest, in acting against the Moors, referring the siege of Albarracin to a more convenient season^u. Richard the first, king of England, having demanded Donna Berengara, Don Sancho's eldest daughter, in marriage, he readily consented; and that princess being delivered to queen Eleanor, the king's mother, was by her carried into Flanders, and from thence on board a fleet to the island of Cyprus, where their nuptials were solemnized on the twelfth of May at Limisso^v. The very next year the English monarch being in the Holy Land, the count de Toulouse attacked his seneschal in Gascony, supposing that he should obtain an easy conquest; but the king of Navarre, being acquainted with it, sent the infant Don Sancho with eight hundred men at arms to the assistance of the seneschal, which intirely disconcerted the count's scheme^w. This was one of the last great actions of his life; for the king being seized with a consumptive distemper, sunk by a gradual decay, breathed his last on the twenty-seventh of June, leaving behind him the reputation of being the most accomplished monarch that ever sat on the throne of Navarre^x.

Other memorable acts, and death of Don Sancho the Wise, after a long reign, and with high reputation.

GREAT hopes were conceived of Don Sancho, who succeeded his father of the same name, and who in the former part of his reign was surnamed the Strong, or the Brave; but towards the end, for a reason that will be given, the Hidden, or Inclosed. He was certainly a prince of lively parts, as well as steady courage; but either he did not understand, or at least he did not pursue, the maxims of Don Sancho the Wise^y. Immediately after his accession he promised Don Alonso king of Castile, to bring him a considerable reinforcement, in order to enable him to make head against the whole strength of the Moors; and there is no reason to doubt that he would have been as good as his word, as well as the king of Arragon, who had made the same promise, in case that monarch had given them time to accomplish their design. ^a But by an unaccountable stroke of vain-glory, and a preposterous desire of defrauding his allies of their just share of reputation, he advanced with the troops of Castile against a numerous army of Moors, by which he lost the great battle of Alarcos, which might have been fatal at least to his own dominions, if the Infidels had prosecuted their victory. The kings of Navarre and Aragon were so much provoked at this behaviour, that they disbanded their forces: and, on the other hand, the king of Castile took this so ill, that having made, or rather obtained, a truce from the Moors, he made an attempt upon their dominions; but with little success ^a. Some time after he struck up an alliance with the king of Aragon, and promised to assist him in case he would revive his old pretensions to the crown of Navarre. The king of Morocco, being well informed of all that had passed, as well as the forces and dispositions of these princes, ^b began a secret negotiation with the king of Navarre; by which he promised him his daughter, and offered, by way of portion, to give her all the large dominions which he held in Spain. Alarmed on the one side, and allured on the other, Don Sancho, whose strength lay rather in his arm than in his head, embraced this proposition, so far at least as to enter into conferences with the emissaries of this potent prince; but with what view cannot be so clearly determined ^b.

Africa, and its consequences.

THIS intrigue could not be carried on so secretly as to escape the knowledge of other Christian princes; who thereupon attacked the character of the king of Navarre with the utmost marks of resentment, giving out, that he intended to enter into a close alliance with the Moors, and perhaps to abandon the Christian religion. This induced him to send the bishop of Pampeluna to Rome, to assure Pope Celestin the third, that these were downright calum- ^c nies, and that he intended nothing of that kind; and the pontiff thereupon wrote him a very tender and obliging letter, which is still extant ^c. However, notwithstanding these assurances, Don Sancho, being perfectly informed that the kings of Castile and Aragon were concluding a peace with the Moors in order to attack his dominions, not only persisted in his negotiations with the Infidels, but proceeded at length to quit his own dominions, and with a small retinue to pass over to Barbary, in hopes of accomplishing his marriage ^d. At his arrival in the court of Morocco he found the face of affairs very unexpectedly changed by the death of the king, and his son's positive declaration, that he did not intend to be bound by his father's agreement, but meant to preserve his Spanish dominions, and to transport a considerable body of forces from Africa for that purpose. Don Sancho, thus disappointed, and ^d knowing what unhappy consequences must attend his absence, would willingly have returned without delay into his own territories, but was quickly made sensible that this was also impracticable; for the new monarch of Morocco insisted on his going with him in person against his rebels; which, not being able to avoid, he did with a good grace, and acquired great reputation by his behaviour ^e.

A. D. 1199.

The kings of Castile and Aragon at-minions in his absence, and make great conquests.

In the mean time the kings of Castile and Aragon did not let this favourable occasion slip, but attacked the kingdom of Navarre with all their forces. In the very first campaign the king of Aragon made himself master of several places, some by force, and some by compo- sition: but the king of Castile, though he had the better army of the two, was by no means able to make so rapid a progress ^f. He had made an irruption into the province of Alava, and ^e had made himself master of several inconsiderable places, and most of the open country; but Victoria, which was well fortified, and had a good garrison, made a long and obstinate resistance; so that he was obliged to leave the reduction of it to Don Lopez de Haro, lord of Biscay, who brought it by the beginning of the next spring into such a situation, that the gar- rison and the inhabitants desired leave to send the bishop of Pampeluna into Barbary, to know whether they had any relief to expect, and promised to surrender upon his return. This was granted; the bishop went accordingly, and the king told him, that he was obliged to his faithful subjects for the long and gallant resistance they had made; but that not having it in his power to bring them any succours, he did not pretend to hinder them from making the best terms they could for themselves. Upon this the inhabitants of Victoria demanded, that the ^f king of Castile should promise to maintain them in all their privileges and immunities; and this being granted, they immediately opened their gates. The fate of Victoria not only drew after it the loss of the whole province, but that also of Guipuscoa, and of what yet remained to the crown of Navarre of Biscay, particularly the port of St. Sebastian; all which were from this time united to the kingdom of Castile, and was an irreparable loss to this sovereignty ^e. Instead of wondering that so much was torn from the territories of Navarre, we have reason to be surprised that any thing was left, considering the power of the monarchs who attacked it, the address by which the king of Castile gradually detached the crown of France, and the rest of Don Sancho's allies, and the supineness of the kings of Leon and Portugal, who had an interest

a in preserving a monarchy by which themselves had been more than once preserved; and this was so much the more astonishing, as the alliance which had driven Don Sancho in a manner to despair, and the war that had deprived him of his dominions, were the pure effects of jealousy and ambition, and did not proceed from any thing this monarch had done, or at least he had given no adequate offence^b. The outcry made as to his treaty with the Infidels being fully answered by its motive, which was that ill-usage he received from Christians, without meeting with so much as one Christian friend.

It must appear strange, that while his subjects were thus oppressed, when two foreign armies were in the bowels of his country, Don Sancho, who had the reputation of being so brave a prince, should remain abroad in the service of the Moors, and without attempting to afford them the least succour. The writers of those times, however, own, that Don Sancho was not inexcusable. He was seized, either through fatigue or disturbance of mind, with a very dangerous fever in his passage; and this, either through the malignity of the disease, want of skill in those who treated it, or want of patience in the king himself, fell into his foot, and turned afterwards into a cancerous humour, which never could be cured. It is most probable that this happened after his expedition against those who had taken up arms in opposition to the miramolin, and that as soon as he was a little better he prepared for his return home^c. We are also told, that though he was in the highest credit with the monarch he had served, yet he absolutely refused to make a diversion in his favour, by attacking the kings of Castile and Arragon, though he might have done it very conveniently; because he had made a truce for ten years, and had sworn to the due observance of that truce. But he shewed his gratitude to the king of Navarre another way; for on his departure he not only loaded him with presents, but furnished him likewise with a vast sum of money, that he might be the better enabled to change the face of his affairs^d. He landed at Carthagera, and took his measures so well, that he passed from thence into his own dominions without being discovered. On the news of his arrival the Castilians raised the siege of a place on the very point of falling into their hands^e. There happened soon after an event of much greater importance: Don Diego Lopez, who thought himself ill treated by the king of Castile his master, revolted, and withdrew with his dependents, and a good body of troops into Navarre, from whence he made inroads into the very heart of Castile. His master, Don Alonso the Noble, A. D. 1201. marched with the joint forces of Castile and Leon against him, and at length shut him up in Esfella, where he made so good a defence, that the king found himself constrained to raise the siege^f. The Pope having received exact information of the situation of things in Spain, and the ill usage the king of Navarre had met with, interposed his good offices^g; and Don Diego Lopez, having made his peace with his master, remembered the obligations he was under to Don Sancho, and concluded a treaty for him upon the best terms that could be obtained^h. By this the consumption that wasted his state was for the present stopped.

The king took the opportunity of this interval of peace, for the war with Arragon was also suspended, to put his country into a posture of defence, and to repair the losses he had sustained in some measure, by making better the dominions he had left. He was either by nature, or in consequence of his misfortunes, extremely frugal, but this disposition was so far from being grievous to his subjects, that it turned to their benefit; for, having his coffers full, he remitted several grievous impositions, proceeding on the true maxim, that wherever the people were oppressed the prince must be poorⁱ. This had a wonderful effect; for his subjects continually boasted that the father was the wisest, and the son the best prince ever seated on their throne: and hence followed an event that no policy could foresee; for the inhabitants of Bayonne, and the country adjacent, finding themselves harrassed by the continual wars of the princes their sovereigns, and those who pretended to be so, put themselves under the protection of the king of Navarre, which was a thing extremely commodious for him in many respects. The truce still subsisting with the king of Castile, that monarch demanded an interview with Don Sancho at Guadalaxara, where it was renewed for five years; and Don Alonso at the same time undertook to mediate a peace with Arragon. On his return from this interview to Pampeluna, there fell out a dismal accident; for the king's only brother, Don Ferdinand, running at the ring, was thrown by his horse against a stone pillar, and died upon the spot^j.

Don Alonso the Noble, king of Castile, perceiving the ten years truce with the Moors drawing towards a close, and knowing how assiduous they had been in improving the quarrels amongst the Christian princes to their own advantage, represented in very strong terms to Don Pedro, king of Arragon, the necessity of turning the truce with Navarre into a solid peace, that they might be in a condition to act offensively against the Infidels, as the most effectual means to preserve their own territories from becoming the seat of war^a. Upon this remonstrance an interview was appointed between the three kings, at a place called Mallen, where a peace was concluded between Don Sancho of Navarre, and Don Pedro of Arragon, to their mutual satisfaction; and at the same time both kings promised Don Alonso to bring the flower of their forces to his assistance. But Don Pedro of Arragon, intimating that his finances were in great disorder, Don Sancho of Navarre generously offered to lend him twenty thousand pieces of gold, which he also performed, and had a certain number of castles and towns consigned to him to secure the repayment^b. The next year there was another congress held, and the following was entirely spent in preparations; and in the succeeding spring, the war being commenced, Don Sancho, in performance of his promise, marched with a fine corps of troops to join the Christian army, and was not only present, commanding the right wing in the decisive victory gained July the 16th, but was, by the universal consent of all writers, the principal instrument of providence in obtaining it; for Don Sancho with his cavalry breaking the iron chain, and penetrating into the center of the Moorish army, compelled the miramamolin to seek his personal safety in flight. Some authors say, that the tent of the Moorish monarch was assigned him as a trophy of his victory. It is, however, more certain, that he returned with Don Alonso, and made his public entry with that monarch into Toledo; from whence, after a short stay, he returned home with his victorious army, himself covered with glory, and his troops laden with plunder. At his departure, Don Alonso, as a mark of his gratitude, restored to him fifteen places, which had been left to him by the peace; so that nothing could be more honourable or advantageous to him than this campaign, which rendered him as much revered throughout all Spain, as he had hitherto been in his own dominions^c.

Resumes his designs for the benefit of his subjects and the security of his dominions.

At his return to Pampeluna, he resumed his former designs for the benefit of his subjects. He had already instituted an order of knighthood for the security of the roads, and the protection of passengers. He now caused a body of laws to be published, which had the same thing in view, as well as the suppressing robberies, murders, and whatever else, from the violence of those times, carried in it reproach to civil government^d. He caused also some convents to be repaired, and others to be erected, having chiefly in view the drawing people into his dominions, and increasing the number of towns and villages, which were commonly the effects of such foundations. His liberality appeared sufficiently upon these and other public occasions: at others he was sparing to a great degree, and indeed it could not well be otherwise. The fortress of Viana he constructed for the security of his country, in case the spirit of ambition should revive in the court of Castile; and he took his measures so well, and prosecuted his design with such vigilance, that the place was very soon in a posture of defence; and from its happy situation became, in a very short space of time, one of the most considerable places in the kingdom^e. He also repaired and improved the town of Tudela, which he made the principal place of his residence, partly on account of the excellency of its air, and partly from its vicinity to the frontiers of Castile; whence he judged it absolutely necessary that it should be rendered one of the strongest and most populous places in his dominions. Here, as some writers assert, he shut himself up closely in the castle, and was seldom seen by any but his domestics, on account of that cancerous humour, which in process of time extended itself from his foot upwards; and from hence it is pretended that he had the surname of Hidden or Retired^f: with respect to which we pretend not to decide; only this is certain, that he did not at all relax in his care of public affairs, but continued to form and execute various schemes for increasing the number, and promoting the welfare of his subjects, in which Providence blessed him with as great success as he could desire. He was also equally fortunate in amassing wealth, by leading almost a private life, without offending his people^g.

Don Sancho adopts James king of Arragon, heir of all his dominions.

We come now to the last and most obscure part of this prince's history. Some writers, and particularly Mariana, say, that, being very old and infirm, his subjects began to slight his authority, insomuch that there were various seditions in Pampeluna; that these were excited by his nephew Thibaut, earl of Champagne, who being his next heir, was weary of waiting for the crown till it fell of itself, and was therefore desirous of shaking it off the old man's head. They add, that Lopez Diaz de Haro, lord of Biscay, had invaded Navarre, and committed great outrages there, which he attributed to the ambition of St. Ferdinand; and upon these motives, it is said, he invited James king of Arragon to Tudela, where, after many conferences, in which he inveighed bitterly against the want of fidelity and duty in his nephew, and the

- a exorbitant lust of dominion in Don Ferdinand, he made an agreement with the king of Arragon, that they should reciprocally adopt each other, in order that the survivor, being possessor of both kingdoms, might have power sufficient to defend their independency, and to protect their subjects in the enjoyment of their liberties. He also lent him at this time one hundred thousand crowns, that he might be the better able to prosecute his wars against the Moors^a. The adoption and the loan are things certain; but the other circumstances, as they are very improbable, so they are far from being well supported. The whole of this transaction, when closely and impartially examined, may perhaps be reduced to this. Don Sancho being grown old, and having nothing at heart so much as the welfare of his subjects, believed, that, as the last heir male of Don Garcia Ramirez, he might call to the succession whom he pleased, by way of adoption: and he preferred James king of Arragon, as descended from Sancho the Great, in hopes that the kingdom of Navarre might participate of the many advantages daily flowing to Arragon, from the martial spirit and great capacity of this victorious prince, who, if his pretensions had not been this way admitted, might easily swallow it up by conquest. That this was really the case, and that there was no reciprocal adoption, appears manifestly from the conduct of king James, who the very next year, and during the life-time of this prince, caused the states of his kingdom to swear allegiance to his son, which would have been a wanton infraction of his treaty with the king of Navarre, had it been really made on these terms^b. It is also probable, that what is said of the count of Champagne is said without foundation, since it is a fact out of dispute, that this prince, to please his uncle, actually did homage to the king of Arragon, in prejudice of his own right, which certainly he would never have done, if he had been of such a temper, as is suggested, or if he had so strong a party in Navarre: so that after all the truth seems to be, Don Sancho was so universally beloved by his subjects, that they submitted implicitly to his will, not because he was an absolute prince, but because a long and wise administration had given them an entire confidence in him, which is true absolute power; and his nephew Don Thibaut took this extraordinary step of relinquishing what he took to be his right, as well to please the people, as to please his uncle^c, who in fact had nothing else in view, but to provide for their future happiness and perfect independency, by procuring them a potent protector when he should be no more. The course of the history, we flatter ourselves, will convince the reader, that these conjectures are founded in truth; and that Don Sancho, tho' he led a life of continual pain and misery, and was now broken with old age and many infirmities, was notwithstanding a wise, a great, and a good prince to the last.

A. D. 1232.

THE generality of historians inform us, that after this Don Sancho led a very uneasy and unsettled life, sometimes inclined to embark his adopted son the king of Arragon in a war with Castile, and at others out of humour with that prince, as well as displeased with his own subjects^d. But it is very doubtful whether these facts be true. It is at least certain, that those who report them fall into evident confusion in respect to dates, and intermix various circumstances, as to which the historians, who lived in or near those times, are altogether silent. There may, however, be good grounds to suppose, that Don Sancho might be much chagrined at the foresight of those evils that were like to come upon his subjects by his dying not only childless, but without heirs male of the whole blood. His eldest sister Berengara had married Richard king of England, who died without issue. His younger sister Donna Sancha, who espoused the count of Champagne and Brie, had left by him a son, Don Thibaut, who succeeded to his father's estates, and was now upwards of thirty, whose accession to the throne of Navarre the king judged inexpedient for himself and for the nation; for he apprehended that if he came into Navarre his hereditary possessions would suffer extremely; and that on the other hand, if he paid only a proper attention to his patrimony, it would excite great disturbances and factions in Navarre. On the other hand, the king of Arragon was descended from the male line of the kings of Navarre, his territories had been formerly united to that crown, the laws were nearly the same, and these, with other causes, had determined the king to act as he did; and for a time all parties seemed to acquiesce in his plan^e. But the people of Navarre afterwards changing their minds, we may very easily conceive how their historians came to impute to age, infirmities, and a splenetic disposition, that project of their king's, which in reality proceeded from his zeal for their welfare. However this might be, Don Sancho ended his days at Tudela on the seventh of April one thousand two hundred thirty four; in whom expired the male line of Don Garcia Iniguez, after they had held the kingdom of Navarre near four hundred years. His body was interred in the church of the monastery of the canons regular of Roncevaux, of which he is said to have been the founder^f.

THE clergy, nobility, and people of Navarre, as soon as the king was dead, determined, notwithstanding all that had passed, to call his nephew the earl of Champagne to the succession, preferring, as it seems, the independency of their crown to their own interests, which had been very excusable in Don Sancho, whatever it might be in them. However, that they might proceed with caution and safety, they sent deputies to king James of Arragon, to let him know their resolution, and to desire that he would release them from the homage which they had sworn to him, at the request, and purely with a view to gratify their deceased king, which that monarch readily granted^a. Some indeed say, that he dissembled^b, and that he afterwards endeavoured to vindicate his right by arms, which does not appear; but the contrary, as will be hereafter seen very plainly. This point being once settled, they sent Don Pedro Ramirez de Pedrola, bishop of Pampeluna, and other lords, to invite the earl of Champagne to come and accept the crown; which he very willingly did, and was with great solemnity crowned in the cathedral of that capital on the eighth of May following^c; the Pope also interposing vigorously, to prevent the transaction becoming the ground of a war. The reason of this interposition was the hopes the pontiff had that the new king would take upon him the cross, and join in an expedition for the recovery of the Holy Land, which, in pursuance of a vow made by his father, he accordingly did, tho' at the apparent hazard of his dominions. Lewis the ninth, better known by the name of St. Lewis of France, had at this time some disputes with this new king, in quality of earl of Champagne; but Pope Gregory the ninth interceded so effectually, that the king promised to suspend all his pretensions during the absence of that prince, who was now employed in raising forces in France as well as Navarre, in order to fulfil his engagement^d. With the same good intention he addressed himself to the kings of Castile and Arragon, and procured from them, without any difficulty, the strongest assurances that they would take no advantage of the king of Navarre's absence^e, whose dominions might otherwise have been easily over-run, and could hardly have been retrieved.

DON Thibaut seeing all things thus happily settled, and having received in his capital the famous Don Roderic Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo, ambassador from Castile, to convince him of the friendship and esteem of his master St. Ferdinand, he took his leave of the nobility, and having settled the government, went into France, to join the army of the Crosses^f. The dukes of Bretagne and Burgundy, the counts of Bar, Vendosme, and Montfort, with several other great lords, having taken part in the same design, chose him generalissimo of this holy league^g; and the next year embarked with a potent army at Marseilles, and other places in its neighbourhood, for Syria, where they arrived without any considerable accident. This expedition, however, though begun with the greatest hopes, ended the next year without the smallest success; for the princes quarrelling amongst themselves, and the duke of Burgundy making a very unadvised attempt upon Gaza, in which he lost the best part of his troops, this increased their misunderstandings to such a degree, that Don Thibaut, seeing plainly there was no good to be done, and that the whole army would be gradually wasted, embarked such of the troops as would obey his command, and returned into Europe, not a little chagrined at this misfortune, which, however, did no prejudice to his reputation, since it was on all hands allowed, that his behaviour was without blame; that the mischiefs which had happened arose from disobeying his orders; and that it was owing to his prudence and patience that so great a part of the army was preserved and brought home^h. His subjects received him with great satisfaction, and the posture of affairs in Spain left him at full liberty to gratify his natural inclination to improvements of all kinds, which he pursued to his own satisfaction, and to the no small pleasure of his subjects, by whom he was generally and deservedly beloved.

THE preceding monarchs of Navarre had bounded their views by erecting fortresses, churches, or convents; but Don Thibaut introduced elegance and magnificence, as well as utility. His genius, admirable in itself, had been cultivated by an excellent education, and by travel, which furnished him with notions much superior to those of princes unassisted by these advantages. He brought with him from the East many different kinds of rich fruits into his territories in France, and these he transplanted again into Navarre, to which the people of that country owe their most delicate wines, very little inferior to those of France; and an excellent sort of pears, which in honour of him, and to perpetuate the memory of this prince, are called Thibaudines. He was still more careful with regard to agriculture, which hitherto his subjects had practised but rudely and in such a manner that the soil and climate were unjustly reproached for what was in truth owing to their want of skill and application. He built some palaces himself, which remain no contemptible monuments of his taste; and, led by his

a example, many of the nobility did the like, so that in a short time the court of Navarre became one of the most brilliant in Spain^p. But as human happiness is never solid or sincere, so what Don Sancho had foreseen, in process of time came actually to pass; that is, the nobility began to form cabals against him, which he was compelled to pacify by grants of offices and lands, to the great impoverishment of his treasury, and with some diminution of his authority. The most remarkable of these disputes was that which he had with Don Pedro Jaçolas, bishop of Pampeluna, on account of the castle of St. Stephen, which belonged to that prelate, in right of his see, and which the king caused to be fortified for the benefit of his subjects; for which high offence the bishop, retiring into Aragon, cast an interdict upon his whole diocese, which threw the kingdom into the utmost confusion^q. At length, after a tedious struggle, the king accommodated matters with the bishop, who thereupon removed the excommunication^r. There remained, however, so many doubts and scruples on the minds of the more ignorant part of his subjects, that he found it absolutely requisite to go to Rome, in order to obtain a general absolution from the Pope, which was gradually granted to him^s.

AFTER his return things went on quietly enough; and he continued to govern and to adorn his territories with the love of his subjects, and the esteem of his neighbours, to the time of his decease, which happened on the eighth of July, when he was in the flower of his age, and very little turned of fifty. He had a graceful person, was excellently skilled in music and poetry, a great lover of learning and learned men. His reputation for courage so well established, that none of his neighbours were willing to provoke him; and his ambition so regulated by his respect to justice, that he made no attempts to their prejudice^t. He was thrice married; first to the daughter of the count of Metz, from whom he was divorced by the Pope, and by whom he had no issue; the second was the daughter of the lord of Beaujeu, by whom he had Donna Blanca, who espoused John, surnamed the Red, duke of Bretagne^u. His last consort was Margaret, daughter to the count de Foix, by whom he had three sons, Thibaut, Pedro, and Henry, the first and last successively kings of Navarre; and a daughter, Donna Agnes, whom others call Leonora, married ten years before her father's death to Don Alvaro Perez de Azagra, lord of Albarracin^v. On his death-bed he recommended the queen and her children to the protection of the king of Aragon, with whom he had always lived in peace and friendship. An incontestable proof that Mariana and the rest of the historians who suspect his candour, in the renunciation of his title to Navarre, injure his character. His corpse was interred in the cathedral church of Pampeluna^x.

Remainder of his reign and death.

THE same historians, who represent king James of Aragon as a dissembler in the case of Thibaut II. his renunciation, bestow on him the highest praises, in regard to that spirit and punctuality with which he executed his charge as guardian to the royal family of Navarre. They tell us that he went in person to Pampeluna; contracted an alliance offensive and defensive with the young king against Castile; treated of a marriage between him and his daughter; and entered into other engagements, which were ratified and confirmed by a subsequent treaty, after the king of Navarre became of age^y. But perhaps those come nearer the truth who content themselves with saying, the king of Aragon discharged his trust with fidelity, by which the two kingdoms enjoyed peace and happiness for several years. The queen dowager, Donna Margaret, went to make a tour into her son's estates in France, where she was seized with a distemper that very soon conducted her to her tomb, which she found in the monastery of Clervaux. The death of the queen his mother made it requisite for the young king to take a tour into France, and was on the very point of beginning his journey, when he understood that some of his subjects had made an inroad on the territories of the king of Aragon. Upon this he gave that king the strongest assurances, not only of its being done without his privity or consent, but also of his sincere intention to give him adequate satisfaction, in case any of the offenders should fall into his hands^z, by which he prevented any misunderstandings between the two crowns, and gave the world a just idea of his own character. He then proceeded in his design of visiting his territories in France, where his presence was very acceptable, and where, by his mildness and affable behaviour, he established his reputation as a most accomplished prince, which induced St. Lewis to invite him to his court, and to propose to him a very advantageous alliance, which he received with great respect, and very willingly accepted both the invitation and the proposition that attended it, as being equally honourable in itself, and very advantageous, as his affairs were then circumstanced, which was a farther proof of his penetration and capacity, and proved in many respects highly beneficial to his subjects.

He goes into France, and espouses the princess Elizabeth, or Isabel, daughter to St. Lewis.

THE precise time at which the king made this journey, and more especially that of his marriage, is not easily settled, for in the transactions of these times the more authorities that occur, the more differences commonly happen with regard to dates; but as to facts we may report them with greater certainty. King Lewis consented to his marriage with his daughter Isabel, provided he compromised the claim made by his sister the duchess of Bretagne upon parts of his estates in France, which was done by the grant of an annuity of three thousand livres per annum, which, as the French historian observes, fall but little short of thirty thousand livres at this day ^a. This and all other points being adjusted to the mutual satisfaction of both princes, the marriage was celebrated at Melun, where Don Thibaut received, as the portion of the princess Elizabeth, ten thousand livres, being the same sum that was given to her sister ^b. This marriage gave him a great interest at the court of France, which he employed in favour of his friend and guardian the king of Arragon; and was very instrumental in making that treaty by which all disputes were compromised, and all claims regulated between the two crowns ^c. He continued for some time after this in France, where he constituted his brother, the infant Don Pedro, governor of Champagne, which, however, he did not long enjoy, being removed by death when he was a very young man ^d. On his return into Navarre some disputes arose between him and his nobility, who entered into a league against him, and chose one of their number to oppose all acts of their sovereign, which they judged to be inconsistent with their privileges. But the Pope, having intelligence of this, directed the archbishop of Bordeaux to make a tour into Navarre, and to use his best endeavours to put an end to these heart-burnings and jealousies, which he did very effectually ^e. This Pope was Urban the fourth, who died the same year, as appears by the king's letters of felicitation to his successor.

THE death of his brother before-mentioned made it requisite for the king to return again into France, as well to procure a fit marriage for the infant Don Henry, his only surviving brother, as to put him in possession of the government of Champagne, and other measures for the benefit of his family. The lady upon whom he had cast his eyes was Donna Constantia, the daughter and heiress of Don Gaston de Moncada, viscount of Bearn, which would have been a very advantageous alliance if it had taken place. In his return to Navarre he received for his vassals the counts of Conforans, Comminges, and Estarac, not that their estates fell to the crown of Navarre, as some have thought, but because it was the custom in those days for the lesser nobility to engage themselves in the service of great princes, to follow them in their wars when required, for which they had an annual pension in time of peace ^f. In all probability the king might then have in view the expedition which he soon afterwards undertook. Pope Clement the fourth having prevailed upon St. Lewis of France to assume the cross, in which expedition he was accompanied by his sons-in-law Thibaut king of Navarre, and Edward prince of England; this, and the preparations requisite for assembling an army and equipping a fleet, took up a considerable space, during which the king negotiated and concluded a marriage between his brother the infant Don Henry, to whom he committed the regency, and the princess Blanch, daughter to Robert count of Artois, brother of St. Lewis, with whom he obtained the county of Rheims ^g. On the return of his brother into Navarre, he confided to queen Isabel the government of Champagne, and the rest of the territories that he held in France; and, by the interposition of St. Lewis, he renewed for five years more a truce formerly concluded under the same mediation with the king of England, in respect to the town of Bayonne, upon which he formed some pretensions. In fine, all obstacles being removed, he embarked with his troops in order to follow his father-in-law, who was already sailed with his fleet and forces to Sicily ^h; and with him went many lords of Champagne and Navarre.

His brother Don Henry governs the kingdom with much prudence in his absence.

IN the absence of the king a civil war broke out in Castile, and the infant Don Philip, who embarked therein against his father, went into Navarre, to persuade the regent to support him and the rest of the nobility in their pretensions; but tho' Don Henry might easily have drawn them to have made large concessions in his favour, with respect to those provinces and their dependencies, which had been detached from the kingdom of Navarre, with little appearance of right, in former reigns, yet he very wisely answered, that tho' he administered the government, he wanted regal authority in Navarre, and could not therefore, consistent with the trust reposed in him by his brother, enter into a measure which must involve the nation in a foreign war ⁱ. Mariana seems to intimate, that there was some jars between him and the king of Arragon, which, however, is not probable, considering the engagements he was under to the king his brother, and that himself was hardly returned to his dominions from an expedition which he had attempted with a view of passing into the Holy Land; but being shipwrecked on the coast of France, thought it more expedient to lay that design aside, and resume the government of his own territories. But if any such disputes really happened, it must have been after Don Henry became king, in his own right, and in support, as the writer before-mentioned says, of the old claim under the will of Don Sancho the eighth, which, at such a distance of time, would have been a very stale pretence, contrary to all rules of justice, and to his own conduct with respect to the father and the brother of Don Henry, as we have already stated it, in speaking of the accession of both kings ^k.

WHEN the king of Navarre arrived in Sicily, with the French lords who accompanied him, he was very much surprized to find, in the first council of war that was held, that he had not been admitted into the secret of the design, St. Lewis declaring it his intention not to proceed to Syria, but to the coast of Africa, where he intended to besiege Tunis. Thither Don Thibaut accompanied him, and was present when he died of the plague, or some other contagious distemper, before the place, on the twenty-fifth of August, as appears by a letter of the king of Navarre's writing, which is still extant, and in which he gives a very distinct account of the circumstances that attended it ^l. He did homage in the same camp to the new king Philip the Hardy, for the estates he held in France; and after the peace was made with the king of Tunis, he returned with him into Sicily, where he was scarce arrived before he fell sick at Trapani, and after a short illness deceased on the fifth of September, one thousand two hundred and seventy ^m. His queen Elizabeth or Isabel, who either accompanied or followed him, deceased likewise in the spring of the succeeding year, at or near Marseilles, on her return to France ⁿ. In the spring the corpse of the king was transported into France, and buried in the church of the convent of Cordeliers at Brie. As he was a monarch of sincere piety, endowed with many amiable qualities, and particularly remarkable for the sweetness of his temper, he was caressed and admired by all the princes his neighbours; and by his own irreproachable character maintained his dominions in peace during his whole reign, which caused him to be generally and justly lamented by his subjects.

HENRY, surnamed the Gross or the Fat, his brother dying without issue, was proclaimed king at Pampeluna, in the month of March. He is said to have been of a more reserved temper than his brother; but is allowed to have governed well in his absence, and to have supported his dignity after his accession to the throne with spirit, notwithstanding the misfortunes that he met with in his family, and the opposition given him by the infant Don Pedro of Arragon, who pretended to revive those pretensions which his father, still living, had disclaimed. This king having married the niece of St. Lewis, depended on the friendship and assistance of his cousin king Philip; and governed so steadily, that tho' his neighbours were willing enough to have given him disturbance, yet perceiving him always in a condition to defend his territories, they did not think fit to attack him ^o. He had by his queen a son, called after his father and brother Thibaut, who was bred up at Estella, where, as some writers say, his nurse let him fall out of a gallery, by which he was killed upon the spot ^p. Others affirm, that it happened thro' the carelessness of his governor, who in a fit of despair threw himself from the same gallery, and perished with him ^q. Besides this son he had a daughter, the infanta Donna Joanna, about two years old at the time this lamentable event happened, whom he immediately caused to be acknowledged heiress of the crown by the states ^r. He not long after made a treaty with Edward the first, king of England, by which he promised to give this princess in marriage to one of his sons, when she should attain to a fit age ^s. But it is very probable this circumstance was not made public, since many historians affirm, that James, king of Arragon, in hopes of marrying her to a prince of his blood, concluded an alliance with king Henry, which was of no small advantage to his affairs. He did not, however, survive long enough to avail himself of those troubles that might have given him an opportunity of recovering some of the provinces which he claimed, as dismembered from his monarchy by the kings of Castile; for, as most writers agree, he was choaked with fat on the twenty-second of July, one thousand two hundred and seventy-four, leaving his daughter sole heiress of his dominions, under the tutelage of the queen dowager ^t, whom some historians call Blanch, others Joan of Artois, and Ferreras mentions her by both names. He left likewise a natural son, born, before he was married, of the heiress of the house of Lacarra, who bore his own name, and became afterwards marshal of Navarre ^u. He was buried in the cathedral church of Pampeluna, with great solemnity; and in him ended the male line of the counts of Champagne, kings of Navarre, after having possessed that kingdom above forty years.

Donna Joanna, under the tutelage of her mother, becomes queen of Navarre at three years old.

DONNA Joanna was scarce three years old when she became a queen. It is said that her father directed by his will, that she should not marry a prince of Castile or Arragon, but of France. It is, however, not impossible, that this circumstance might be invented after such a marriage took effect. Be that as it will, the queen dowager called an assembly of the states on the twenty-seventh of August following, in order to make choice of a person who might assist her in the administration of the government, when Don Pedro Sanchez Montagu was chosen.^w Many historians assert, that this measure was absolutely against the queen's will, and that she resented it extremely; but those who lived in and nearest to these times maintain the contrary, which is indeed the most probable. It was not long before a strong party was formed against Don Pedro; at the head of which was Don Garcia de Almoravides, who had recourse to the crown of Castile for protection, which was promised him; and this obliged Don Pedro Sanchez de Montagu to apply himself to the king of Arragon, with the like success.^x As both these princes had in view the marriage of the heiress of Navarre into their families, the queen, who was equally averse to either, resolved to secure her own safety, and that of her daughter's, by flying into France, and demanding the protection of king Philip, which she accordingly did, and was received with all the respect due to her dignity, and all the kindness which her distressed circumstances required.^y This is a succinct and sincere state of the case; but as the transaction before us is in itself of a very curious nature, one of the most important that ever happened with regard to the kingdom of Navarre, and which had some degree of influence on the affairs of Europe in general, it is requisite that we should explain it more particularly; the rather, because both the French and Spanish historians, who have treated this subject, are not in all respects so impartial as one could wish; and therefore it is necessary to consider and compare the several relations they have given us, in order to discover the truth, which is all we aim at, as not having any kind of bias to sway us either on this side or on that in the dispute.^z

A. D. 1275.

Philip the Hardy contracts his son Philip the Fair to the young queen of Navarre.

At this juncture Don Alonso, surnamed the Wise, governed Castile; but, as we have shewn in another place, his administration, notwithstanding that high title, was not either steady or successful.^a His eldest son, the infant Don Ferdinand de le Cerda, was a prince of parts and spirit, but withal very ambitious. He had married Blanch, daughter of St. Lewis, by whom he had two sons, who were children at this time, of whom he intended to marry the eldest to the heiress of Navarre; and knowing the confusion the kingdom was in would prevent any army from taking the field against him, he marched with an army into the country, not doubting but that he should make a cheap and speedy conquest; and this once effected, or even in part effected, the marriage he had in view would be esteemed a favour.^b But the policy of the kings of Navarre, who kept their frontiers always well fortified, and their subjects in exact discipline, prevented this; for tho' he became master of some small open places, yet Viana, the first strong place he besieged, made so good a resistance, that, after considerable loss, he was obliged to retire.^c On the other side, James king of Arragon was grown old and feeble in body and in mind; the infant Don Pedro, his heir apparent, set up, as we have observed, a kind of claim to Navarre, but managed it with a great shew of temper and moderation; offered the states the choice of either of his sons for the young queen, and to leave him in the entire possession of the kingdom, with a promise of such succours as should be necessary to defend them against Castile.^d It was this that engaged Don Pedro Sanchez de Montagu, and other noblemen of the first houses in Navarre, to lean to his party; so that the kingdom in general, most of the great towns in particular, and the city of Pampeluna more especially, stood divided into three factions, the Castilian, the Arragonian, and the French. Philip the Hardy had received and succoured the queen with great generosity; but he likewise had his views, and was in truth more nearly interested than either of the other princes.^e The young queen was heiress of Champagne and Brie, in the very heart of his dominions: he judged, therefore, and it was very natural for him to judge, that there could not be a more expedient match for this young princess than one of his sons, and he had three by his first queen, Lewis, Philip, and Charles. His own inclination was to marry her to the eldest; but Pope Gregory the tenth, though he had a great kindness for the king, would not hear of this; and a dispensation, according to the mode of those times, being necessary, he was obliged to accept that favour in behalf of Philip, who espoused, or rather was contracted to that princess, by the consent of the queen her mother.^f and this answered the king's purpose much better than his own choice would have done; for Lewis being quickly after poisoned, Philip became his heir, and consequently all the dominions and estates of the young a queen, which was what he aimed at, were annexed to the crown ^z. Having stated this matter clearly, let us now proceed to the thread of the history.

As soon as things were thus far settled, the queen dowager of Navarre, by the advice of king Philip, declared Eustace de Beaumarchais, seneschal of Thoulouse, viceroy or regent of Navarre, and sent him with a good corps of troops to take possession of his government. He met with greater success than could well have been expected; for he not only penetrated into Navarre, but got possession also of part of the city of Pampeluna ^h. A foreigner, with the title of regent, supported by an army of strangers, could not be very welcome to a free people, who had enjoyed them long, and were therefore very jealous of their liberties. But Eustace was a wise man, behaved with great moderation to such as submitted, and punished those who, taking advantage of the situation things were in, committed either murders or robberies, with great severity, which soon gained him respect, and in process of time affection ⁱ. However, Don Garcia Almoravides held one part of the city, with his faction, in favour of Castile; Don Pedro Sanchez de Montagu had also a corps of troops without, and looking upon Eustace as one who had deprived him of his post, patched up an agreement with Don Garcia, constrained the French viceroy and his garrison to retire into the castle, and held them there besieged. As soon as this was known in France, an army was assembled for the relief of Navarre, and the command of it given to the king's uncle, Robert count of Artois, and father to the queen dowager ^k. The malcontents had seized all the passes in Navarre; but the count, making a feint, marched his army through the territories of Arragon, and appeared before Pampeluna on Christmas-eve. Don Garcia de Almoravides, suspecting Don Pedro de Montagu, caused him to be assassinated, and demanded very importunately the aid of Castile: upon which Don Alonso marched a powerful army to support him; but understanding the strength of the count of Artois, and how well he was posted, suddenly retired ^l. Don Garcia, having early intelligence of this, pretended to receive news of a very different kind; and causing great rejoicings to be made in that quarter of the town which he held, took an opportunity in the night to slip out, and withdrew with his chief partizans into the dominions of Castile. His faction, thus deserted, sent to the count of Artois to demand terms, who directed the constable Imbert to settle the capitulation. While this was doing, some of the foldiers, perceiving that the garrison had quitted their posts, scaled the walls, and having admitted their companions, put to the sword all they met with; so that greater cruelties were scarce ever exercised than in this place. At length the viceroy, issuing from the castle with his garrison, put an end to these disorders, and protected the people that were left. He afterwards recovered as much of the plunder as he was able; and, by restoring it to the right owners, acquired much honour and esteem, from an event that must otherwise have rendered the French nation odious in Navarre to the last degree ^m.

COUNT Robert of Artois, perceiving how great a terror this had struck throughout the whole kingdom, and being very strongly solicited by such as had firmly adhered to the interests of the two queens, followed his blow, and speedily reduced the whole kingdom, a few castles on the frontiers only excepted, which being in the hands of the malcontents, they had time to call in the Castilians or the Arragoneses to their assistance ⁿ. The war being very warm between the crowns of France and Castile, on account of the setting aside of the children of the infant Don Ferdinand de la Cerda, Don Alonso the Wise desired a conference with the count of Artois, who, by the permission of the king of France, made a tour to his court, and left the command of the army, as well as the direction of civil affairs, to the viceroy Eustace Beaumarchais, who brought all things into good order, and made the people of Navarre very sensible that their welfare was the principal object of his care ^o. His successors followed his example closely, which by degrees reconciled the whole nation to a match, which at first appeared to them in the light of a great misfortune. It may be, the comparison of their own circumstances with those of the subjects of Castile and Arragon might contribute to keep up this disposition, since both countries were at this time perplexed with civil and foreign wars, which spread discord and distress quite through them, and in a short space of time exhausted their wealth and power ^p.

WHEN the young queen Donna Joanna entered into her fifteenth year, the marriage was solemnized with great magnificence between her and the French prince Philip, afterwards sur-named le Bel, or the Fair, who was then about seventeen, and who assumed the title of Philip king of Navarre, till by the death of his father he added it to that of France ^q. This marriage was extremely pleasing to the inhabitants of Champagne and Brie, and not disagreeable to the people of Navarre, who, by the assistance they had received from France, had rendered themselves so formidable to the subjects of Arragon, that even the haughty Don Pedro A. D. 1284. was glad to negotiate a truce, which they were suffered to conclude, though the war continued as warm as ever between that kingdom and France^a. Thus we have conducted this history to the end of the period prescribed to this section, and to its first conjunction with that crown, to which, in title at least, it stands at present united.

S E C T. IV.

From the union of Navarre with the crown of France, in the person of Philip, to its conjunction with those of Arragon and Sicily.

The war continues between France and Arragon to the death of both kings.

THE disputes between Philip the Hardy and Don Alonso the Sage, king of Castile, ran very high, and brought both monarchs sometimes into the field, but negotiations generally intervened; and as war was alike difficult to both parties, so, without reconciliation or friendship, interest drew them from time to time to conclude truce after truce^a. The chief reason of this was, that if France had made war in earnest, the seat of war must have been in Navarre, which being at this juncture united to France, she was inclined to spare. But it was far otherwise with regard to king Philip's quarrel with the house of Arragon, on the score of the Sicilian Vespers, in which the French having received a national injury, the king employed the whole force of his realm to revenge it, supporting at that time the thunder of Rome by that of his arms^b. King Philip of Navarre attended his father in his expedition into Catalonia; in which, with a prodigious expence of men and money, he with much difficulty made himself master of Gironne: a conquest equally dear to both kings; for Don Pedro of Arragon soon after breathed his last, chiefly through the excess of fatigue which he had endured in the last campaign; and king Philip expired at Perpignan, in his return to his own dominions, of a disease which he had got at the siege^c. These wars, however ruinous to other countries, were highly serviceable and beneficial to Navarre, where the viceroys, though frequently changed, were all of them tied by their instructions to act upon the same plan; and this consisted in the improvement of the interior part of the country, and in finding employment for restless spirits on the frontiers, or sending them to exercise their valour in the armies of France, where they were always well received, and some of the nobility highly advanced and amply rewarded^d.

History of the transactions in Navarre, to the death of Donna Joanna I.

PHILIP the Fair, now king of both realms, in right of himself and his consort, pursued the war against Arragon with vigour, but continued the truces with Castile to the demise of king Sancho, when the viceroys of Navarre altered their measures, adjusted their differences with Arragon, and endeavoured to avail themselves of those intestine troubles which disturbed the kingdom of Castile. The apparent reason of this alteration in their conduct, was the conjunction of the two crowns, in favour of Don Alonso de Cerda, whom they pretended to advance to the thrones of Castile and Leon; but the genuine and real cause, upon which they acted, was to extend the territories of Navarre and Arragon at the expence of the young monarch of Castile, whose affairs were administered by the queen-dowager his mother^e. It was to save appearances in some measure that Alonso de Roleed, being viceroy of Navarre, and very active in this confederacy, sent a knight of Navarre, with a message, to the queen regent of Castile, demanding restitution of all the places and provinces of which their majesties predecessors had been despoiled by the ancestors of the king of Castile; and this claim went as far as Atapuerca, at no great distance from Burgos. The queen gave a soft answer, and the viceroy, having obtained his master's consent, acknowledged Don Alonso de la Cerda for king of Castile, by which all the country as far as the river Oia was yielded to Navarre^f. But king Philip, being engaged in the war of Flanders, could not assist the confederates so powerfully as to enable Don Alonso to comply with his agreement. While this war was carried on slowly, and with little success, died Donna Joanna, queen of Navarre, on the fourth of April, one thousand three hundred and five, when she had borne that title thirty-one years^g. The most memorable action of her life was the building the college of Navarre at Paris, for promoting useful literature, and which she liberally endowed with lands in her county of Champagne. She had by her husband the following children, Lewis, Philip, and Charles, successively kings of France, Robert who died young, Margaret, Isabel who espoused Edward the second of ^a England, in whose right Edward the third her son claimed the French crown; and Blanch who died young ^b. This queen is much blamed for her hatred to the Flemings ^c.

LEWIS HUTIN, that is the Quarrelsome, assumed the title of king of Navarre, on his mother's death, being then about fifteen years old; and espoused the same year Margaret, daughter to Robert duke of Burgundy, by Agnes, daughter of St. Lewis ^k. The death of the queen was no sooner known in her dominions, than the states of Navarre sent a deputation to the court of France, desiring that their young king might be sent into his own dominions; which demand they supported by so many reasons, that both the kings admitted them to be just, and promised to comply with them. The circumstances of their affairs, however, were such, that it was two years before he went thither; and on his arrival at Pampeluna, was solemnly crowned in the cathedral, with the acclamations of all his subjects ^l. He did not continue to reside there long; and even during his stay, there happened some disputes, occasioned by his imprisoning two noblemen of Navarre, who had opposed the French viceroys, and whom he carried with him at his return into France. He was likewise attended by two hundred young noblemen and gentlemen, all of whom he provided for, and thereby attached so many families to his person and government, as rendered his administration quieter than otherwise it would have been ^m. The quarrels on the frontiers of Arragon were about this time renewed, which James, then king of that country, so much resented, that he sent an army to invade Navarre, which was defeated, and the royal standard of Arragon taken by the militia of the town of Sanguessa; for which reason, by a grant from Lewis Hutin, they have borne it ever since in their arms ⁿ. The king of Navarre being at Lyons, to pacify some troubles that had arisen there, a strange misfortune befel him and all the royal family; for Margaret, queen of Navarre, Jane, wife to his brother Philip, and Blanch of Burgundy, who had espoused prince Charles, were all charged with adultery; and the first and last of these princesses were on a strict trial found guilty, and imprisoned in the castle of Galliard, where not long after the queen of Navarre was strangled by her husband's orders ^o, now become king of France by his father's death. He then married the princess Clemence of Hungary, and died after a very short and troublesome reign, June the fifth, one thousand three hundred and sixteen, at the castle of Vincennes, as is said of poison ^p. At his decease he left one daughter, Donna Joanna, by his first queen, and his new-married princess big with child, which threw the affairs of both kingdoms into some confusion ^q. At length Philip, surnamed the Long, brother to the deceased king, was declared regent of France and Navarre, till the king, in case the queen should be delivered of a son, attained the age of fourteen. This happened, and the son was baptized by the name of John; but as he lived only a week, his name was never inserted in the lists either of the kings of France or Navarre, though he had an unquestionable title to both, and, one would have thought, should have been proclaimed upon his birth ^r.

PHILIP THE LONG, so called from his extraordinary stature, assumed the regal title immediately upon the death of his nephew, and made all the haste he could to be crowned. But notwithstanding this, Eudes duke of Burgundy, uncle to Donna Joanna, the daughter of Lewis Hutin, declared publicly, that her right to Navarre was incontestable, and that he held her claim to the crown of France to be as good ^s. In this he was supported by the count of Nevers, the dauphin of Viennois, and, which is very extraordinary, by Charles the Fair, the king's only brother. Their intrigues did not hinder his coronation, and his right was afterwards solemnly confirmed by an assembly of the nobility and clergy ^t. However, to appease the malcontents, he gave his eldest sister in marriage to the duke of Burgundy, with the county of the same title, another sister to the dauphin, and conferred various favours on the rest, which had so good an effect, that he assumed the title also of king of Navarre, to the apparent prejudice of his niece, but without the least contradiction from the duke of Burgundy ^u. He did not long enjoy the regal dignity. As to the kingdom of Navarre, he added to the viceroy a royal council, that his power might be the more restrained, and that a greater number of ears might be open to justice. His only son Lewis died in his cradle; and he died himself on the third of January, one thousand three hundred twenty-two ^v.

CHARLES THE FAIR succeeded his brother, and assumed the title of Navarre as well as Charles the Fair assumed the title of king of Navarre, to the prejudice of his niece. though the young queen was already married to Philip count of Evreux, son to Lewis count of Evreux, brother to Philip le Bel, who espoused the queen of Navarre; but in truth she was still a child, and therefore it was said, that Charles only assumed the title, as his brother had done, in quality of guardian to his niece ^x. He had as little inclination as his predecessor to visit that country, where the nobility on the frontiers took great liberties, and made frequent a excursions into the territories of Castile and Arragon, which provoked their neighbours to make reprisals; for which, in return, the people of Navarre were not at all slow in taking revenge. In one of these expeditions they received a severe check at Baltibar, wherein the best part of their troops were cut off by the inhabitants of Guipuscoa^r. On the side of Arragon they were more successful, insomuch that the king of that country complained to king Charles in France, who promised redress, and sent orders for that purpose into Navarre, which were but indifferently obeyed. It seems the nobility had no great opinion of the uprightness of his intention; for when Alonso Robora, his viceroy, demanded an oath of allegiance, they absolutely refused it, insisting, that in Navarre, though they obeyed their b princes wherever they were, yet they never swore to any but in their presence². The disorders that had broke out in the former reign increased extremely under this; insomuch that all things had a strong tendency to anarchy and confusion, at the time of this monarch's death, which happened the first of February, one thousand three hundred twenty-eight, when he had just entered the seventh year of his reign³. At the time of his demise he left his queen, the sister of the count de Evreux, big with child, upon which Philip de Valois, son of Charles de Valois, and grandson of Philip the Hardy, in quality of first prince of the blood, was declared regent of France, not without some distaste to the rest, of whom there were about thirty^b.

Donna Joanna THE death of king Charles was no sooner known in Navarre, than the common people laid c hold of this as a favourable occasion to wreak their spleen on a race of men whom they hated beyond measure, and who, it is not improbable, might have given too much cause for their hate. These were the Jews, of whom vast numbers were settled in Navarre, since it fell under the dominion of France, and more especially after their expulsion out of that kingdom, towards the close of the reign of Philip the Long^c. These the commons of Navarre accused of oppression and extortion; and falling first upon those of foul characters, extended their insolence and rapine by degrees, till they plundered and murdered, as some historians relate, not fewer than ten thousand^d. In order to appease these tumults, the viceroy and his council summoned the clergy and nobility to assemble at Pont-a-la-Royne, where they took order indeed for suppressing those disturbances; but instead of putting an end to their sessions, the states adjourned to Pampeluna, where they undertook to examine and decide the disputes that d had arisen about the succession of the crown^e. The daughters of Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, put in their claims, on account of their father's dying, as they affirmed, possessed of the crown of Navarre; which was but little regarded. But Edward the third of England had a strong party. His pretensions arose from his being the son of Isabel, the daughter of Philip the Fair, by Joanna queen of Navarre^f. At length, after much debate and mature deliberation, the states took upon them to declare, that the right was in Joanna, daughter to Lewis Hutin, the son of Philip the Fair, by Joanna queen of Navarre^g. Philip de Valois, in the same assembly which decided in favour of his right against Edward the third, disclaimed all pretensions to Navarre, which he acknowledged to belong to Philip count of Evreux, his brother-in-law, in right of his consort^h. But the states of Navarre did not either wait for or e take notice of this; but proclaimed her queen immediately, appointing Don Juan Corboran de Lebet, and Don Juan Martinez de Medrano, lord of Arroniz, to administer public affairs in her name, with the title of regentsⁱ. A solemn embassy was also sent to Rome, in the name of the queen, which was extremely well received. As for the counties of Champagne and Brie, both the French and Spanish historians say, that Philip de Valois gave his brother-in-law, Philip de Evreux, Angouleme, Molain, and Longueville, for them; but this is a matter not to be run over lightly, and which deserves a strict discussion, as it will enable us to form a right idea of the terms upon which the two last kings, Philip and Charles, held the country of Navarre, and their kind intentions towards their niece^k.

The king and queen of Na- THE states of Navarre, in pursuance of what they had already done, sent to invite their f sovereign queen Joanna, and her consort Philip de Evreux, to Pampeluna, which, with the consent of the French king, they accepted, and upon their arrival were received with all possible marks of joy as well as respect^l. When these transports were a little over, the states acquainted Philip the third, and Joanna the second, so they were now stiled, that it was with unfeigned pleasure and satisfaction they beheld their lawful sovereigns in the capital of their dominions; but that it was fit they should be informed, that, as for many years past there had been scarce any face of government, by which their subjects were not only grievous sufferers, a but also the form, and even the essence of their ancient constitution in danger of being lost, they took it therefore to be for their honour and interest, as they were sure it was their duty, to restore both: that they had sufficiently shewn a spirit of justice and loyalty in asserting their rights, and bringing them to the peaceable possession of their dignity; but having done this, they were now bound to discharge their trust to the people, which they could no otherwise perform than by presenting them a bill of rights, to the due observance of which they were to swear at the time of their inauguration; beseeching them to believe, that as their freedom consisted in living according to the known laws of Navarre, so the prerogative and succession of the crown being described and ascertained by those laws, they were ready to support and defend both^m. The king and queen accepted this paper very graciously, and having signified their approbation of it, were solemnly crowned in the cathedral of Pampeluna, on the fifth of March, with the universal applause of their faithful subjectsⁿ. At the same time they swore to the maintenance of the people's rights; and what these were will appear at the bottom of the page (A). By this firmness in the states the old constitution in the kingdom was revived and confirmed.

A. D. 1329.

KING Philip being invited by his brother-in-law to accompany him in his wars in Flanders, he returned into France, but left the queen at Pampeluna; and having given great proofs of valour in the famous battle of Cassel, he returned into his own dominions^o. He had not been long at home before he clearly perceived that the power of Don Alonso of Castile was so great, that war could not be undertaken against him with any probability of success; and that, on the other hand, the disordered state of their own dominions required such regulations, as could never be carried into execution but in a time of profound peace. These reasons determined the king and queen first to complete the one, and then to attempt the other, which resolution of theirs, as it was wisely taken, so it was also worthily performed. Their ambassadors acquainted the king of Castile, that as it was many years since their dominions had enjoyed the presence of a sovereign, they were not unacquainted that some extravagancies had been committed, more especially by their youth upon the frontiers; that being now in Navarre, they determined to put an end to such practices, to live in strict friendship with all their neighbours, and to respect in a particular degree the king of Castile. Don Alonso knew the motives and the scope of this embassy, which fell exactly in with his views. He answered, therefore, that he rejoiced sincerely to see the lawful sovereigns of Navarre in quiet possession of their dominions; that he was well pleased to find they entertained such just notions of their own affairs; that he accepted their kind offers, and would maintain the peace between the two crowns with the utmost punctuality^p. This great affair thus adjusted, their majesties made a thorough reform throughout their dominions; placed natives in all posts of honour and profit, civil and military; and having established a new parliament to redress grievances, and to render justice in all causes, and to all persons, they named such to have seats and voices therein as were recommended to them by the states, which gave great content^q.

The king returns into France, and after some time goes back into Navarre.

It was not long after this that either the affairs or the inclinations of the king and queen led them back to the court of France, leaving Henry de Solibert, or, as he is more generally called, Henry de Solis, their viceroy in Navarre, but with a power more limited than that of former viceroys^r. He judged the most effectual method of extending this, was to fall in with the passions of the nation. It was with this view that he set on foot a negotiation for the

(A) We may justly stile these articles the bill of rights in the kingdom of Navarre; and as we have in these an authentic sketch of the old constitution in this legal and limited monarchy, it may afford the reader great pleasure to review and to reflect upon it. They might be reduced to ten (1). I. To maintain the rights, laws, customs, liberties, and privileges of the realm, written and not written, and not to diminish but rather augment them. II. That they should disannul all that had been done to the prejudice thereof by the kings their predecessors, and by their ministers, without delay. III. That for the term of twelve years they should not coin any money, but such as was then current within the realm, and that during their lives they should not coin above one sort of new money. IV. That they should not receive into their service above four strangers. V. That the command of forts and garrisons of the realm should be given to gentlemen born and dwelling in the country, who should do homage to the queen, and promise to hold them for her and the lawful heir. VI. That they should not exchange nor involve the realm for any other state whatsoever. VII. That they should not sell nor mortgage any of the revenues of the crown, or do any act to prejudice the realm, nor against them that by law were to succeed. VIII. That to the eldest son which God should give them, coming to the age of twenty years, they should leave the kingdom free and without factions, upon condition that the states should pay unto them for their expences a hundred thousand pieces of gold. IX. That if God gave them no children, in that case they should leave the realm after them free, with the forts in the hands of the states, to invest in them those to whom by right they should belong. X. That if they infringe any of these articles, or any part of them, their subjects should be looked on as free from their oath of subjection.

marriage of the infanta Joanna of Navarre, with the infant Don Pedro of Arragon, in order, with the assistance of that crown, to fall upon the dominions of Castile, where he had long had a close correspondence with the malcontents. In the course of this negotiation Don Pedro altered his mind, and made choice of the younger sister Donna Maria, which was soon after concluded, and ratified by an assembly of the states^a. This alliance had no sooner taken effect, than the viceroy and his new ally began to assemble an army for the invasion of Castile. Don Alonso endeavoured to prevent this, by informing Henry de Solis, that if his subjects had done any wrong to those of Navarre, he was ready to make satisfaction. The viceroy was so bent upon the war, that he knew not what would content him; and besides he thought he had taken his measures so well, that victory and conquest must of necessity attend his arms^b. In conjunction, therefore, with the troops of Arragon, he made an irruption into Castile, where, chiefly through his own temerity and indiscretion, he was heartily beaten, as we have shewn in the history of that kingdom: however, Gaston count de Foix, embarking in this quarrel, the fortune of war might have changed, if the court of France had not interfered; first, in obliging the count de Foix to return into his own dominions; and, next, in prevailing on the king of Navarre to consent to a negotiation^c. The reason of this moderate and just behaviour in the French monarch, was the distress of his affairs through the war with England. By this interposition, therefore, a kind of congress was established at Pampeluna, under the mediation of the archbishop of Rheims; their majesties of Navarre having also sent a new viceroy, Salazin de Anglera, with full powers, to conclude a peace; which was soon after signed, upon terms very honourable for them^d.

Don Philip

III. dies of an indisposition, siege of Alge-

zira in Andalusia.

In some time after the peace was concluded between Arragon and Castile, Don Pedro, now seated on the throne of the first-mentioned kingdom, consummated the marriage concluded some years before with the infanta Maria of Navarre. As soon as the affairs of France permitted him to retire with decency, king Philip resolved to return into his own dominions, together with the queen his spouse, where their presence was become highly necessary^e. These disorders were scarce redressed before the news of the siege of Algezira, carried on by Don Alonso of Castile against the Moors, alarmed in a manner all Christendom. We have described it particularly elsewhere, and therefore shall say nothing of it here but what is strictly connected with our subject. The king of Navarre piqued himself so much on the character of an accomplished Christian knight, that he resolved to present himself before the walls of Algezira. He sent provisions and his equipage by sea; and with a small corps of choice troops marched by land into Andalusia. He had all the honours paid him in his passage that would have been paid to Don Alonso himself; and on his arrival in the camp was treated with all possible marks of respect^f. His conduct and his valour are highly commended by Spanish historians; but through some irregularity in his diet, he was seized with a malignant fever, which obliged him to retire; and his malady increasing, he died at Xeres, in his return home, on the twenty-sixth of September, one thousand three hundred forty-three, in the sixteenth year of his reign. His body was carried to Pampeluna by his troops, having all possible honours shewn it in its passage, and was there interred in a manner suitable to his rank^g. His memory was highly revered in Spain.

Death of queen

THE queen Donna Joanna governed the kingdom of Navarre, after her husband's decease, with equal dignity and discretion. She made choice of the wisest and ablest of her subjects, to whom she gave a place in her council, and regulated all her actions by their advice^a. Her affection to France induced her to send a body of good troops to the assistance of king Philip, in whose service they acquired great reputation^b. The martial spirit of the nation, however, gave her some trouble; for the inhabitants of Tudela and Corella having made an inroad into Castile, on account of some differences they had with the people of Alfaro, the inhabitants of the marches of Castile assembled to revenge this breach of the peace; but the king Don Alonso, out of pure regard to the queen, restrained them, and took upon himself to make them satisfaction. But what happened once on the side of Castile fell out often on that of Arragon, and yet Don Pedro seldom troubled her with complaints. He knew that it was against the queen's intentions, and that she had done all she could to prevent it; and he knew that a war would only increase the evil, which, by strengthening his frontiers, and such other methods as prudence directed, he laboured to remove. Besides, he knew the queen had a great influence in the court of France, which she was always ready to exert on his behalf^c. The death of Bona of Luxemburgh, the wife of John duke of Normandy, eldest son to the French king, gave that monarch an opportunity of shewing his high respect for this princess, since he a immediately thought of a marriage between her daughter Donna Blanca, or Blanch, and the heir apparent of his crown. At his request, therefore, the queen conducted her to court, where the king, who was but lately become a widower, was so much struck with her beauty and merit, that he married her himself, notwithstanding the inequality of their age^d. The queen of Navarre did not long enjoy this felicity, for the marriage was solemnized in the month of August, and Donna Joanna died at Conflans on the sixth of October following, in the twenty-third year of her reign, and was buried in the monastery of St. Dennis, near the body of king Lewis Hutin her father^e, of whom she looked on herself as the sole heiress.

b This princess, by Philip of Eureux her consort, had Charles, who succeeded to the kingdom of Navarre; Philip count of Longueville and Normandy; Lewis count of Beaumont le Rogere, c who had a son of the same name, who espoused the daughter of the count of Mauleon, and became standard-bearer of the kingdom of Navarre. After the death of this countess, he espoused Joanna, daughter and heiress of the duke de Duros^f. Their daughters were Joanna, who espoused the viscount de Roban, after she had been refused by the king of Arragon; Maria, who married that prince; Blanch, the last wife of the French king Philip de Valois; and Agnes, who espoused Gaston Phœbus, count of Faix. These alliances, almost wholly owing to the consummate prudence and high reputation of the queen, had rendered the house of Navarre infinitely more powerful than in times past, and gave them so great a weight both in France and in Spain, as made them much more considered and respected than could have resulted from their dominions; though these were so situated, and their subjects had acquired so great a character for their military virtues, that they might, generally speaking, have held the balance, before the rest of the kingdoms of Spain came to be united under one head^g. But all these advantages, though great in themselves, required such a degree of prudence, and such a dexterity in management, as is very rare amongst princes; and therefore it might have been easily foreseen, upon the death of queen Joanna, that the next reign must either have been the most glorious, or the most unhappy to the people of Navarre, that they had ever seen. The character of the young prince, heir apparent of their crown, gave them reason to hope the former; but experience taught them, that nations may be sometimes deceived in prospects of affection as well as parents.

d CHARLES LE MAUVAIS, or, as the Spanish writers stile him, Don Carlos the Wicked, succeeded his mother; and having attended her into France, in order to be present at his sister's marriage, received there the deputies of the states, who came to invite him home. This young prince was then in the eighteenth year of his age, had been brought up chiefly in the court of France, and was one of the most accomplished persons of his time^h. He was courteous, well-bred, eloquent in a supreme degree, easy in his address, popular without losing his dignity: qualities which attracted the admiration of all Europe before he ascended the throne, and which he afterwards abused in such a manner, as to be the object of their detestationⁱ. He received the addresses of his subjects very graciously, and promised, that as soon as he had adjusted some affairs of great consequence to his family in France, he would return to Navarre. He did so; and after making the usual concessions, and taking the accustomed oaths, he was
 e crowned with great solemnity, in the cathedral church of Pampeluna, on the twenty-seventh of June^k. There broke out not long after a rebellion, under pretence of a violation of privileges: in which, it is said, the king was not at all to blame; but having dissipated these mutineers, he punished many of them with such severity on the Pont de Meluce, which is less than a mile from Pampeluna, that it alarmed his subjects, and gave them an ill impression of a reign, the first page in the annals of which was marked with blood^l. But the king troubled his head little with what was said: he followed on all occasions his own opinion; and though he changed this very often, yet it was commonly without reason, and always without advice.

f DON Pedro the Cruel had just mounted the throne of Castile. In point of age there was no great inequality, and in point of temper these princes were but too like each other. Don Carlos, who was really a politician, believed it to be for his interest to have a personal acquaintance with the princes who were his neighbours. He took therefore the first fair occasion of making a tour to Burgos; and the Spanish writers say, that there never was any interview more magnificent, or better conducted^m. The two kings were as yet unstained in their characters; young, gay, and splendid in their courts; extremely well pleased, and perfectly complaisant one to the other; so that the alliances between the two courts were speedily concluded; and they parted, as they met, with equal satisfaction on both sidesⁿ. This interview did not at all please Don Pedro, king of Arragon, who hated Don Pedro of Castile, and was jealous of Don Carlos. He sent, therefore, two lords of great distinction to the court of Pampeluna, to renew the treaty between the crowns of Aragon and Navarre; to offer him a princess of the house of Sicily; to desire him to hinder the marriage of the king of Castile with queen Blanch; and to request an interview. Don Carlos renewed the treaty; excused himself on the subject of the marriage, as being desirous to match in France; assured him that his fears, as to his sister, were ill grounded, since the dowagers of that crown did not contract second marriages; and consented to the interview, which took place about Midsummer at Monblanc, where, after several conferences, the monarchs parted with less opinion of each other than before the interview^o. He spent the autumn in Languedoc, where he had the title of his lieutenant from the French king John, and where he acted with almost absolute authority^p.

He goes to the French court, espouses the princess Joanna, and becomes notwithstanding a mal-content. A. D. 1353. It was now time for him to make his appearance at the French court, where he had great views. He began with demanding the counties of Champagne and Brie, and formed pretensions also upon the duchy of Burgundy. The king was not much inclined to give him satisfaction; but to soothe and soften him, if possible, he gave him his sister the princess Joanna^a. As this was one of the points Don Carlos had in view, it was very acceptable; but it was scarce celebrated before he set up new demands; for the truce being expired with England, he thought king John durst deny him nothing. He complained that Angoulême had suffered so much during the war, that he drew nothing from it. King John thereupon gave him the towns of Mante and Meulan in exchange, with which he was very well pleased, as it strengthened his interest in Normandy, where he was desirous of making himself considerable^r. But it happened unluckily that the king bestowed the county Angoulême upon the constable Charles of Spain, who was his favourite. This Charles was the son of Don Alonso de la Cerda, and the king of Navarre hated him mortally. This gift of a county, that had been his, inflamed him to such a degree, that hearing the constable, who suspected nothing, was at Aigle in Normandy, he went thither with his brother Philip, and a small retinue of determined men, surrounded the inn where the constable was, and caused him to be murdered in his bed^s. In order to avoid the punishment due for this murder, his next thing was to raise a rebellion. He fortified several places in Normandy; wrote circular letters, to justify what he had done, to most of the great cities in France; and entered into a correspondence with John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, son to Edward the third. King John found himself at this time in great perplexity: his dignity and his disposition inclined him to severity; but he found it equally dangerous to declare his resentments, or to dissemble them: yet, upon mature deliberation, the last seemed most expedient; the two queens-dowagers of France, one the aunt and the other the sister of the king of Navarre, interposing powerfully on his behalf^t.

A formal but insincere reconciliation between the two kings, thro' the mediation of the dowagers. 1354. A NEGOCIATION being set on foot, the king of Navarre made very high demands in satisfaction for his pretensions to Champagne and Brie; and king John, who had already taken his resolution to content him, if it was possible, after a little altercation, consented to them all, provided the king of Navarre came and demanded pardon in person for his offence; to which he yielded: but, on the other hand, insisted on having the king's son, the duke of Anjou, as a hostage for his safety; to which, the necessity of his affairs requiring it, the king consented^u. Things being thus settled, the king held his solemn bed of justice, where the king of Navarre appeared, excused himself for the death of the constable, which he acknowledged to have been done by his orders, but upon just motives, as at a proper time he promised to shew; expressed great sorrow for the offence given to the king; and desired that he would be graciously pleased to pardon him. King John ordered the constable of Bourbon to arrest him, which he did, and carried him prisoner out of the court. The two dowagers, his aunt and sister, then threw themselves at the king's feet, to implore his grace; and after some time the constable was ordered to produce his prisoner; and the king having granted him his pardon, according to what had been stipulated, he was set at liberty; but, as the reader will easily believe, the two kings were far from being reconciled^v. Charles after this retired into Normandy, where he fortified most of the towns in his possession, and put strong garrisons into such as were capable of making the best defence^w. He then went secretly to Avignon, where conferences were held for a peace between the crowns of France and England; and having had several private interviews with the duke of Lancaster, he withdrew with all possible secrecy into Navarre, with a resolution to carry into execution, in a proper season, the measures he had concerted.

He contrives new schemes to the prejudice of king John, and. THESE proceedings being made known to king John, he marched immediately with a considerable army into Normandy, and seized the best part of the estates which the king of Navarre held there into his hands; but Eureux, Pont-au-demer, Chebourg, Avranches, Mortain, and Gavre, were too strong, and their garrisons too numerous, to be reduced. The king

- a of Navarre demanded a safe conduct, and offered to clear himself of all that was laid to his charge. King John granted it; but instead of coming in the manner he expected, he landed at Cherbourg, in the month of August, with a body of troops. However, he entered into a new negociation; and, upon the promise of a hundred thousand crowns, professed that he was fully satisfied, and that he meant not to set up any farther claim or pretence^y. In the month of September he went to Paris, saw the king, and gave him in person the same assurances; which he either believed or seemed to believe, so that they parted in all appearance good friends. But in the beginning of the next year the king of Navarre acted a new part; and setting up for a patriot, endeavoured to hinder the king from levying taxes and impositions, tho' by authority of the states of France. This offended the king but very slightly, in comparison of an intrigue which he had been some time carrying on, and which was now discovered^z. He had seduced the dauphin Charles, then about eighteen, and by that pestilent eloquence, of which he was master, persuaded him that he was extremely ill used in not having a government. He advised him, therefore, to retire to the court of his uncle, the emperor Charles the fourth; promised to accompany him thither; and laid down a method of proceeding, by which the king's person was to be seized; after which he was to be dealt with as they thought expedient. The king pardoned his son, and gave him the duchy of Normandy; upon which he gave a hint to the king of Navarre, that they were suspected, and all things were buried in oblivion for the present, that is, in appearance; for the dauphin seemed to be deterred from acting by the king's suspicions, but to persist in his sentiments^a.
- b This young prince, to make some amends for his offence, or rather in consequence of that disposition which led him into it, contrived, in conjunction with his father, to seize the king of Navarre, with whom he still lived in all possible intimacy. That the blow might be the more effectually struck, they would precipitate nothing. At length the dauphin invited the king of Navarre, and some of the principal persons of his party, to dine with him, on the fifth of April, in the castle of Rouen, where they were surprised, just as they were sitting down to table, by the king in person, having with him his brother the duke of Orleans, his son the count de Anjou, some other great lords, and a handful of resolute men^b. The king caused the count de Harcourt, the Lords of Gravelle and Maubue, and Oliver Doublet, to be beheaded in a field adjacent. The next day the king of Navarre was carried prisoner to the castle of Gaillard, and transferred from thence to the chatelet at Paris. His schemes, however, were so well contrived, that what king John hoped would have put an end to them all, served rather to promote them^c. His brother Philip put himself at the head of the troops; Jeffry Harcourt raised a great party in Normandy, to revenge the death of his brother; the duke of Lancaster quickly landed with a reinforcement from England; and Lewis, the king of Navarre's third brother, went into that kingdom to take the best measures he could to spread confusion on all sides, and, if possible, to engage the king of Arragon to break with France, and to make an irruption into the provinces adjacent to his dominions. It is true, that a part of these schemes failed; but it is also true, that the greatest part of them took effect; insomuch that Don Carlos was more at ease in his prison, notwithstanding he was threatened with a process against him for treason, than the king, whose prisoner he was, and who became himself a prisoner the next year, by the loss of the battle of Poitiers to the English^d.
- c CHARLES of Navarre had been removed, that he might be more safely kept, to the castle of Arleux in Cambresis; and after king John was taken prisoner, and all France in confusion, his brother Don Philip resolved to make some bold attempt for restoring him to his liberty. With this view Don Roderic Urtiz, Don Corbaran Lebet, Don Ferdinand Ayanz, and Don Carlos d'Artieda, four valiant knights as any in his service, accompanied by a few determined persons, and conducted by John the brother of Monsieur de Pequinez, to whose custody he was committed, went to the fortress in the disguise of colliers, scaled the walls, and carried him to Amiens, though not without suspicion of collusion in the governor^e. He was there met by his brother Philip, and both began to raise forces. In the mean time the people of Paris, having differed with the dauphin, who had assumed the government of the kingdom, with the title of lieutenant, invited the king of Navarre thither, and when he came, treated him with great respect. It was upon this occasion he made his famous harangue to about ten thousand persons of all ranks in an open square. He chose for his text these words, Justus Dominus, et justitiam dilexit, i. e. "The Lord is just, and in justice is his delight." He began with the zeal and affection which every man ought to have for his country and the public good: he glanced on the fierceness and haughtiness of the king's temper, mentioned the iniquitous death of the count d'Eu, constable of France, beheaded on false suspicions by the artifice of Juan de la Cerda, who was rewarded with his place; justified the manner in which he caused that man ^a to be put to death; exclaimed against the heavy taxes that had been laid upon the kingdom; insisted that his greatest crime was endeavouring to prevent them; deplored the mischiefs arising from a disputed title; hinted that his own was better than either of the competitors; expatiated on the sufferings he had gone through in eighteen months confinement; and concluded with assuring them, that they were pleasant to him in comparison of his sorrow for the distresses of France^f. The people wept all the time he was speaking; and his party grew so strong, that the dauphin was obliged to promise him full satisfaction, let his demands be what they would. He gave upon this occasion a new specimen of his art: he did not set them very high; but he demanded that the memory of those who had suffered when he was taken prisoner should be restored, their families reinstated, and a general amnesty granted to all who ^b had assisted him before or since^g. After public testimonies of reconciliation with the dauphin, he left Paris, and went to Rouen; where, upon Innocent's-day, he went accompanied by the clergy, nobility, and people, and standing on foot under the gibbet, caused the bodies of his three friends to be taken down (for that of the count de Harcourt had been taken away by his relations before) embraced, put them into chariots, caused them to be interred with the utmost solemnity; and not only assisted himself at the ceremony, but made a funeral oration in their praise, which was often interrupted by the seeming violence of his grief^h. This had all the effect he could desire upon the Normans, who attached themselves to him, as if they had been his subjects.

Brings France
by his intrigues to the brink of ruin, and then is content to save it by a peace.

THE conditions with the king of Navarre, as they were made by force, were but indif- ^c ferently performed; the places that were to have been yielded to him in Normandy refused to open their gates in obedience to the dauphin's orders, their governors pretending they were placed there by the kingⁱ. The war upon this broke out afresh; and having obtained some assistance from the English, he began to waste the country on one side, while his brother Don Philip did the like on the other. At this time the dauphin was at Paris, where he had called an assembly of the states; but having some way disoblinded the people, they invited the king of Navarre thither, and turned the dauphin out^k. But carrying with him some of his English auxiliaries, this gave colour for a rumour, that he intended to put the capital into their hands: upon which the people in his turn forced him out, and recalled the dauphin; which provoked ^d him to such a degree, that he declared he would never acknowledge the princes of the house of Valois: that he looked upon himself to have a better title to the crown than they, and would make his claim good by force of arms^l. When he published this, he made no question of recovering Paris by the help of Stephen Marcel, provost of the merchants, and others of his adherents; but at the time they were opening the gates, they were attacked and slain: notwithstanding which he continued the war. He paid his troops so liberally, behaved towards them so courteously, and gave them in all respects so great encouragement, that he had soon a very numerous army, with which he blocked up the dauphin in Paris, and brought him to such distress as forced him to offer any terms. The French historians acknowledge, that upon this occasion the king of Navarre behaved with great generosity; and when their respective plenipotentiaries were on the point of breaking off the conferences, he desired an interview ^e with the dauphin at Pontoise, where he told him, in few words, that the kingdom must be undone by the continuance of the war; and that by rendering him his inheritance in Normandy the peace should be made^m. His brother Don Philip was so much offended at this, that he retired to the English; but the king adhered to his promise, raised the blockade, and appeared sincerely reconciledⁿ.

He left his only son Don Carlos, who was born at Mantes, to be educated by his sister, who was queen dowager of France, and returned into his own hereditary dominions of Navarre, where he found all things in very good order through the care of his brother Don Lewis, who, with the title of lieutenant-general of the realm, had managed public affairs with great mildness and moderation^o. Don Pedro of Castile sent his ambassadors to compliment his ^f brother of Navarre, to assure him of his friendship, and to desire an interview with him, which was very acceptable to Charles, who had now fresh schemes in his head; the death of the young duke of Burgundy having opened a passage for him to that valuable succession, and to which he had in truth a very plausible title, in support of which the friendship of the king of Castile might be of some consequence. In the spring he went to Soria, to that conference which Don Pedro had so earnestly pressed; and there, after he had been magnificently entertained, Don Pedro informed him of his design to enter Aragon by surprize, and demanded a his assistance. Don Carlos was chagrined at this proposition, which he did not expect; but he was too well acquainted with the character of Don Pedro to make any scruple of promising all that he demanded, so that they parted good friends^p; and Don Carlos did the next year appear on the frontiers of Arragon with an army, that he might seem to perform this promise. But though he took the castles of Sos and Salvaterra, and threatened Jacca with a siege, it is very possible, and the subsequent part of this history will shew that it is not improbable, the king of Arragon had reason to believe that he had not much to fear from him^q. A. D. 1362.

Don Pedro king of Arragon, perceiving clearly that the safety of his dominions must depend on his withdrawing the king of Navarre from the party of Castile, proposed an inter-^{Enters into a confederacy with Don Pedro of Arragon, and Henry count of Trastemara, against Don Pedro of Castile.} view, which the other accepted, but with a great deal of caution, as remembering the hazard he had run the year before. In this interview it was agreed, that the king of Arragon should support the monarch of Navarre against France; a point which, with all his art, he had never before been able to gain: it was also settled, that the prince Don Juan of Arragon should espouse the infanta Donna Joanna, sister to the king of Navarre: but the great point of all was the dethroning Don Pedro, and the dividing his dominions between the new confederates, which, as far as it could be done in a conference, was also concluded^r. It was, however, found necessary to have another meeting, to which Henry count of Trastemara, brother to Don Pedro, was to be admitted; and the place agreed upon for this purpose was the castle of Sos; but the count would have it put into the hands of Don Juan Ramirez, before he would consent to trust his person there. And, if we may depend upon some of the best historians, that prince was not at all to blame, since, having drawn from him all the lights they could desire, the two kings would have prevailed upon Don Juan to have suffered their troops to enter, who had orders to cut the count de Trastemara and his adherents to pieces; for which they promised Don Juan an immense sum; who answered, that he knew reputation was to be purchased, but not with money, and therefore they must excuse him for parting with it on any such consideration^s.

King John being dead in England, and his son Charles seated on the throne of France, the king of Navarre, notwithstanding the great design he had entered into nearer home, resolved to renew the war, which he did, as well by an open declaration, as by sending orders to the troops of Navarre in Normandy to begin hostilities without delay^t. The new king had annexed Burgundy, to which Charles of Navarre had as good or better title, to his crown; and not satisfied with this, had likewise united to his domain, in a more solemn manner than his predecessors, the counties of Champagne and Brie, without troubling himself about the pretensions of the king of Navarre, and this the latter could not bear. Charles sent Bertrand du Guesclin to command his forces in Normandy; and the king of Navarre sent thither John de Grailli, captal, that is, lord of Buch, with a reinforcement, to command his; but he was defeated at the Cocherel, on the sixteenth of May, and taken prisoner^u. The king, notwithstanding this, sent his brother Don Lewis, his other brother Don Philip being dead, with a new army into Auvergne, where he committed terrible disorders, and gave out that he would unite himself again more closely with the English than ever, in order to be revenged for the injuries he had received^v; for Don Carlos insisted that some places were taken from him by surprize before he declared war; that several adhered to him during the troubles at Paris, contrary to the amnesty that had been granted them; and whatever his faults were, this prince was remarkably firm to such as had risked their safety in his cause. The captal de Buch, who was extremely well treated by the French court, discovered that there was a secret negociation on the carpet with the king of Arragon; of which Don Carlos having notice, he was so much alarmed, that he sent the queen of Navarre, though big with child, to Paris, to conclude, by the advice of the captal de Buch, a solid peace with her brother; and, after much altercation, it was accordingly concluded and signed on the sixth of March^x. By this treaty the safety of his friends, and the release of the captal de Buch, were first stipulated; in the next place, the country of Evreux, and all that he still held in Normandy, were confirmed to him; and in full satisfaction of his pretensions, as well on the duchy of Burgundy as the counties of Champagne and Brie, he had Montpellier, with its dependencies, yielded to him. He not only ratified this treaty as soon as that was demanded, but likewise sent the French monarch a heart curiously wrought in gold, as a testimony of the cordiality of their reconciliation^y. The peace was proclaimed at Paris on the twentieth of June, which made way for the expedition of the disbanded troops that oppressed France, under the command of Bertrand du Guesclin, against Don Pedro of Castile, in which the crowns of France, Arragon, and Navarre concurred; and, as

THE revolution in favour of Henry of Trastemara was in various respects favourable to the king of Navarre; for the court of France, taking a great share in its success, executed their promises with unusual punctuality; so that the town of Montpellier was delivered to the capital de Buch, for the use of this monarch. The queen, lately delivered at Evreux of the infant Don Pedro, was sent home with rich presents, and carried with her her eldest son. The subsidies for provisions were exactly paid; and besides all these, various restitutions were to be made¹. But Don Pedro the Cruel, having obtained the protection of Edward the Black Prince, threatened to avenge by the sword the wrongs he had received. This alarmed the king in possession, who, discerning clearly that his safety depended on the conduct of the king of Navarre, invited him to a conference, where a treaty was concluded between them, in which Henry promised to make a cession of Logroño, and paid him, as a great historian says, sixty thousand pistoles in gold^b, upon the king of Navarre's undertaking to defend the passages into his country, which he might easily have done. The archbishops of Toledo and Saragossa, with the count of Ribagorça, and several other persons of distinction, were witnesses to this treaty^c. Don Pedro and the prince of Wales were no sooner acquainted with it than they likewise entered into a negociation with the king of Navarre, and promised him not only Logroño but Viçtoria; upon which he concluded a treaty with them^d. All the world imagined that he could execute but one of these two treaties; but the monarch of Navarre flattered himself, notwithstanding the engagements were contradictory, that he should be able to execute both. With this view, when he heard the army of the prince of Wales had begun their march, he sent for Oliver de Mauny, the cousin of Bertrand du Guesclin, for whom he held the fortress of Borja; and having promised him the government of Cherbourg in Normandy, and the sum of three thousand franks, if he managed the design dextrously, directed him to lie in wait with a small party, and to take him prisoner as he rode a hunting, which Oliver performed. While the king was thus prisoner at Borja, Don Pedro and the prince of Wales passed thro' Navarre with their army, and were well supplied with provisions^e. After the battle of Najara, as the Spaniards call it, or of Navaret, as it is stiled by the French, in which Henry was defeated, and by which Don Pedro was restored, the king, whose purpose was now answered, desired Oliver de Mauny to set him at liberty; to which he answered, "With all his heart, provided he had a large ransom paid him in ready money." To this, without seeming at all offended, the king yielded; and leaving his son the infant Don Pedro with the garrison, carried Oliver and his brother with him to Tudela, where they were to be paid the money; but they were no sooner within the place than he commanded the gates to be secured, and ordered them, if they valued their lives, to send for his son. Oliver submitted; but his brother, making some resistance, was killed. However, the garrison of Borja absolutely refused to deliver the child; but the king of Navarre, having demanded the assistance of the king of Arragon, on the frontiers of whose dominions it lay, he, to preserve a good understanding with a neighbour, who, in this perilous juncture, was able to do him much good or much hurt, forced the garrison of Borja to part with the child; so that in this base and artificial contrivance he very effectually carried his point^f.

THE French were so much displeased with the king of Navarre's conduct, that they seized upon the town of Montpellier and its dependencies, which it was out of his power to prevent; but which having been given him as an equivalent, and a very poor one too, for his pretensions, it perhaps had been as prudent, and to the full as just, if they had suffered him to keep it². Henry count of Trastemara was to the full as eager to make a new attempt as his competitor had been; and as it was evident that things would be again left to the decision of the sword, new negociations were set on foot, and the kings of Arragon and Navarre treated with both the kings of Castile at once, and made pretty near the same demands upon each: those of the king of Navarre were, that the prince for whom he acted was to make an absolute cession to him of the provinces of Guipuscoa and Alava, with all their fortresses and dependencies; Alfaro, Tifero, Tudegen, Calaborra, Navarette, Logroño, Trifino, Najera, Briones, Haro, and in a word all Rioja, as far as the mountains of *Oca*³. The French and Spanish historians declaim loudly upon this, without considering that all these places had, in times past, been taken from Navarre, in times of such confusion, and were never like to be recovered but at such a juncture. The count Don Henry made his passage into Castile thro' the kingdom of Arra-

a gon, and was well received wherever he came. Viçtoria, Salvaterra, Logrono, and other places, were equally pressed by the troops of Don Henry on the one side, and those of the king of Navarre on the other; of which Don Pedro being informed, he sent the inhabitants orders to surrender rather to the count of Trastemara than to the king of Navarre: which directions, however, they did not think it expedient to obey; but, to free themselves from danger, received the king of Navarre's garrisons¹. Don Henry was scarce seated on the throne of Castile before he discovered plainly that he meant not to comply with the treaties he had made with Arragon; and that he was disposed to take a severe revenge upon the king of Navarre; in both which designs he was vigorously supported, if not excited, by *France*². For this reason, therefore, the kings of Navarre and Arragon entered into a defensive alliance; and the former continued his negociation with the English, in breach, say some writers, of his alliance with France; in revenge, say others, for the loss of *Montpellier*³. In facts of this nature one cannot decide with too much caution, or leave things too open.

A. D. 1358.

THROUGH the prudent, or, as some will call it, the artificial conduct of Charles the fifth, Treaty between France had in a great measure, tho' not totally, recovered the miseries of that long war, by Edward III. which she had been oppressed; in consequence of which he began to undermine the power as king of of his neighbours. By his alliance with the new king of Castile, he availed himself of the great England and naval power of that crown against the English, and of his numerous and victorious armies France, with against the kings of Arragon and Navarre. At the same time he encouraged the great lords, Don Carlos of who were feudatories to the prince of Wales in Aquitaine, to stand upon their privileges, and to oppose them in every thing, while the nobility in Normandy shewed a like spirit from the like hopes of support⁴. The king of Navarre saw thro' these designs perfectly; and, by the advice of Eustace d'Auberticour, a knight of great reputation, resolved to unite himself more closely than ever to Edward the third of England, as the only prince whose alliance could defend him from the mischief that he feared. In consequence of this resolution he went himself to the court of king Edward, tho' with great secrecy, and there laid the plan of a definitive treaty, which was afterwards signed at Clarendon, and ratified at *London*⁵. The scope of this treaty shews how considerable a prince Charles of Navarre was in the opinion of Edward; than whom there could not possibly be a better judge. By this treaty the two kings were to act, not only against those of Castile and France, but also, if necessary, against the king of Arragon, who it was known had begun to negotiate with these princes. On the part of Edward, it was stipulated, that, as soon as it was in his power, he should put the king of Navarre in possession of the duchy of Burgundy; of the countries of Brie, Champagne, Mante-Meulan, and Longueville; of the town and barony of Montpellier; of the county of Mans; and of other places upon which he had just pretensions. Edward farther agreed, that, in consideration of the losses he might sustain from the superior power of the king of Castile, he would yield him Sauveur-le-Vicomte in Normandy; and also yield to him Briquebec and Coutances, as soon as they should be taken. He farther agreed to give him the viscounty of Limoges, and all its dependencies, together with the county of Angoulesme; and to advance him four hundred thousand crowns in specie to begin the war. On the other hand, the king of Navarre undertook to do homage to Edward, as king of England, for all the places yielded to him within the principality of Guienne; and to do him likewise homage, as king of France, for the counties of Brie and Champagne; and he was likewise to put into king Edward's hands Nogent-le Roi, Nonancourt, Anet, and Ivri. In consequence of these engagements, and indeed before the treaty was concluded, Don Carlos passed into Normandy, with a view to carry it into execution; but he did not find either the troops or the money that he expected, so that he was under a necessity of observing a kind of neutrality⁶. Those who charge the king of Navarre with breaking this alliance should shew he was enabled to comply with it.

WHILE the king was thus employed, Don Henry of Castile, in consequence of his engagements with the crown of France, and with a view of recovering the places the king of Navarre had taken during the late troubles, made an irruption into his dominions, took several places of less consequence, and besieged Logroño and Viçtoria; to deliver which the queen-regent, Donna Joanna, by the interposition of the Pope's legate, entered into an agreement with that king to put the two places into the hands of a nobleman, who was to hold them in the name and on the behalf of the Pope, till the disputes between the two crowns should be terminated by a negociation⁷. On the other hand, the king of Navarre being informed of this, and perceiving that the advantages he expected from his alliance with England were very doubtful, he consented to an interview that was proposed with the French monarch at Vernon, where, after several conferences, in which the two kings behaved towards each other with all apparent marks of friendship and good-will, a peace was concluded, by which Montpellier was restored a

 A. D. 1371. to the king of Navarre, who having now nothing farther to do in Normandy, made a tour to Paris; and leaving there the two young princes his sons to be educated, he returned by way of Avignon into his hereditary dominions^a. The French historians charge the king of Navarre with persevering in his intrigues, notwithstanding the peace^b. But it appears, from very authentic evidence, that the causes of these misunderstandings were the proceedings of the French court, who, on the declension of the English power, began to question Don Carlos's right to the barony and town of Montpellier. These new differences were left to the arbitration of Pope Gregory the eleventh, who adjudged the possession to the king Don Carlos for four years; at the end of which space he was to accept an equivalent, and the seigniory was from thence-forward to be united to the crown of France: in consequence of which arbitration, the king of b Navarre went thither in person, made his public entry on the twentieth of March, confirmed the people's privileges, received their oaths of homage and fealty, and set out from thence on the twenty-second of July^c for Pampeluna, where he was received by his subjects with great joy, as hoping he would redress many grievances, under which they had laboured, during his absence, from the bishop of Pampeluna and the dean of Tudela, in whose hands he intrusted the government, and whom he called to a severe account. The bishop indeed fled to Avig- non; but the dean was arrested, and all his effects confiscated^d.

1372. THE king of Castile, notwithstanding the treaty of pacification made with the queen of Henry of Ca- Navarre, having compromised his disputes with Aragon and Portugal, marched all his forces stile invades Navarre, and demanded Victoria and Logroño to be surrendered. Don c Navarre; Don Carlos, who had not either troops to defend, or allies to support him, desired the affair might 1373. security to each other for the due performance of it, separated: but the cardinal legate, being sick, remained, and died there; upon which a rumour prevailed that he was poisoned by the king of Navarre's order; into which the Pope having caused a very strict enquiry to be made, declared it to be absolutely false, and void of all foundation^f. The queen of Navarre had been sent by the king, in the month of March, to take upon her the government of his French dominions. She resided all the summer at Montpellier; and departing from thence in September, went to Evreux in Normandy, where she died on the third of November; and her body, being transported to Paris, was interred near that of her father, in the monastery of St. Dennis^g. About the time of the queen's death Don Carlos made a journey to Madrid, where he represented to the king of Castile all the injuries that he had received from France, e and the just reasons he had to fear they would allow him to keep nothing they could take from him. At the same time he magnified the power of England, and the wisdom and courage of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, whose claim to Castile, in right of his wife Donna Phi- lipa, he suggested to Don Henry, might be compromised for a sum of money, provided he entered into the general alliance against France, which would determine the king of Arra- gon to the same measure^h. Don Henry answered, that he owed his crown to the assistance of France, and would not therefore enter into any alliance to her prejudice; but in regard to compounding with the duke of Lancaster for his pretensions, it was a step to which he was by no means averse. He is also said to have explained his system to Don Carlos, and pressed him exceedingly to close with *France*ⁱ.

A PEACE being at length concluded between the kings of Castile and Aragon, the former having appointed Soria, on the frontiers of Castile, for the place where the ceremony was to be performed of the marriage of his heir-apparent to the princess of Aragon, summoned the king of Navarre to the performance of his contract, on behalf of the infant Don Carlos, who came accordingly the first to the proposed interview, where he was treated with all possible respect and kindness; and, having received 5000 pistoles as a marriage portion with the infanta, king Henry paid at the same time 20,000 more, in full satisfaction for the repairs made a to the places which had been rendered to him by the last treaty ^a. The next year Don Carlos king of Navarre, caused Don Rodrigo Urriz, one of the principal lords of his court, to be arrested, upon an information that he had embarked in a design of betraying Tudela and Cammarry, and retire into the dominions of that prince; and on this and other circumstances of the king of Navarre ^c. A celebrated Spanish historian, having reported this fairly, inclines to the former, because Don Henry had a fairer character than Don Carlos ^d, which perhaps the critics of other countries may not think this ought to be taken for granted. We come now to those transactions of this king's life which bear the hardest on his memory, and of which the French historians assert the most authentic testimonies are still remaining. We shall endeavour to state things clearly and concisely, without leaning to either party.

At the time of the queen of Navarre's death, the infant Don Pedro and the infanta Donna Maria were left in Normandy, whither they had accompanied their mother. The king of Navarre sent his eldest son to fetch them, and withal to pay his duty to his uncle at Paris, and to acquaint him with his marriage ^e. There was, however a secret meaning in this journey, which regarded a treaty he had made with the king of England, in relation to his dominions and his pretensions in France. The king of Castile was, it seems, acquainted with the whole affair, which he opposed; but tho' Don Carlos frequently altered his resolutions, yet he did it rarely by the advice of his friends. The young prince of Navarre, amongst other persons of distinction, carried with him James de la Rue, his father's chamberlain; Peter du Tertre, his secretary; and the baron Ortubias. These in their passage thro' France were arrested, and the prince complaining of this, and desiring an audience of his uncle, was likewise seized ^f. The chamberlain being put to the torture, confessed that the king of Navarre had a project of causing the king to be poisoned, and with this view had corrupted one of his physicians, and had laboured to corrupt other servants of his. Peter du Tertre, being also tortured, discovered the treaty with the king of England, which seems to have been no other than that before-mentioned; but he positively denied having any knowledge of the design laid to poison the king ^g. Upon the reading their confessions in parliament the chamberlain was condemned to be hanged and broke upon the wheel, which was executed; the secretary also was condemned to be beheaded, and, as some say suffered; but others assert, that after a year's imprisonment he was set at liberty ^h. Upon this the French king immediately sent a great body of forces into Normandy, under the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, and the constable, where they reduced, without difficulty, all the places belonging to the king of Navarre, Cherbourg only excepted; and these fortresses were dismantled as soon as they were taken. The infant Don Pedro, and the infanta Donna Maria, were also made prisoners; and the town of Montpellier, with its dependencies, was likewise reduced; so that Don Carlos was completely stripped of his estates in France, and this too in a manner that left him no hopes of seeing them restored ⁱ.

The king of Navarre avowed his having made a treaty with the crown of England, by which he gave up all his possessions in Normandy for equivalents in Guienne, which, lying nearer his own dominions, were more convenient, and like to be more easily kept. It may be also observed, that if he had corrupted one of the French king's physicians, and some of his domestics, it was a strange thing to send his eldest son and his principal ministers into France, where they might have been probably sacrificed if his plot had taken effect. There was another circumstance still stranger, which was, that the governors of the principal places in Normandy likewise accompanied the prince, were taken with him, and it was by this means those places fell so easily into the hands of the French. It is certain and incontestible that they were great gainers by these events, and that there are many circumstances very inconsistent in their own relations of this matter, which are perfectly well calculated to blast the character of the king of Navarre, and to cover this extraordinary proceeding of depriving him of his children and dominions at once ^k. We must also observe, that the French writers positively assert the king of Navarre had caused their monarch to be poisoned, while he bore only the title of dauphin; that the emperor's physician saved his life by opening, or rather keeping open, a fistula in his arm; and that after consuming for twenty years, by the effects of this venomous drug, he died of it at last ^l. Stories of this kind were more easily believed in those days than they have been since; and, whether true or false, they had a great effect in rendering the king of Navarre odious, and in qualifying the violent proceedings by which he was deprived of great countries, to which he had very plausible titles, as well as, in his own opinion, to the crown itself, the declaration of which was indeed the principal cause of all his misfortunes, since it hindered the English monarch from supporting him powerfully, because he made the like claim, and left the kings of the house of Valois no other way of maintaining their own possession, than by depriving him of all means to maintain a claim, which, in the person of his mother, some of the peers of that kingdom had judged to be better than their own ^m. Such was his principal crime, and such the punishment attending it.

A new war
between the kings of Castile and Navarre, which, however, is quickly terminated.
A. D. 1379.

THESE extremities did not force the king of Navarre, as was expected, to an absolute submission. On the contrary, he renewed his treaty with Richard the second, and procured, through the friendship of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, a considerable body of English troops, who served him very gallantly in his war against Castile ⁿ. But, notwithstanding this assistance, he found himself utterly incapable of supporting that war; and therefore applied himself by his ministers to Don Henry, in order to know upon what terms he might expect peace. These ministers were well received; and it was intimated to them, that notwithstanding the great advantages gained by the arms of Castile, the king desired nothing more than that he would detach himself entirely from the English, and sequester some of his principal fortresses, by way of security, for his performing duly what should be stipulated in the intended treaty. The king of Navarre represented, that, in the distressed circumstances of his affairs, he was willing to accept of these terms, and to quit allies to whom he could now be of no use, and who were but of very little use to him; but there was one obstacle he knew not how to get over, which was, that he was indebted to the English troops a large sum, which it was absolutely out of his power to pay. The king of Castile, desirous of completing his own scheme, or touched with compassion for this unfortunate prince, promised to advance him twenty thousand pistoles as soon as the peace was signed, which he accordingly performed; and the English succours returned into Guienne ^o. After the conclusion and ratification of this treaty, the king of Castile invited his brother of Navarre to his head-quarters, for at the time of this transaction he was in the field with a numerous army. Don Carlos accepted the invitation, and was received by the Castilian monarch, as the writers of these times, and of that nation, say, with all possible marks of kindness and esteem, which surely agrees not over well with the story of his attempt on the person of Charles the fifth of France ^p. These kings, after remaining some time together, parted in great friendship; and immediately after Don Henry died, with strong suspicion of poison. It fell out very happily for the king of Navarre that it was said to be discovered. The wicked fact was perpetrated by the orders of the king of Granada; for otherwise, in all probability, it had been placed to his account, notwithstanding it was visibly against his interest, as he had now all things to hope and nothing to fear on the part of that powerful prince ^q. His son and successor Don Juan, as soon as decency would permit, notified to him his accession, assured him of his friendship, and promised to give him marks of it, by interposing his good offices with the court of France, where king Charles the fifth, his old antagonist, was also dead; and in the minority of his son things were exceedingly altered ^r.

An insurrection suppressed.

IN consequence of that long series of misfortunes to which this prince had been exposed, and of the temper also of the times, some of his nobility began to take great liberties with him, and aimed at mending their own fortunes at his expence, and that of the public. With something of this kind, and even with some intention against the king's person, the baron of Agramont charged the baron of Affian, who denied it, and challenged the other to single combat, according to the received doctrine of those times, that private men as well as princes might appeal to God by arms. But as this nobleman was allied to the best families in Navarre, they interposed with the king, and desired that some other end might be put to this matter, according to his discretion; upon which the king committed the baron of Affian to the castle of Tafalla, and sent the baron of Agramont prisoner to St. Jean-pie-de-Port, till either this matter could be thoroughly looked into, or their private quarrels some way adjusted. The garrison of Tafalla were Picards, whom the baron de Affian won so much to his service, that they not only set him at liberty, but revolted, and put him in possession of the place ^s. In all probability they had flattered themselves with the hopes either of a general revolt, or of a foreign assistance: but their expectations were disappointed; for the inhabitants of the adjacent country immediately invested the place, and the king refusing to listen to any terms, caused the place to be carried by storm, and the garrison to be put to the sword, except the baron de Affian, a who was taken and beheaded. The baron de Agramont was soon after set at liberty ⁱ. There is something of severity, but nothing of injustice in this proceeding, which also shews that the king was in the main respected and obeyed by his subjects. Indeed the historians of Navarre say, that being a great patron of learning and learned men, he had the clergy much at his devotion; yet, whatever his own vices were, he would suffer none in them, that the dignity of their order might not be lessened in the eyes of the people. In this no doubt he acted discretely; for a vicious, and consequently a contemptible clergy, could have been of no use ^u.

ABOUT this time the young king of France was so kind to the infant Don Carlos of Navarre, that he restored to him the lordship of Montpellier, and allowed him to receive the revenues of all his father's estates in France; and it is certain that the infant, with the consent of the duke of Berry, the king's uncle, took possession of Montpellier on the first of November; but it is also as certain, that before the year came about again, this barony was seized into the king's hands, and annexed to the crown; but upon what motives this was done does not so clearly appear ^w. The Spanish historians, and those of Navarre, agree, that Don Juan, king of Castile, being extremely pressed by the king of Navarre, and by his own sister Donna Leonora, to intercede with Charles the sixth for the discharge of the infant Don Carlos, he accordingly interposed by his ambassadors, and at length obtained it; upon which the infant and his consort, after his return home, went into Castile to visit the king their brother, and to testify the just sense they had of this application, on the behalf of Don Carlos, since, if what we are going to mention has any thing in it of truth, nothing but the intercession of so powerful and so necessary an ally could have procured him, though innocent, his liberty ^x.

THE French historians relate, though not very consistently, that the king of Navarre, being extremely irritated against the French court, had recourse to his old art; and finding, as he apprehended, an instrument very fit for his purpose, dispatched him by the way of Bayonne to Paris, with instructions to poison not only the king, but also his brother Lewis, count of Valois, afterwards the duke of Orleans; the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, Bourbon, and several other great lords. This man, having furnished himself with a sufficient quantity of arsenic at Bayonne, came to the French court, with a full resolution of executing the orders he had received in their utmost extent; but being happily detected he was put into prison, and, having continued there upwards of a year, was convicted and publicly executed, as he well deserved ^y. Upon this a prosecution was commenced against the king of Navarre, as count of Everux, before the parliament; and after being summoned to appear, he was, for contumacy and for various enormous crimes committed against the king, but for the honour of the family, without any specific declaration of those crimes, declared attainted, and convicted of high-treason. But notwithstanding this is so particularly set forth, and that from the very process, yet it is subject to various objections, which are not easy to be solved; and it is very probably owing to this, that in some ancient, and in some modern histories, the whole affair, though of so remarkable a nature, is buried in oblivion ^z.

King of Navarre charged afresh with forming designs against the lives of the French king and his uncles.

THE king Don Juan of Castile having, as we have shewn in its proper place, very strong pretensions upon Portugal, in right of his consort, the only daughter and heiress of the deceased king, and being determined to support those pretensions by force of arms, his brother-in-law, the infant Don Carlos of Navarre, out of gratitude as well as affection, thought himself obliged to march to his assistance with a considerable body of forces. He joined the army of Castile at the siege of Lisbon, and was received with all possible testimonies of esteem by the king, and of joy and satisfaction by the whole army. The next year he made an inroad into Portugal, under that monarch's orders, but was not in the fatal battle of Aljubarrota, which gave him an opportunity of saving several small corps of the Castilian army, that in their escape from that disaster would otherwise have been surrounded and cut to pieces by the Portuguese ^a. He went afterwards to Seville to console that prince under his misfortunes; and having accompanied him to Valladolid, where he held an assembly of the states, the infant Don Carlos returned from thence into his father's dominions ^b. About this time his sister Donna Joanna espoused John de Montfort, duke of Brittany, which was an alliance, in all respects, very favourable to the family, and contributed not a little to its support. The news of the duke of Lancaster's sailing to Portugal, with a numerous fleet, and a powerful army on board, with a view not only to support the master of Avis, who had now taken the title of king of Portugal, but to assert his own right to Castile, so much alarmed the king Don Juan, that he applied himself to the Pope, Charles the sixth of France, and his other allies, for assistance; upon which the year^c.

Death of the king of Navarre.

WE are assured, by the historians of Navarre, that the king Don Carlos was become miserably infirm thro' a leprosy, or some other grievous distemper, brought upon him by his de-bauches, which disabled him from appearing in public, and inclined him to bend all his thoughts towards preparing himself for his last hour; for notwithstanding the detestable character given him by the French writers, he certainly affected to be thought religious, and did every thing that might contribute to impose upon the world in that particular^d. But while the king was thus in some measure confined, one Andrew de Torellas, a person of mean rank, excited a sedition in Pampeluna, under colour that the city was not sufficiently supplied with corn, b and the public revenue but indifferently managed: but the king, feeble and infirm as he was, exerted himself in such a manner, that the tumult was quickly suppressed, Andrew Torellas apprehended and hanged, and some of his principal associates severely punished^e. This was the last effort of his authority, for soon after he fell into a low and languishing state, and having prepared himself for death, with all the exterior marks at least of a deep and sincere repentance, breathed his last on the first day of the new year, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and in the thirty-eighth of his reign, and was buried in the cathedral church of Pampeluna, with the usual ceremonies^f.

Strange stories in ventioned about it.

BUT historians are as much divided about the manner of his death, as in regard to the principal events of his life; and it may be justly expected, that, out of regard to truth, we should say c something of these. The common story which we find usually inserted in the French chronicles is this. The king having, in a great measure, dissipated and extinguished the natural heat of his body, by the vices to which he was addicted, was wont to be wrapped up in large sheets, or scar-cloths, dipped in aqua vitæ, and powdered over with sulphur, in which being sewed up as usual, one of his pages, instead of cutting the thread with a pair of scissors, went to burn it with a wax-candle, by which the wrappers about the king's body took fire, and before it could be extinguished his bowels were so burnt, that, after lying three days in excruciating torment, he expired^g. The inferences that are copiously drawn from hence, as to its being an apparent judgment upon him for his horrible crimes, make this fact and those crimes equally suspicious. The historians of Navarre have shewn this story to be a fable, tho' there was a d circumstance thrown in to make the judgment lean a little on their side, by alleging that he had imposed a tax of two hundred thousand florins upon his dominions, against which the deputies from several provinces being sent to Pampeluna to remonstrate, he had ordered them all to be put to death, from which they were saved only by his ending his life suddenly in this manner^h. Froissart, who at this very time was in the county of Foix, and consequently very near Pampeluna, relates the matter, as he had it from persons belonging to the court of Navarre, very differently. He says, that the king used to have a globe of metal filled with hot water, and other things, to put on his bed to keep him warm, and that by means of this the bed-cloaths some way or other took fire, by which he was so much injured that it proved the cause of his death, tho' he survived a fortnightⁱ. Bed-cloaths set on fire by hot water is certainly very e extraordinary, and unless we are disposed to take it for a judgment, will hardly be believed.
 But in a very ancient history, composed when these things were fresh in memory, there is preserved a letter from the bishop of Acqs, who was prime minister to this prince, written to his sister queen Blanch, dowager of Philip de Valois; in which he acquaints her, that the king his master died of a most painful and tormenting disease, in which he gave the strongest marks of sincere penitence, and supported the misery he endured with invincible patience, and the most perfect resignation to the will of God^k. Not a word here of the flaming winding-sheet, or the scalding water setting the bed on fire; upon which a modern historian very candidly observes, that it is very likely the extreme hatred the French bore to this monarch induced the French writers to invent those stories, that his death might have the more in it of a judgment f from heaven^l. We may venture to add, that they might also propose giving an air of justice to their own proceedings; and at the same time stamp the character of authenticity on all the horrid stories told by them of this monarch, of whom Ferreras says truly, that he was far from being a saint, but that he was as far from wanting good qualities; and that we ought not to believe all that is said of him by those who were bound in interest to blacken him, that they might acquit themselves.

a Don Carlos the third, at the time of his father's demise, was, with the queen his consort and their children, at Penafiel in Castile, with her brother the king Don Juan. He immediately prepared for his departure to his own dominions, where his presence was absolutely necessary; and the Castilian monarch, to shew how grateful a sense he had of the friendship shewn, and assistance given him by this prince, not only remitted the castles and fortresses which had been sequestered for the debt due to his father, but also forgave that debt, and the sum of two thousand pounds sterling, which he had engaged himself to pay, as a ransom for an English nobleman, who was prisoner in Castile. He was received on his arrival at Pampeluna with all possible marks of joy and satisfaction, and with much solemnity proclaimed on the 28th of January; but for various reasons his coronation was deferred^m. He was at this time about twenty-five years of age, possessing, as the Spanish writers say, all the great qualities of his father; and, as the French writers own, without any tincture of his defects. In a word, if we may depend upon any thing in the histories of those times, we may conclude that this young king was a most accomplished prince; as the strongest proof of which we may allege, that he was stiled Charles the Noble by his neighbours, and Don Carlos the Liberal by his own subjects. The first public act of his reign was acknowledging Clement the seventh, who resided at Avignon, for the true Pope, notwithstanding the claim of Urban the sixth, who had fixed his residence at *Rome*ⁿ. This was contrary to his father's maxim, who, tho' he had always shewn a great respect for the church, kept an exact neutrality, and would acknowledge neither, alleging very prudently that it did not become a layman, tho' a king, to decide who was the successor of St. Peter; but till this could be determined by a proper authority, he affirmed the supremacy in all causes to be in him. His son, indeed, did it with this restriction, that his acknowledgement was subject to the decision of a general council. This, however, was a very strong measure, as it plainly proved to the world, that he embraced a new system, and was gone over to the French side, since the English and their allies were zealous partizans of Pope Urban^o.

He took care to notify his accession, and to send ambassadors to the principal powers in Europe, particularly to those of France and England^p. He demanded from the former the restitution of the estates belonging to his family; but in mild and modest terms, so as to shew at once that he was determined not to part from his claims, and that he was by no means averse to the receiving a suitable satisfaction. He represented to the latter, that several places in Normandy belonged to him, that were in their hands, and that he made no doubt of their being restored to him. He had a conference with Don Juan king of Aragon, in reference to a marriage between their families, and to the maintaining a strict correspondence between the two crowns, as the surest means of supporting the splendour and independency of them both^q. He regulated the march of the French succours, under the duke of Bourbon, to Logrogno, where they received the subsidies that had been stipulated, and the orders of the king of Castile to advance no farther. He contributed not a little to the treaty of pacification between that monarch and John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster; and when it was in some degree settled, he had an interview with his brother-in-law, to regulate with him the measures that in so critical a juncture were fittest to be taken. While his mind was thus intent on these great objects of government, he was alarmed by the indisposition of the queen, and the more so, when she intimated to him, that she had no hopes of recovery but from returning to and remaining some time in her native country. He resolved to comply with her desires; and having conducted her and the princesses his daughters to Navarete, where he had another conference with the king of Castile, he left them behind, and returned to his own capital of Pampeluna^r.

THE situation of affairs in Europe was at this time so embarrassed, that Don Carlos saw plainly his endeavours to obtain the restitution of his estates ought to be reserved for a more favourable opportunity. He applied himself, therefore, with great industry, to rectify whatever might be amiss in the civil œconomy of his dominions. He reviewed the grants of his ancestors; he examined into the state of the principal cities and great towns; he had an eye on the affairs of the church: but he acted with such moderation in all things, and shewed so strong an inclination to render all ranks of people easy, that the reformation, which would have been attended with murmurs at least, if not with an insurrection, under any other prince, not only passed quietly under him, but even rendered him more beloved. However, the clergy and nobility pressed him very much on the head of his coronation, which they would not have suffered another king to have delayed so long, because hitherto he had taken no oath to maintain the immunities of the church, the privileges of the nobility, and the liberties of the people^s. The king thereupon sent his ambassadors to the court of Castile to desire his consort might return, that they might be crowned together. Donna Leonora would by no means consent to this: she insisted upon her brother's protection; complained that she was very ill used in Navarre, where the people were wanting in their respects to her, or at least to her attendants; that the revenue assigned her was ill paid; and that her distemper was owing to certain dangerous drugs given her by a Jew physician, whom the king had refused to disgrace. Don Carlos, being informed of this, acquainted the king of Castile, that his subjects indeed were not accustomed to act so submissively towards their sovereigns as in Castile; that his dominions were very much impoverished during his father's reign, but that his finances were now in good order; and that, as to the affair of the Jew physician, he was willing to submit the examination of it to such as the king of Castile shall appoint; when it would appear, as indeed it did, that the queen, and not the doctor, was to blame, who prescribed what was proper enough for the queen's indisposition, if it had been such as she gave out; but as it was only a fiction, she had only herself to blame^a. The truth of the matter was, the queen was mightily pleased with the honours paid her in Castile, and with the splendour of that court; and therefore insisted, that her husband should engage the Pope and the king of France, to guaranty her being well used: to which Don Carlos answered, that the French king should never interfere in his affairs; and having sent for his two eldest daughters, he proceeded to the ceremony of his coronation, which was performed with great solemnity, in the cathedral at Pampeluna, on the twenty-fifth of July, when the Pope, to shew his respect to the king, promoted Don Martin de Zalva, bishop of Pampeluna, to the rank of a cardinal^b.

THE death of king John of Castile, and the accession of his son Don Henry, a minor, created a great change in the face of affairs at that court, where Donna Leonora, queen of Navarre, in quality of aunt to the reigning prince, entered deeply into the intrigues of the court; and, as we have shewn in its proper place, contributed greatly to pacify those factious heats that would otherwise have thrown all things into confusion. It was in vain, therefore, that the king Don Carlos solicited her return, and represented to her how injurious her absence was to him, how displeasing to his subjects, and how destructive to their family. But Donna Leonora loved pomp and power; and, while her faction prevailed, was sure of preserving both; whereas in Navarre, the king lived equally in great familiarity with his nobility, and administered public affairs by the sole advice of his council^c. His eyes were continually turned on the vast possessions which had been torn from his family in France; and, in order to make some effort for their recovery, he sent Don Carlos de Beaumont, standard-bearer of Navarre, and Don Martin Henriquez de Lacarra, his ambassadors, to Richard the second of England, in order to obtain the restitution of Cherbourg, and some other places, which the king held by no other title than that of his grandfather's troops being admitted into them, as the auxiliaries of the deceased king of Navarre. This point being strenuously insisted upon by the ambassadors, and several great lords of the court of England knowing the thing to be really as they stated it, a resolution was at last taken to do him that justice which he required; and accordingly Cherbourg, and the rest of the places, were actually restored^d. Upon this he renewed his application to the French court, representing, that it would be very hard to treat a prince of the blood royal worse than strangers had done; but the disorders in France were so great, and those in power were so little pleased at seeing Don Martin Henriquez de Lacarra established in the government of Cherbourg, that he found himself obliged to postpone his expectations on that side, till the state of their affairs should wear another aspect.

Donna Leo-

Navarre.

HE was more successful in his negociation with the king of Arragon, who amicably regulated the frontiers of their respective dominions, and entered into all his views with regard to a perpetual defensive alliance between the two crowns. But his applications to persuade his queen to return were as ineffectual as ever; neither could she be persuaded to send her two younger daughters back into Navarre, though her nephew, king Henry the third, joined his solicitations to those of the king her husband; for, upon his taking the government into his own hands, he found it requisite to recal some, and to reduce all the pensions that were paid out of the public revenue; and as his aunt's was not excepted, this had created a misunderstanding between them. By degrees these differences rose higher; for the queen, taking part with the malecontents, and presuming so far as to refuse the king entrance into Roa, which was one of the places assigned for her subsistence, he came before it with a body of troops: upon which the inhabitants, who had no share at all in the quarrel, opened their gates, and the queen was constrained to submit herself; and, tho' received with much seeming favour and complaisance, yet the king told her plainly, that as Don Carlos had offered all that she could possibly demand, she must absolutely think of returning with the princesses her daughters, and content herself with acting the queen in her own dominions. Yet, that every thing might be transacted in a

a manner suitable to the rank of the parties concerned, the king with his whole court attended the queen to Alfaro; and Don Carlos, having sent the archbishop of Saragossa, with the principal lords of his kingdom, to Tudela to receive her, she was accordingly conducted thither, and soon after met by the king himself, who received her with all possible demonstrations of joy and satisfaction, which, with the improved state of the country, reconciled her entirely to Navarre; and the sense she had, that a new retreat into Castile was impracticable, made her so affable and obliging to her subjects, that she met with every testimony of respect and submission she could desire¹. The next year the king held an assembly of the states at Pampeluna, in which the succession to the crown was regulated in favour of his daughters, in the order of their respective births, to prevent any disputes, if the king should die without male issue². A. . 1396.

THE cathedral at Pampeluna had, for some years, lain in ruins, with the sight of which the citizens, and indeed all the inhabitants of Navarre, were very deeply affected; but the expence of rebuilding it was so high, that, however well-inclined, their circumstances rendered them unable to undertake it. The king saw this, and, after mature deliberation, assigned the fortieth part of his revenues for this service, which agreeably surprised the people, and rendered them less uneasy at his departure for France, upon the very eve of which he did this pious and generous action³. The queen was not long after delivered of a son, who at his baptism received his father's name; and this was another very acceptable event. But in France the king found his ambassadors had represented things to him very truly; for tho' Charles the sixth had some lucid intervals, yet being then entirely in the hands of his ministers, who represented his affairs to him in what light they pleased, the king of Navarre chose to return home without doing any thing, rather than make any bargain with those who held their authority by so uncertain a tenure as the will of a distracted prince⁴. After he came back to Pampeluna, he obliged the clergy, nobility, and people, to take an oath of fidelity to his son Don Carlos, as heir-apparent to the kingdom, though he was at that time scarce a year old. The next year he renewed the treaties subsisting with the crown of Arragon upon the accession of Don Martin; and interposed his good offices for composing the disputes subsisting between that monarch and Archambaud de Grailli, count of Foix, which was at length effected, much to the satisfaction of both parties⁵. This negotiation produced another of yet greater consequence; for the king married his eldest daughter, Donna Joanna, to John de Grailli, son of the count of *Foix*⁶. In a short time after he married his third daughter, the princess Blanch, to Don Martin king of Sicily, son to the king of Arragon; but very soon after this marriage took effect, the infant Don Carlos died, as also his younger brother Don Louis; upon which Donna Joanna was acknowledged for the presumptive heir of Navarre; which, tho' it could not be pleasing to the king, yet since it appeared to be the will of Providence, the king submitted without repining, and his example quieted the minds of the nation, tho' they had the disagreeable prospect of a foreign successor in view⁷. 1399.

THE king, desirous of having his claims settled in France, and being invited thither by the princes of the blood, resolved to make another tour into that kingdom, and declared the queen regent in his absence; and at the same time made his testament, that, as far in him lay, he might remove all sources of intestine troubles, in case he should not live to return. On his arrival at Paris, he found things in great disorder; the king's health rather more unsettled than ever, and a war with England in a manner inevitable. This dismal prospect induced him to use all his interest, in order to conclude a treaty without loss of time, which was accordingly signed on the fourth of June, and to which his brother Don Pedro, earl of Mortain, acceded. By this agreement he relinquished all his pretensions to the counties of Champagne, Brie, and Evreux, as also to the rest of the places which his ancestors had held in Normandy; and also gave up Cherbourg, in consideration of the town and district of Nemours, which was erected into a duchy in his favour, together with an annual pension of twelve thousand livres, and the farther sum of two hundred thousand crowns, by way of indemnification for the revenues of which he had been deprived⁸. A great Spanish historian says truly, that this was a poor compensation for such vast estates; but there is great reason to doubt whether, in the situation of their affairs, he could have obtained even these from the princes who governed France, if he had not rendered services to some, and made presents to others, that some end might be made of a controversy that had subsisted so long, and had cost both parties so dear⁹. The troubles which broke out on the death of Philip the Hardy, duke of Burgundy, obliged 1402.

At length, having contributed all in his power to restore the public peace, and having concluded a marriage for his fourth by birth, but his third surviving daughter, with Jaques de Bourbon, count de la Marche, one of the most accomplished princes of that age, he set out on his return into his own dominions^b, leaving an high opinion of him in the French court.

Pursues his true interests
at his return.

At the request of Don Martin, king of Arragon, Don Carlos passed thro' Catalonia, and was received by him at Lerida with all possible marks of affection and respect. From thence the two monarchs went together to Saragossa, and after a short stay there, they parted perfectly well satisfied with each other, and Don Carlos returned to Pampeluna, where his subjects received him with the most sincere transports of joy and affection. In the beginning of the month of September arrived Jaques de Bourbon, count of Marche and of Castro, attended by a great train of French lords and gentlemen ; and there his marriage with Donna Beatrix of Navarre was celebrated with the utmost magnificence^c. As Don Carlos brought with him a great mass of money from France, he began to consider with himself what course was best for him to take, in order to distribute it amongst his subjects ; and, after mature deliberation, he determined to build two palaces, one at Olita, and the other at Tafalla, each in a very pleasant situation, and at no more than a league's distance. By this project the money was very speedily dispersed into the hands of the industrious, and artists of every kind were encouraged and employed^d ; for with all the qualities of a hero and a statesman, Don Carlos had likewise the talents and the taste of a splendid and magnificent prince, corrected by a due regard to œconomy, and directed, as all his measures were, to the general welfare of his subjects. It was a full persuasion of this that rendered him, in a country where liberty was idolized, almost an absolute prince. Pampeluna had been more than once on the very brink of destruction, from its being divided into three parts, each under a distinct government ; from whence, for the most part, there were in this city three factions, hating and thwarting each other as much as lay in their power. Former monarchs had seen and deplored this ; but durst not attempt the removal of an evil, for fear of uniting against themselves those who never could agree in any other measure. Don Carlos proposed and accomplished it at once, in consequence of his never having shewn the least partiality for any of them, and by his offering to their acceptance a new constitution, more favourable than the old one to them all. He knew that factions was the bane of all limited governments, and therefore removed all supports of it to the utmost of his power^e.

Obliged to make a new tour to France.

THE war between the crown of Castile and the Moors of Granada gave the king of Navarre an opportunity of sending some of the most accomplished knights in his court to the assistance of his neighbour, under the command of the count de la Marche, his son-in-law, who carried with him into Andalusia a chosen corps of illustrious cavaliers ; for which he is highly commended by the Spanish historians, who are pleased to allow him the character of one of the bravest and most accomplished princes that age produced^f. It is not likely that Don Carlos ever thought of making another journey into France ; but the barbarous assassination of the duke of Orleans, by the order of John duke of Burgundy, excited such convulsions in the court and kingdom, that the queen and the rest of the princes of the blood sent a pressing invitation to the king of Navarre to come and assist them with his advice, as well as to add weight to their authority by his presence. He could not well refuse this ; and, therefore, leaving the queen again regent, he went to Paris, where he was received with the utmost kindness and respect, and where he exerted his utmost abilities in support of the unfortunate Charles the sixth, and his family. He was very instrumental in bringing about the two pacifications of Chartres and Biceffre ; and in this last, when it was stipulated that all the princes of the blood should remain at a proper distance from the court, his brother Peter, earl of Mortain, was excepted^g. One reason, probably, why such respect was paid to Don Carlos and Don Pedro, in France, might be from their close alliance with England, where Henry the fourth had married Donna Joanna, duchess-dowager of Brittany, their sister ; yet they did not avail themselves at all of that alliance, otherwise than to promote the peace and safety of the kingdom. At length, understanding that his daughter Donna Blanch, queen of Sicily, was besieged by some seditious barons in a castle in that kingdom, he returned speedily into his own dominions, but so as to take Barcelona in his way, where he found an assembly of the states sitting, who paid him great honours, and promised to exert themselves powerfully on the behalf of his daughter^h. He conferred also with Don Martin, king of Arragon, their sovereign, who even then was

- a apprehensive of troubles in his dominions, and to whom he promised powerful succours, if ever they should be demanded, which he very honourably performed. After his return to Pampeluna, the duke of Benavente, who had been long a state-prisoner in Castile, made his escape, and took shelter in his dominions, where the king caused him to be arrested; but directed that he should be treated at the same time with great lenity and respect. This great man had been of queen Leonora's faction, which might induce him to hope the countenance of the court of Navarre; but Don Carlos, well acquainted with his turbulent behaviour, would not trouble the peace of his dominions for the sake of such a person^p. He promised, therefore, that Don Frederic, duke of Benavente, should be forthcoming, and delivered up to the king of Castile; which, however, was not performed till three years afterwards, and then upon certain assurances
- b that he should not be harshly used, or questioned for this escape.

It was in a great measure owing to his care, that the neighbouring kingdom of Arragon was preserved in some tolerable degree quiet, during the interregnum, which happened on the death of the king Don Martin; and it was due to his friendly assistance, that the infant Don Ferdinand of Castile came so peaceably as he did to the crown. Indeed the attention and respect of Don Carlos was so great, not only to the affairs of his own country, but of all the kingdoms round him, and his justice and moderation so apparent, that tho' he interfered in many, if not most of their quarrels, yet he took part in none, but by his good offices and authority composed them all^q. The long peace he had procured to Navarre, and the many amiable qualities of this prince, had so enriched, improved, and peopled his dominions, that c he was far more powerful, and had a much more extensive influence, than any of his predecessors. One great and singular instance of his excellent temper was, the harmony in which he lived with queen Leonora, notwithstanding the reluctance she had shewn in returning to him from the court of Castile; and this happy union continued to the time of her death, which fell out on the twenty-seventh of February, in the year one thousand four hundred and fifteen, at the new palace of Olita, from whence her corpse was carried to Pampeluna, and there interred, in the choir of the cathedral, with all possible demonstrations of sorrow in the king, and the nation in general^r. Many expected, as he had no sons, the king would not have continued long a widower: but he was so good a father, and thought the succession so well settled, that it does not appear he thought of a second marriage.

Relieves the count de Foix.

- d JOHN DE GRAILLI, count de Foix, who had married the eldest daughter of the king Don Carlos, was at this time a widower, and without issue, which rendered him very desirous of marrying her sister Donna Blanch, queen-dowager of Sicily. It might possibly be with this view, that, in making his pilgrimage to Campostella, he took Olita in his way, and spent some time there with the king of Navarre, with whom he judged this business of the marriage to be so far advanced, that he had procured a dispensation from the Pope; but while he was intent on his devotions at the tomb of St. James, his neighbour (but at the same time his enemy) the count de Armagnac, invaded his dominions, and laid them waste with fire and sword^s. He no sooner received advice of this, than he returned with all speed into Navarre, and solicited the king for his assistance, who generously assembled a body of forces, which, under the command of his natural son, Godfrey count de Cortes, he sent to the relief of the count; and having afterwards drawn together a superior army, he marched in person to join the count de Foix, and with him marched into the county of Armagnac, where, by way of reprisals, they committed great devastations, and returned afterwards in triumph^t. One great reason of doing this was to prevent excursions of this kind in the neighbourhood of his dominions; and indeed the readiness with which he afforded succours to his allies, and the efficacy of those succours when afforded, contributed not a little to his spending, as he did, the best part of his reign in peace. In the present case, this correction had so good an effect, that John count of Armagnac entered immediately into a negociation, and some years after married Donna Isabella, one of the king of Navarre's daughters, with whom he had a fortune of one hundred thousand crowns, which in those days was looked upon as an immense sum^u, and much beyond what, in the like cases, was ever done by any of his predecessors.

A. D. 1418.

In all disputes between the king Don Juan of Castile, and the king and infants of Arragon, Donna Blanch who were also princes of his own house, the king of Navarre observed an exact neutrality, and interposed no otherwise than by his good offices. He acted with the like circumspection when the emperor Sigismund made a tour to Perpignan, sending thither his son Godfrey, count of Cortes, to compliment him; but would not enter into his scheme of settling the papacy, farther than as it should prove consistent with the decree of a general council, being very attentive a to prevent, as far as possible, any ecclesiastical or civil disputes from arising amongst his subjects. It was with this view that he acted with so great caution in the marriage of the queen of Sicily, who was to be his heiress; and whom he disposed of at length to the infant Don Juan of Arragon, the son of Don Ferdinand, and the brother of Don Alonso, kings of Arragon. By the contract of marriage this princess had four hundred and twenty thousand crowns by way of dowry; and it was farther stipulated, that in case he survived her, he should enjoy the crown during his life. These points settled, and a dispensation obtained from Pope Martin the fifth, the infant Don Juan sent Don Diego Gomez de Sandoval, and the bishop of Calaborra, with his full powers to conclude the marriage; which was accordingly celebrated at Olita, on the fifth of November, to the entire satisfaction of the courts of Castile, Arragon, and Navarre. b But the consequences of this marriage by no means answered the hopes excited from it.

the noble.

THIS great point once settled, he began to indulge the natural bent of his inclination to magnificence, and the cultivation of the arts of peace; in which he succeeded so much the better, as all the kingdoms round him were in a state of confusion; so that men of abilities in all professions retired into Navarre, and became the ornaments of a court, where politeness might be said to reign. On the nineteenth, or, as others say, on the twenty-ninth of May, the queen Donna Blanch was delivered, at Arevalo, of a son, who was named Carlos, in honour of his grandfather, and whose sponsors were Don Juan king of Castile, and at his request Don Alvaro de Luna *, who was so intoxicated with this honour, that he seemed unacquainted c with moderation ever after. As soon as the young prince was weaned, the good old monarch sent for him to his court; and having erected that seigniorship into a principality, declared him prince of Viana, and heir of Navarre, with great solemnity, and by a law, published the twentieth of January, invested the heir-apparent of the crown of Navarre with that title, and with the lands annexed to it for ever. About five months after he obliged the states of the kingdom to acknowledge the young Don Carlos in that quality. He had the satisfaction, on the ninth of June, in the year following, to see his daughter delivered of the infantia Donna Blanch. d; but he was not so fortunate as he expected in his endeavours to prevent a rupture between the crowns of Arragon and Castile, which did not hinder him from pursuing, with indefatigable diligence, so good a design. On Saturday the eighth of September, one thousand four hundred and twenty-five, he was seized with a fainting fit, in his palace at Olita, which was followed by an apoplexy that removed him from this life the same day. e His daughter Donna Blanch was then with him, and caused his body to be buried in the cathedral church of Pampeluna, with all possible solemnity. He was, says Ferreras, a prince equally illustrious by the nobleness of his sentiments and of his actions, and enjoyed the true felicity of a great king, that of being tenderly beloved by his subjects. He died in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and the thirty-ninth of his reign; and by his own order his body was interred, by that of his deceased queen Leonora. His daughter, the queen Donna Blanch, after three days mourning, sent the royal standard of Navarre to the camp of the king of Arragon, where it was displayed for the infant Don Juan her husband, which brings us to the end of this section.

S E C T. V.

From the accession of Don Juan and Donna Blanch of Navarre and Arragon, to the union of the crowns of France and Navarre, in the person of Henry of Bourbon.

^a THE very beginning of the new reign was disturbed with suspicions. The nobility and the clergy were not well pleased with sending the royal standard out of the kingdom. ^{Accession of Donna Blanch, and in her right Don Juan of Castile, to the kingdom of Navarre.} or being constrained to acknowledge a foreign prince for their sovereign, before he had sworn to respect their privileges, and to maintain the liberties of the people, who speedily caught the same spirit of uneasiness; and when a nation is once generally indisposed, they are seldom and with great difficulty recovered. Queen Blanch quickly perceived this; and therefore pressed the king, as soon as the peace was made with Castile, to make a tour to Navarre, which he did; but he neither staid long nor took much pains to render himself agreeable ². He had great estates in Castile, where himself and his brethren enjoyed vast power; and, in consequence of their cabals, held the king as it were in leading strings. In Arragon he met with the same kind of respect, being the brother and presumptive heir of one of the most generous kings that ever reigned, himself very brave, much attached to his countrymen, and procuring them great establishments in Castile, sometimes by interest, and sometimes by force ^b. He went therefore but by starts into Navarre; where, finding himself more restrained, and his authority bounded by limits which he would not give himself the trouble to understand, he conceived a notion that he was great as a prince and little as a king, which rendered him so cool and untentive to their concerns, that it was near four years before he was crowned. At length this ceremony was performed on the fifteenth of May at Pampeluna, when himself and his consort took the usual oaths; and, according to a custom that had prevailed from the time of the Goths, the king and the queen were exposed to the public view of their subjects, each of them seated on a buckler, supported by the deputies from the principal towns in their dominions ^c.

A. D. 1429.

THE king of Arragon and his brother, in conjunction with the malecontents of Castile, ^{The death of the queen Donna Blanch.} having renewed the war against the king, that monarch, in revenge, commanded the people of Bisay, and the adjacent provinces, to make irruptions into Navarre, which they did, and committed terrible devastations. He likewise declared the king of Navarre, his brother the infant Don Henry, and their adherents, rebels; confiscated all their estates; and, as the surest way to reduce them, distributed those estates amongst the most potent of the nobility in Castile, which had its effect, and at the same time mortified the people of Navarre extremely ^d. The conventions and treaties made from time to time between the princes of Arragon and Don Juan of Castile, subsisted no longer than either their own or the interests of their respective favourites directed. It was in pursuance of this maxim that the king of Navarre contracted his younger daughter Donna Leonora to Gaston de Foix; and we have an indubitable mark of the declension of this kingdom, in the fortune he gave her, which was fifty thousand crowns ^e. The desire of aggrandizing his family induced the king of Navarre to accompany his brother into Italy, where he was taken prisoner in an engagement at sea, to the great grief of the queen his consort, and the astonishment of his subjects ^f. He was released either at the close of that, or the beginning of the next year, when he returned into Spain, with his head filled with new projects; in seeking to execute which, he exhausted the forces and the treasure of Navarre and Arragon. The hopes of his subjects in the first-mentioned kingdom rested entirely on his son Don Carlos, prince of Viana; and it was to gratify their desires that he negotiated and concluded a marriage for him with the princess Anne, daughter to the duke of Cleves, and niece to the duke of Burgundy ^g. He had before engaged his eldest daughter, Donna Blanch, to Don Henry, prince of Asturias; and being summoned to complete this marriage, he carried her, with the queen his consort, and the greatest part of the nobility, to Valladolid, where, on the fifteenth of September, she was married to the infant Don Henry ^h, with such pomp and rejoicings, as till then had not been seen in Spain; notwithstanding which, this alliance began and ended in sorrow, Don Henry proving impotent, which the strict honour and modesty of that princess induced her to conceal, till his own folly and fury exposed it. The ceremony was scarce over, before, thro' the intrigues of the king of Navarre, the prince put himself at the head of a party against his father ; and the sense of these misfortunes, joined a to the foresight of the consequences that were like to attend them, broke the heart of queen Blanch, who had remained in Castile from the time of the marriage, and who left all to her son Don Carlos ; but with an express command not to assume the title of king, without the leave of his father. She deceased at Santa-Maria de Nieva, April the third, one thousand four hundred and forty-one, in the sixteenth year of her reign, leaving her son about the age of twenty-one, and her daughter Donna Blanch about seventeen ⁱ.

the princess of Viana.

A. D. 1543.

THE king, after the decease of his consort, tho' he retained that title, yet left the affairs of Navarre to be administered by the prince of Viana, who was very justly considered as the most amiable person of his rank in that age ^k. He had a fine person, excellent parts, and having been educated by those great men, whom the virtues of his grandfather had invited to his court, b he had a thorough tincture of all polite literature. He disapproved his father's measures in fomenting the troubles of Castile, more especially after his marriage with Donna Joanna, daughter of Don Frederic Enriquez, constable of Castile, purely with a view to unite him and the rest of the malecontent lords more closely to his party. He also disliked the seducing the prince of Asturias, his brother-in-law, from the duty he owed to the king his father ; and it was upon these principles, that when the king Don Juan of Navarre had caused some inroads to be made on the side of Navarre into Castile, chiefly by the Gascons in his pay, by whom some places were taken, the prince Don Carlos caused them immediately to be restored. He opposed, from the same motive, though he had a singular regard for the governor, his father's marching to the relief of the castle of Mauleon de Soule, in which he acted c as an auxiliary to the crown of England against the French, being desirous, if it had been possible, to maintain a strict tranquillity in Navarre, which he perceived to be the secret his grandfather used to render his dominions rich and flourishing, while a contrary conduct weakened and impoverished those of his neighbours. The king his father did not relish his advice ; but, on the contrary, instigated by his mother-in-law, began to look with an eye of suspicion on all his actions. About this time, that is, on the sixth of April, died his consort the princess Anne of Cleves, at the castle of Olita, from whence her corpse was transferred to Pampeluna, and buried in the cathedral with all suitable ceremony, the king being present ^l.

Disputes be-
and his son.

THE king of Navarre, partly from his own aversion to the king of Castile, and partly thro' the instigation of his queen, tho' she was also of the blood royal, as descending in a direct d line from Don Frederic, brother to the count of Trastemara and Don Pedro the Cruel, continued to practise every method possible to disturb the peace of that country, and to augment the misunderstandings in the royal family, which, in the end, turned every way to his own disadvantage ; his sisters, the queen dowager of Portugal and the reigning queen of Castile, being removed by poison, his brother Don Henry slain in the field, himself beaten, and, which he resented most of all, after being amused with a fallacious treaty, his son-in-law, the prince of Asturias, taken entirely out of his hands, and reconciled to the king his father by the constable Don Alvaro de Luna, who so far merited his master's favour, as that by these expedients he delivered him from his difficulties, and put it in his power to revenge the injuries he had received from the king of Navarre, by sending his son, the prince of Asturias, to e invade his dominions, and following him with a superior army. We have already touched this matter in the histories of Castile and Aragon ; but there is a necessity of retouching it here, not only to preserve the thread of the history, but also to set right some facts which Mariana and other Spanish historians have misrepresented ; for they suggest, that this war was undertaken by the crown of Castile, in support of Don Carlos, prince of Viana, against his father : whereas, in truth, their differences were so far from causing the commencement of the war, that they sprung only out of the conclusion of it. The prince of Asturias inclined at first to besiege Viana ; but finding that place well provided, he amused himself with taking some towns of less importance, till, upon joining his father, they concluded to invest Estella. If the prince of Viana had been a wicked man, and a thorough politician, he would certainly have remained f quiet at Pampeluna ; more especially if he had had any intelligence with the Castilians, since the queen his mother-in-law was in the place, and if taken must have fallen into their hands : but he, as soon as the news reached them, demanded a safe-conduct, went to the camp of the king of Castile, and having concluded with him a treaty of neutrality for Navarre, engaged him and the prince his son to raise the siege, and to retire into their own dominions. The king of Navarre refusing to ratify this treaty, and with a body of troops from Aragon committing, on the side of Navarre, hostilities against Castile, occasioned the breach between them, the prince of Viana thinking himself obliged to adhere to that treaty, which his father disapproved ^m.

a BUT the great source of the war was the state of the kingdom itself. Wealth, ease, and luxury, The prince de- had revived and nourished that spirit of faction always too common in that country. The Beau- monts, at the head of whom was the constable of Navarre, adhered to Don Carlos : they seated and ta- persuaded him that he had an immediate right to the kingdom ; that it was his duty to main- ken prisoner.
tain and exercise this right for the preservation of his subjects, since the activity and intrigues of his father would otherwise exhaust and ruin it. The Gramonts, on the other hand, who had at their head the marquis de Cortes, a bastard of the royal blood, made their court to the king, by assuring him that he had a clear right to the crown during his natural life ; that his measures were perfectly prudent, and would certainly be attended with success, if not counteracted by his son ; and that the people of Navarre in general were very desirous of espousing his b quarrel against Castile. Don Juan and Don Carlos were both princes of good qualities and shining abilities, and yet were both imposed upon and misled by the insinuations of persons much inferior to them in all respects. This brought on a battle, in which the king's life was in the utmost danger ; and at the close of which the prince of Viana was taken prisoner by the king's natural son Don Alonso ^a, who, notwithstanding, had a great affection for him ; and Mariana assures us the prince was so sensible of it, and so much afraid of his mother-in-law's sinister designs, that he would take no food during the time of his confinement A. D. 1452.
but from his brother ^a, which precaution, well or ill founded, rendered her universally detested.

THE king Don Juan took great pains to secure the person of his son, sending him first to c the castle of Tafalla, then to the fortress of Mallen, and from thence to that of Monroy ^b. Released, but These precautions served only to heighten suspicions, and to increase the jealousies of his sub- never truly re- jects. The states of Navarre were the open partizans of the prince : his uncle the king of conceded.
Arragon interposed in his behalf ; and the states of that kingdom interceded for him with great warmth ^c. In Castile the prince of Asturias, who had long maltreated his wife, the king of Navarre's daughter, now, to shew his hatred of him, procured a divorce, and sent home the princess Blanch ^d, who being as ill treated by her mother-in-law as the prince Don Carlos, it served to heighten the ill opinion the world entertained of that queen, which was but too strong before. At length Don Juan, to satisfy the desires of all Spain, admitted of a treaty, by which his own revenues were to be restored to Don Carlos, those of the kingdom
d to be divided between them, and the prince restored to his liberty ; which last article was executed after many delays, and with such reluctance as shewed that the peace would not continue long ^e. It would require some time and space to point out the pretences on which the troubles of Navarre were renewed. It is sufficient for our purpose to say, that they were no better than pretences ; and that the severity of the father on one side, the ambition of the son on the other, and the determined opinion of both that they were in the right, were the real motives which frustrated all negotiations for a solid peace, and rendered them, after every conference, less disposed to a reconciliation than they were before it. Besides, the prince Don Carlos relied upon the affections of the people, who were in reality much attached to him, upon the good-will of the king of Castile, tho' in truth that proceeded only from hatred to his father, and the e hopes that the states of Arragon and Catalonia would interpose in his favour. On the other hand, the king Don Juan piqued himself upon his authority and experience ; his military skill, as indeed he was a great captain ; and his ability in managing political intrigues, in which he always took, and often followed, the advice of his queen, who was a princess of great address. 1453.

AT length the civil war broke out again in Navarre, where it had never been thoroughly composed. Those of the prince's party began it, by surprising St. Jean de Pie de Port, the Progress, of king being then at a distance, which gave him an opportunity of subduing the best part of these disputes.
Navarre, the princess Blanch giving her brother all the assistance she could ^f. This provoked Don Juan to such a degree, that losing all sense of paternal tenderness, he established such a commission as declared, upon the evidence he produced to them, that both the prince Don Carlos and the infanta Donna Blanch were guilty of high-treason, and incapable of succeeding.
This step once taken, he disinherited both in the most solemn manner ; and declared his younger daughter, and in her right the count de Foix, to whom she was married, his heirs, appointing him general of his forces, and directing him to reduce Navarre ^g. To secure the utmost success to this plan, he entered into a treaty with the French king, Charles the seventh, and procured his approbation of his conduct towards his son, which, perhaps, he might not have done, if Charles had not been at this time upon very bad terms with the dauphin his heir-apparent ^h.

^j ZU-

The next spring the count de Foix, having joined a corps of French and Arragonefe troops to his own, entered Navarre, and, by dint of superior force, defeated and dissipated the troops of Don Carlos; so that having put sufficient garrisons into Pampeluna, and other fortresses, which he committed to the principal lords of his party, and having recommended them to the protection of the king of Castile, he resolved to make a tour himself into France, and pass from thence into Italy. It is somewhat uncertain whether he had an audience of Charles the seventh or not; but there is no doubt that he continued his journey to Rome, where he was treated with great kindness and respect by the Pope; from whence he proceeded to Naples, in order to pay his respects to his uncle *. While he was thus employed, the king his father summoned the deputies of all the towns he held in Navarre to meet at Estella, where they confirmed the disposition the king had made, and declared his daughter Donna Leonora heiress of the kingdom ^b. On the other hand, the inhabitants of Pampeluna, and other places in the interest of Don Carlos, proclaimed him king; which measure he did not at all approve, as not having force to support it. In this state of things, Don Alonso king of Arragon interposed, and prevented the count de Foix from subduing the kingdom, by engaging Don Juan to leave his concerns to the determination of his brother, as the prince of Viana had already done; on which Don Alonso declared all the proceedings against the prince and the infanta null and void ^c. It is very probable that thro' the prudence and probity of this monarch these disputes might have been composed; but before he was able to effect this, Don Alonso himself died, not in the most perfect terms of friendship with his nephew, on account of the offers that had been made him of the crown of Naples, by some malecontent lords, to the prejudice of his natural son Don Ferdinand, for whom he had the highest tenderness. On this account it was that he intimated to his nephew, that it would be prudent for him to retire into Sicily, where he remained some time, much to the mortification of his father, to whom that kingdom devolved, with the rest of the dominions of Arragon, from an apprehension that he would seize it as an equivalent for Navarre, of which he had declared Donna Leonora, countess of Foix, vice-queen, to the no small dissatisfaction of his subjects. But the prince freed him from these perplexities, by assuring him that he was ready to go into any part of his dominions he pleased, and reside there as a private person for the future ^a. A resolution that would have been highly advantageous to both parties, could either have been sincere.

We have related elsewhere the manner and motives of his return into his father's dominions, and the transactions that followed thereupon; the two negotiations for his marriage with a princess of Portugal, and the infanta Donna Isabella of Castile; his being arrested, after all the exterior marks of a thorough reconciliation with his father at Lerida; his being restored to his liberty by the insurrection of the Catalans in his favour; the cession of that principality, which his father was obliged to make; and his death in a short space after, on the twenty-third of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand four hundred and sixty-one, in the forty-first year of his age, whether of melancholy or of poison is very uncertain. He left behind him three natural children, two sons and a daughter; the eldest, Don Philip, applied himself to arms, and was preferred and caressed by his uncle Don Ferdinand, afterwards surnamed the Catholic; the younger, Don Juan Alonso, became an ecclesiastic. As for the daughter, Donna Agnes de Navarre, she espoused the duke of Medina Celi, who in her right would have laid claim to the kingdom of Navarre, pretending that the deceased prince had espoused her mother; which, however, is not at all probable, since it is very certain the prince, by his last testament, called to the succession of Navarre his sister Donna Blanch, to whom of right it belonged ^b. His death was far from extinguishing the disturbances that had been raised on his account. In Catalonia the people seemed disposed to obey any sovereign but their own in Navarre. The Castilians, under pretence of revenging the death of Don Carlos, committed horrid devastations; and the count de Foix, and his Gascous, who pretended to be in arms for Don Juan, did as much mischief as they could to all whom they stiled rebels. Thus the country was depopulated and destroyed on every side; so that most of the improvements made by Don Carlos the Noble were buried in their own ruins; and Don Juan, who had received this crown in its greatest lustre, and when the territories belonging to it were in the most flourishing state, saw it now in the most low and languishing condition, and, which was an additional mortification, heard his subjects almost universally ascribe his misfortunes and their own to his ambitious and unquiet disposition; to the unjust treatment his son had met with; and, above all, to the intrigues of his queen, who was said to have poisoned her son-in-law; to have been struck with a cancer as a judgment from heaven; and to have confessed this crime upon her death-bed ^c, at which the king was so much shocked,

^a that he instantly quitted the room, and could never be prevailed upon to visit her afterwards. But the Spanish historians say nothing of this, for very obvious reasons.

BUT Don Carlos was not the only victim of these intrigues; for the king Don Juan, finding himself so embarrassed on all sides, resolved to deliver up the unfortunate Donna Blanch, his eldest daughter, into the power of her younger sister; and under pretence of marrying her to Charles duke of Berry, he carried her by force over the Pyrenees. In her passage she wrote so moving a letter to Don Henry, king of Castile, that it can scarce be read by any person of common humanity at this day with dry eyes^d. She afterwards made a solemn protest, that in case she was obliged to renounce her just rights to the succession in favour of her sister, or of her brother Don Ferdinand, such renunciation should be null and void, as being directly opposite to her intention, and extorted from her by violence. Some few days after she made a full and free cession of all her rights to the kingdom of Navarre, in favour of Henry, king of Castile, and his heirs, in consideration of that constant protection which he had at all times afforded to her deceased brother and herself. After she was delivered up, she was sent to the castle of Orthes in Bearn, and there kept in close custody as a prisoner of state by those who ought to have considered her as their sovereign^e. This wicked proceeding being attended with the most disagreeable events, the king, either forced by the exigency of his affairs, or beginning to have a true sense of the cruel usage of his daughter, concluded a new treaty with the Beaumonts, who had always adhered to her and her brother's interest, restored them to their estates and dignities, and undertook that his daughter Donna Blanch should return into Navarre, and that the whole affair of the succession should be regulated in an assembly of the states, to which the count of Foix was to give his consent. But, to prevent the effects of this treaty, the countess of Foix caused her sister to be poisoned in the place of her confinement, where she expired December the second, one thousand four hundred and sixty-four^f.

And of his sister Donna Blanch.

By this melancholy event the treaty before-mentioned was entirely defeated, and things still remained in a very unsettled condition in this kingdom, while the rest of the dominions of Don Juan laboured under all the miseries of a civil war. However, Don Juan still kept the title, and in some measure the possession; which at length provoked the count de Foix to such a degree, that, with the assistance of the Beaumonts, he endeavoured to make himself master of Navarre by force of arms; but the Gramonts, taking up arms on the behalf of the king, and receiving seasonable succours from him, soon brought the count to listen to an accommodation^g. His son Don Gaston de Foix, for whose sake all these struggles were made, and who had married the princess Magdalen, sister to the king of France, went, about this time, to Bourdeaux, in order to assist at the marriage of the duke of Berry, where, in a tournament, the splinter of a lance struck him in the eye, of which he quickly died^h. He left behind him a son, Francis Phébus, and a daughter whose name was Katherine. The same year Donna Leonora, countess of Foix, held an assembly of the states at Tafalla; where a quarrel arose between the constable of Navarre and the bishop of Pampeluna, whose great familiarity with the countess had excited some indecent reports. The bishop, to prevent things from coming to extremity, retired to a convent; but the countess, importuning him to make her a visit, and sending some persons of distinction to accompany him, he was so imprudent as to venture out of his retreat, and was by the constable killed in his passage, which threw the whole kingdom into disorder, notwithstanding the author of this murder retired immediately into Arragonⁱ: from whence, however, it was not long before he returned again in triumph.

New troubles in Navarre.

THE countess Leonora had a very high spirit, and would willingly have shewn it, by punishing severely such as had contemned her authority, which in a free country is never acceptable, the people being unwilling to hear of any authority, but that of the law, which punishes indeed, but with justice and in moderation. Finding it impracticable to execute her desires by force, she pressed the king her father to put an end to these disorders, by consenting that the government should be entirely regulated at the will of the states, supposing that if she was once invested with the executive power, her designs might be easily accomplished. King John, who was exceedingly embarrassed at this time by the Catalans, supported by the French, accepted readily of this expedient; and the states being assembled at Olita, a regulation was settled, which consisted of thirteen articles; the title and the administration, when present, being reserved to the old king, and in his absence invested in the countess Leonora, who is styled heiress of Navarre, and infanta of Arragon and Sicily^k. Provision was likewise made for the pacification and gradual extinction of those feuds which had so long distracted the kingdom. By degrees things might have been reduced into good order, but the countess Leonora was too much in haste; and having drawn the marshal of Navarre to her party, she attempted to surprise Pampeluna, which had been always in the hands of the Beaumonts, but in which the marshal of Navarre had some correspondence. The scheme succeeded so far, that the marshal found admittance with 50 or 60 young gentlemen of family; but they discovered themselves too soon, and the inhabitants taking arms, they were reduced in the place to which they fled for shelter, and, contrary to the capitulation they had made, were massacred to a man¹. This added fresh fuel to the countess's resentment, who began to raise forces with great diligence; and pressing her husband to come and assume the command, he passed the Pyrenees with a considerable force: but what the event of this irruption might have been we cannot say, since the count died of a fever before he undertook any thing, and was buried in the church of Orthes in Bearn, in the month of August, one thousand four hundred and seventy-two^m. The unexpected death of her husband so much disturbed Donna Leonora's projects, that she was unable to do any thing this year, which gave the faction of the Beaumonts time to fortify all the places that were in their hands; and this opportunity they took care not to lose.

And of the king
Don Juan.

THE countess, still bent on establishing her authority, and punishing those who had last offended her, turned herself on every side, and solicited succours from every quarter; but this manner of proceeding, instead of quieting, increased the distractions of Navarre, and made the weakness of the government still more apparent. At length, when she had few places remaining, when all her power depended upon a military force, which she was unable to pay, and which had so wasted the country that it could not pay herself, and that her revenue was come to nothing, she applied herself to her father king John of Arragon, and her brother Don Ferdinand of Castile, who interposed to no great purpose; but who at length had a meeting with her at Vittoria, on purpose to discuss these matters thoroughly. There Don Ferdinand insisted, that the only possible method of putting an end to these quarrels, was to reconcile the parties, and grant an indemnity to all; which had always been the opinion of his father, and which at length prevailed. The countess Donna Leonora was very little satisfied with this interview, notwithstanding her own administration was supported, and the succession of her children securedⁿ. She knew the count de Lerin had married Donna Leonora of Arragon, her natural sister. She apprehended that the Beaumonts had demanded and obtained the protection of Don Ferdinand; and that, in consequence of this pacification, her views would be for ever defeated, her favourites remain unrewarded, and those who had opposed her unpunished, which was what she could not bear. The violence of her temper, and her inability to conceal it, as it caused, so it increased her misfortunes; for the distaste she shewed to her brother hindered her receiving any longer the pension paid her from the treasury of Castile, which brought her so low, that she was obliged to sell part of her jewels to subsist the household, rather than the court, she kept in the castle of Tafalla. In this situation her affairs stood, when her father, worn out with years and infirmities, breathed his last at Barcelona, on Tuesday the nineteenth of January, one thousand four hundred and seventy-nine^o. His circumstances were yet worse than hers, since the very moveables of his palace were sold to discharge the expences of his funeral, which were far from being considerable. In the midst of this poverty, he directed many foundations, and other works of cost, by his will, which were punctually performed by his son Don Ferdinand and the Catholic, to whom he left all the rest of his dominions, except the kingdom of Navarre, which indeed was not his to leave, and which had suffered more under his reign, who either was or might have been the most puissant of its kings, than under the feeblest of its monarchs. So little does the happiness of a people depend on the grandeur, or even on the abilities of their prince, unless both are directed by a good intention.

Short reign of queen Leo-
nora.

A. D. 1479.

LEONORA, countess of Foix, was immediately proclaimed queen on the certain advice of her father's death. It was an event she had long and earnestly expected, and which she flattered herself would have put an end to all the inconveniencies to which she had been for so many years exposed. But it came too late; for chagrin had made so great an impression, that this disease, which her grief had produced, removed her out of this life, after a reign of two and twenty days^p. She expired on the tenth of February; and by her will recommended the care of her grandchildren to their father's relations; that is, in effect, to the crown of France, without mentioning her brother Don Ferdinand. This princess had a numerous posterity, of whom it is necessary to speak, as it will throw light on various parts of our history. Of these there were four sons and five daughters. Don Gaston bore the title of prince of Viana, slain at a tournament, as we have before mentioned, as some say by the hand of Charles duke of Berry, in honour of whose marriage it was celebrated. John de Foix, lord of Narbonne, which his father purchased for him. He left two children, the famous Gaston de Foix, who was killed a at the battle of Ravenha where he was generalissimo of the army of Lewis the twelfth; and Germana de Foix, who became the consort of Ferdinand the Catholic. Peter de Foix, the third son of this princess, was an ecclesiastic, and honoured by Pope Sixtus the fourth with the purple. James, the youngest, bore the title of count de Cortes, distinguished himself in the profession of arms, and was esteemed one of the bravest men, and one of the greatest captains of his age. The princess Mary espoused William marquis of Montferrat. Joanna married John count of Armagnac. Margaret became the consort of Francis the second, duke of Bretagne, by whom she had two daughters, Anne and Isabel; the former shared the bed of Charles the eighth and Lewis the twelfth, kings of France. The princess Katherine married Gaston de Foix, count of Candale, by whom she had two sons and a daughter, Anne, who married Ladislaus, king of Hungary; the youngest, Leonora, who was promised to the duke de Medina Cæli, but died unmarried. It has been remarked that there were four queens of this house, cousin-germans to each other, living at a time; viz. Katherine of Navarre, Germana of Castile and Arragon, Anne of France, and Anne of Bohemia and Hungary; but this at a juncture when it was far from being happy.

FRANCIS PHOEBUS, count of Foix, lord of Bearn, and of various other places, was immediately acknowledged sovereign of Navarre, upon the decease of his grandmother^a. He was just entered into the twelfth year of his age; and as he had received the name of Phœbus from his exquisite beauty, so he might be said to deserve it no less for the qualities of his mind, since all writers agree that he was the most capable and best educated prince of that age, his mother the princess Magdalen of France having been extremely attentive to whatever concerned his health, and his uncle the cardinal having caused him to be constantly instructed in his presence: but notwithstanding the clearness of his right, and the lustre of his birth, as being nephew to the monarch of France, and grand-nephew to the king of Castile and Arragon, he had nothing more than the title of king of Navarre, the Beaumonts and the Gramonts being in full possession of all the places of any strength or consequence in that country, except those in the hands of king Ferdinand, who held them by no better title^c. But this monarch coming to Saragossa, in order to receive the homage of his hereditary subjects, the cardinal of Foix and his brother prince James came thither to confer with him, and to intreat his interposition for calming those troubles that had so long distracted a kingdom in which he had so great an interest. The king received them with great civility, and treated them with much candour. He observed, that severity could only render things worse; that where all were equally to blame, and none could well be punished, a general pardon was the safest and the speediest means of reducing things to order; that having published this, they would do well to go into Navarre, and try to the utmost what fair means would do, promising to give them all the countenance he could, and if this failed to assist them with his forces^d. They went accordingly into Navarre, and held an assembly of the states, where they met with a better reception than they expected. The deputies from the cities and towns told them plainly, that the source of their misfortunes was the absence of their sovereigns, which rendered some men very considerable, who were otherwise of no great account; that even now the friends of mutiny and faction were but few; and that tho' the great lords withheld the cities from each other, yet none of them could withhold them from the king, as to whose title there was no question. Upon this the two princes returned, and demanded once more the sentiments of Don Ferdinand, who approved entirely the advice given them by the states, adding, the young king ought to bring with him a good force, to act with spirit, but to speak with mildness. All things were quickly regulated after their return to Bearn; from whence the young king, in company with his mother, his uncles, and a small but well appointed army, entered his hereditary dominions. It is said, and very probably with truth, that the count de Lerin was far from being well pleased at his arrival: however, he went to meet him, and found him so well accompanied, that he held it expedient to deliver up Pampeluna, which he did with great expressions of loyalty; and the king having made his public entry into it on the third, was crowned on the sixth of November, with the universal acclamation of all his subjects^e, who were far from apprehending this ceremony would be but once more seen in Navarre. A.D. 1481.

As soon as this ceremony was performed, he visited all the considerable places in the kingdom, accompanied by such a force as hindered any difficulty of his obtaining possession. He likewise made a strict enquiry into the government, and how the laws were carried into execution: all which he performed with a gravity so much superior to his age, that the great lords were astonished, and people received him as a king sent from heaven. This conduct was very unusual in a minority, the king acting in person, while all the grants and other instruments ran in the name of his mother, who stiled herself Magdalen, sister and daughter of France, princess of a Viana, and tutoress to her well-beloved son Francis Phœbus, by the grace of God, king of Navarre. This bright scene was but of short duration. This excellent young monarch was under the eye of two of the most artful and subtle monarchs that perhaps ever reigned, Lewis the eleventh of France, and Don Ferdinand the Catholic. Family and inclination bound his mother blindly to the former; whereas his interest, and consequently hers, should have swayed them to the latter. Don Ferdinand proposed to him, or rather to his mother, the marriage of Donna Joanna, who was afterwards the heiress of all his dominions; and at the same time proposed to contract the princess Katherine to his son the infant Don Juan. If this had taken effect Navarre had been absolutely secure, and the young king might have availed himself of the wisdom and power of their Catholic majesties, and of the prosperity which they derived b from both. On the other hand, the French monarch proposed a match with the unfortunate Donna Joanna, daughter to Henry the Impotent, king of Castile, then in Portugal, which must have been attended with a long war, to which the force of Navarre was by no means equal; tho' the young king, by threatening death to any who attempted to revive the factions of Beaumont and Gramont, and the like punishment for the founding a trumpet, or exciting a tumult, had brought his dominions into a surprizing degree of order and obedience^u.

Sudden and unexpected death.

A D. 1483.

THE principal nobility of Navarre, and more especially the count de Lerin, who it was found absolutely necessary to confirm in the office of constable, which he had taken upon himself, and was the most considerable in the kingdom, pressed the marriage with great warmth, probably from a motive of interest: but from whatever motive it was, they offered unanswerable reasons in its favour. On the other hand, the French ambassador, and all who were of his faction, amused the princess-regent with the visionary hopes of raising her son to the throne of Castile, by a confederacy then upon the carpet between Lewis the eleventh of France, the king of Portugal, and other princes. To rid herself, therefore, from these importunities, or perhaps that she might have the young king and his sister more immediately in her power, she resolved to carry them back into Bearn; and this, tho' dissuaded from it by all the old and wife counsellors of Navarre, she performed. Immediately after their return to Pau, the usual residence of the court, the king began to decline; and on the thirtieth of January, one thousand four hundred and eighty-three, breathed his last, and was buried in the cathedral church of Lescar^v. All historians agree that there were very strong suspicions of poison; and some relate, that being much addicted to music, the young king complained that he was never well after putting a new flute to his mouth; yet the physicians could determine nothing as to his disease, which consisted altogether in an inward wasting, without any exterior symptoms; but what contributed most to the report was, that he said often to those about him, my kingdom is not of this world. He was sincerely regretted by his subjects, and with great reason; for as they had the most pleasing expectations from his genius, capacity, and strong sense of justice, so they foresaw very clearly that by his death their former troubles would be revived: in which they were far from being mistaken; for the count de Lerin had no sooner informed their Catholic majesties of this melancholy event, than Don Juan de Ribeyra was sent with a strong corps of troops to support the count who had repossessed himself of Pampeluna and other places^w.

Katherine queen of Navarre.

DONNA Katherine de Foix was immediately declared queen of Navarre, upon the decease of her brother; but the princess Magdalen her mother quickly found that the perplexities which she before thought intolerable were now increased. Doctor Maldonado was sent from their Catholic majesties to condole with her on the death of her son, and to press the marriage of her daughter with the infant Don Juan, heir-apparent of their Catholic majesties, as the only means to extinguish the factions which were again revived in Navarre; and to protect the young queen against the viscount de Narbonne, who pretended to be the heir male of the family of Foix^x. The princess, determined to support the interests of France, at the expence of her daughter as well as her son, after professing a deep sense of the honour done her, told him that Navarre was a country which must be governed by men; that this compelled her to think of marrying her daughter without delay, and would not suffer her to have any thoughts of their Catholic majesties heir, who was but an infant. The Spanish minister, who was both an able and an honest man, told her plainly what he thought of her measures, and of her reasoning; remarked the change of affairs in France by the death of her brother; the certainty of keeping of all things quiet till the prince of Asturias was of age, if she consented to the marriage; and the great risk she must run in disposing of the queen her daughter without the consent of the states of Navarre, purely to gratify the court of France, who, tho' they might promise, would find it difficult to grant her sufficient assistance^y.

- a ALL this had no effect on the princess Magdalen, any more than the viscount of Narbonne's Jean d' Al. entering by force into the county of Foix, of which he reduced the greatest part. It only ^{best king in her} taught her to see the necessity of marrying the young queen without delay, which operated ^{right.} upon her so strongly, that, at the instance of the court of France, she concluded a marriage for that young princess in the month of January, with Jean d' Albert, son to Alan d' Albert, count of Perigord, Limoges, Dreux, &c. and, notwithstanding the town of Tudela declared they would put themselves under the protection of their Catholic majesties, in case she married her daughter without the consent of the states, it was celebrated at Orthes on the fourteenth of June following ^a; and the lord of Abenas, uncle to the new-married prince, was declared viceroy of Navarre, where the faction of the Gramonts professed themselves extremely loyal A. D. 1481.
- b to their queen. By their assistance he governed so much of that country as acknowledged the queen's authority, with much prudence and moderation: the rest the count of Lerin governed with almost as great authority as if he had been king, under the protection of their Catholic majesties, who justified this behaviour chiefly from political motives, alleging that Navarre was the gate of Spain; and that in common prudence they were bound to keep it shut against the French, who withheld from them the county of Rousillon, and were disposed to let no opportunity slip of giving them trouble ^b. It was not long before Jean d' Albert and his consort found themselves under a necessity of seeking the friendship of Don Ferdinand. Their affairs on both sides the Pyrenees were so miserably distressed, and during the nonage of Charles the eighth the government was so little disposed in their favour, or rather shewed such a
- c visible partiality for the male line of the house of Foix, that, how unwillingly soever they were constrained to apply themselves to the Catholic king, who might have found many pretences, either to complete the conquest of their kingdom, or have abandoned it to the ambition of a few great lords; who, dividing it as their influence and alliance directed, would have held it under his protection. Don Ferdinand received these applications very civilly, and, kindly assured them he was by no means desirous of giving any countenance to their enemies, or of depriving them of their dominions; that, on the contrary, he would do for them whatever they could reasonably desire, as having nothing more at heart than to see them peaceably in possession of their hereditary dominions, and freed from all the difficulties to which their family had been so long exposed. In a small time after they renewed their addresses, by
- d Alan d' Albert, father-in-law to the queen, who was at this time in arms against the French king, and who came to Valencia to demand succours for himself and his confederates, the duke of Bretagne and the duke of Orleans, and protection for his son. Don Ferdinand told him that he was about to undertake the war of Granada, which hindered him from doing all he asked; but that he was ready to assist him to the utmost of his power. To shew he was in earnest, he directed a squadron to be fitted out in Biscay for his service; ordered Don Juan de Ribeyra to restore all the places he had taken in Navarre, and at the same time declared that kingdom under his protection ^e, which was of very great consequence at this juncture. 1488.

- e THE kingdom of Navarre, though secured from foreign invasions by this compromise ^{Differences} with Castile, was not entirely free from domestic discord; the factions that had torn it so ^{with Don} long continuing to tear it still, though not with so great violence as in times past. At length the queen and her consort were prevailed upon, by the earnest solicitation of the states, to pass the mountains, and fix their residence at Pampeluna, where they were received with great pomp, proclaimed, and, after taking the usual oaths, crowned king and queen of Navarre, on the tenth of January, in the presence of many prelates and great lords, and of Don Juan and Don Pedro de Silva, their Catholic majesties ambassadors ^f. In the month of April they sent the baron of Lautrec, and other deputies, to renew the alliance made with the king of Castile; by which the king and queen of Navarre promised to keep the entrances of Navarre in such a manner that no troops might be able to pass, and not to give
- f any assistance whatever to the enemies of his Catholic majesty. On the other hand Don Ferdinand took them for his true friends and allies, and swore, in the presence of the ambassadors, that no injury should be offered to their subjects, either in the kingdom of Navarre or lordship of Bearn ^g. The next year the war breaking out between the crowns of France and Castile, the queen of Navarre went to Alfaro on the frontiers, where she had an interview with their Catholic majesties, where these promises were on both sides renewed. In virtue of this agreement, the kingdom of Navarre did not suffer in the least during the course of that war; and after the peace the harmony between the crowns seemed to subsist in the same cordial manner ^h: however, some persons having suggested to the king and queen, that this neutrality had been of so great consequence to their Catholic majesties that they had reason to expect some ample gratification, they were prevailed upon to send two ecclesiastics ambassadors into Castile, to demand that all the lordships and estates that had been possessed by the king Don Juan, as infant of Castile, should be restored to them. Don Ferdinand heard this very calmly, and returned them for answer, that those estates had been justly forfeited, and long ago united to the crown², and afterwards granted to other subjects, so that the restitution was impossible; but that, if it had been otherwise, himself, and not they, was intitled to all the estates in Castile belonging to that prince. This and their forcing the count de Lerin to quit Navarre, occasioned such a misunderstanding, as induced king Jean d'Albert, who perceived he had pushed this matter too far, to make a step on the other side, which was still more extraordinary; for he went in person to Seville, to assure Don Ferdinand, that, notwithstanding his reconciliation to the French court, his intentions were intirely upright with regard to the crown of Castile. The catholic king treated him with great magnificence³; endeavoured to reconcile him to his brother-in-law the count de Lerin, or, in case that was impracticable, offered to give that nobleman, whom he had created marquis of Heusca, an equivalent for his lands in Andalusia, and a large sum to the king of Navarre to consent to this bargain. At his first arrival this prince had lodgings assigned him in the royal palace; and, to prevent giving him umbrage, the count de Lerin was forbid to enter it; yet knowing him to be a very wise man, the king of Navarre upon this proposition desired he might take his advice. At this interview the constable count de Lerin told him, that lands and fortresses could have no price; for that whatever sum he received would in time be spent, while the places remaining to the crown of Castile would prove a perpetual curb to him and his successors. The king not only took his advice, but received him into favour, invited him to return into Navarre, which not long after he accepted of, the peace being renewed⁴; but their broils, as we shall have occasion to shew, broke out again, and ended, as might have been easily foreseen, in the ruin of both parties.

Renewed unseasonably by the king of Navarre.

ABOUT four years after the king and queen of Navarre sent the governor of Pampeluna into Castile, to renew their pretensions to the estates of their ancestor, as having been settled by the marriage-contract with queen Blanch, on the issue of that marriage. Don Ferdinand gave them a general answer; and, as a proof of his regard for their interest, offered them his grand-daughter Donna Isabella for their son Henry, prince of Viana, which they accepted with joy; but from which they afterwards disengaged themselves⁵. When the archduke Philip took the title of king of Castile the king of Navarre entered into an alliance with him, and upon his demise opposed to the utmost the recalling Don Ferdinand to the regency. When he discovered this to be ineffectual he solicited the emperor Maximilian to bring Don Carlos into Spain, and offered him a passage with his army thro' his dominions⁶. To shew how much he was in earnest, and to render himself entirely master at home, he raised an army; and, after a brisk war, having dispossessed the count de Lerin of every fortress he had in the kingdom, he drove him to take shelter in Arragon; and after this success began to fortify his frontiers, to increase the number of his forces, and to enter into negotiations with Lewis the twelfth of France, that he might not only be in a condition to defend himself, but also become formidable to his neighbours, believing that the fatigues and infirmities of Don Ferdinand, and the many arduous affairs he had upon his hands, would hinder his giving him any disturbance. He was the more confirmed in this, by reason that his old antagonist Lewis de Beaumont, count de Lerin, constable of the kingdom, was dead in Arragon, and his countess also, who was sister to Don Ferdinand⁷; but he did not consider that the son of the constable, and many other persons of distinction, who adhered to the faction of the Beaumonts, were received and caressed by the Catholic king. He also promised himself much from that affability and familiarity with which he lived, in respect to the nobility and persons of distinction of Pampeluna, which produced indeed, so long as fortune seemed to favour him, an appearance of general and deep affection; but in reality, as his queen told him, lessened him so much in their opinions, that they looked upon him rather as plain Jean d'Albert, than as king of Navarre, as he soon felt to his cost. Condescension can seldom be so tempered as to be commendable in kings.

Who is by him in the space of a few days.

THE success of Don Ferdinand's arms in Italy, his alliance with England, and the obligation he had thereby laid himself under of transferring the war into France, all pointed to the great design which he had been long meditating, of conquering, or, in plain terms, usurping, the kingdom of Navarre, for which he made all the necessary preparations, almost without suspicion. As soon as this was accomplished, he acquainted the king of Navarre, that, in-

- a tending to pass through his dominions with an army into France, he expected that Estella, St. Jean Pie de Port, and some other places, should be put into his hands^a; which proposition the king rejected, but endeavoured several times to enter into a negotiation on milder terms, in which Don Ferdinand soothed him till his general Don Frederic de Toledo, duke of Alba, in the month of July, entered his dominions with a numerous army, well provided with all things, advancing directly towards Pampeluna. The king, being informed that Lewis de Beaumont, son to the old constable, commanded the vanguard, and perceiving that he had a strong party among the inhabitants, altered the resolution he had formed of defending that place to the last extremity, determining to quit Navarre, and retire into France, with which, though very unwillingly, queen Katherine was forced to comply^b. Pampeluna and several other strong places opened their gates; and, upon a promise that their privileges should be preserved, submitted. The king, being informed of this, sent to the duke of Alba to demand conditions. His answer was, that, upon delivering up his kingdom till Don Ferdinand should think fit to restore it, and sending the prince of Viana as a hostage, he might make his peace. The king rejected this, in which he was certainly right; but Don Ferdinand sending a minister to confer with him, he arrested and delivered him up to the French, which was apparently wrong: he quickly saw it, and procured him to be set at liberty; but then it was too late, and Don Ferdinand took occasion from thence to refuse to treat with him at all^c. His queen is also said to have told him, that, if she had been John, and he Katherine, they had lived and died king and queen of Navarre. The unfortunate are always upbraided.
- c On the other hand the French, amazed at this sudden conquest, suspected, or pretended to suspect, that the king of Navarre acted in concert with the Spaniards, and had betrayed his country instead of losing it, which obliged that unfortunate king to go to Paris, where having convinced king Lewis that his only crime consisted in his confidence in the justice of his Catholic majesty, and the loyalty of his own subjects, the French army that was then assembling on the frontiers was ordered to proceed, and the duke de Valois, afterwards king Francis the first, was directed to place king John again upon the throne^d. That monarch himself, with a body of six thousand of his own troops, forced a passage through the vallies, and entered Navarre, where a great part of the country revolted in his favour, and he actually laid siege to Pampeluna, though at length he was constrained to raise it^e. The advanced season of the year, want of provisions, the superior capacity of the duke of Alba, the misunderstandings between the dukes of Bourbon and Longueville, and king Ferdinand's sending a fresh army into Navarre, under the command of the duke de Najara, were the causes that obliged king John to retreat, and not any want either of courage or capacity in him, for he gave great marks of both in the course of this campaign. The next year he was in a great measure left to himself, the French finding it requisite for their affairs to make a truce; and, as a mark of their punctuality and good faith, ordered the forces that king John had raised in their territories to disband, by which he lost the fortress of Moya, the only place of consequence that held out for him in his dominions; and the death of Lewis the twelfth, which happened on the first day of the next year, hindered him from being able to make any considerable effort, though he made the best preparations for it in his power, and held some correspondencies in Navarre, tho' the far greater part of the nobility had been flattered, or forced to yield obedience to Don Ferdinand the Catholic, and his daughter Donna Joanna, upon a promise that the rights of the kingdom should be secured, and their particular privileges preserved^f, which, in their circumstances, was as much as they could expect.

The annexing Navarre to Castile.

ONE of the last actions of the Catholic monarch's life was, to engage the states of Castile to annex or incorporate Navarre, so as to remain for ever indivisible from their crown, without the specification of any save the ancient rights^g. He pretended however various titles, and applied them variously as his occasions required. Sometimes he derived his title from his wife Germana de Foix, which title must have been of very quick growth, since it arose from the death of her brother Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, slain in the month of April, the invasion being made in the month of July. But the truth was, that Katherine queen of Navarre had very large estates in Catalonia; these king Ferdinand seized, and gave to his wife Germana, who, as he said, was the sole heiress of the house of Foix; but if it was true that she could be heiress to her brother Don Gaston, then that rule would hold with respect to the queen of Navarre; and her brother Francis Phœbus and Katherine sole heiress of the house of Foix, upon Ferdinand's own shewing. Sometimes the Pope's sentence^h, by which John and Katherine were deprived of their dominions, was pleaded for a just ground of conquest; but then this bull of deprivation was never seen, and, if it ever existed, was granted after the conquest was made ; but the truth is, that Ferdinand had two irresistible titles, a long a head, and a long sword ; and if justice will not admit of these, then the seizing and keeping the kingdom of Navarre is a plain and flagrant usurpation ; and indeed in that light it has been generally and justly considered.

Death of the king and queen
in exile.

AFTER the death of Don Ferdinand the Catholic, the unfortunate king of Navarre made another attempt ; but the marshal of Navarre, who was at the head of it, was surpris'd, and several other persons of distinction taken prisoners ; and this defeat is said to have afflicted the king so much, that he died chiefly of chagrin, in the month of June, one thousand five hundred and sixteen^w. His queen survived him about eight months ; but the exact time of her death does not appear. They had in all fourteen children, of which it will be necessary only to mention four. Henry succeeded them in all their claims, as well as in their estates ; Charles b died in Italy a youth ; Anne espoused the count of Candale ; and Isabel became the consort of the count de Roban, in Bretagne. Both directed that their bodies should be deposited only in the cathedral of Lescar, in order to their being afterwards removed to Pampeluna, when it should be recovered by their posterity, to whom, notwithstanding their misfortunes, they left a great patrimony, composed of the estates belonging to the two ancient families of Foix and Albert, what was left of the equivalents given for the counties of Champagne and Brie, and some fragments of the realm of Navarre^x. Here in strictness we might end this history, since the kingdom of Navarre has ever since remained, and still remains, to the descendents of Ferdinand the Catholic ; and those who afterwards preserved the title, and were stiled kings of Navarre in France, ought to be regarded as princes of that kingdom of which they are now c become sovereigns ; but for the sake of perspicuity, and that the reader may see in the same place, and at the same time, all that can be said on the same subject, we will continue, though very succinctly, the history of these princes, till they were seated on the throne of France.

Henry II. king of Navarre.

HENRY the second, king of Navarre, as he is stiled, was about fourteen, when, upon the death of his mother, he assumed that title, under the protection of Francis the first, who, by the conclusion of the treaty of Nojon with the archduke Charles, apprehended he had laid a good foundation for the restitution of that realm to the house of Albert ; but after Charles became king of Spain, and was solicited to the performance of it by a solemn embassy from king Francis, he returned only general answers, which served to keep the French in suspense, and himself in security^y. We have shewn in the history of that regency, which took d place on the death of Don Ferdinand, what method was taken for the preservation of Navarre, and upon what motives all the famous fortresses in that kingdom were dismantled and demolished, excepting Pampeluna, and one or two more. This was certainly a very wise course for preventing insurrections in a country where every town, and almost every village was divided into factions ; but it laid the kingdom open to foreign invasions, more especially in the situation things were in ; and they had a prince at the back of the Pyrenees, who, in the opinion of all the world, had a just claim to the crown. When, therefore, the kingdoms of Castile and Arragon were perplexed by the insurrection of the commons, Andrew de Foix, lord of Esparre, having made himself master of St. Jean de Pie de Port, entered Navarre e with a French army, and finding the people well affected towards their natural sovereign, advanced directly to Pampeluna, which opened its gates, and in the space of a very few days the best part of the kingdom was recovered, and the army of the lord de Esparre augmented in such a manner, that he vented to invest Logroño^z. But the duke of Najara, the Spanish viceroy, having by this time received reinforcements of old troops from different parts of the kingdom, obliged the French to raise the siege. They continued their retreat into the neighbourhood of Pampeluna, where, upon some intelligence of a disorder in the Spanish army, the French general took a resolution to fight ; and though he behaved himself with great courage, and was well seconded by his troops, yet the superiority of numbers carried it, and his army being intirely defeated, and himself, as some writers say, taken prisoner, Pampeluna and the rest of Navarre was recovered in as short a time as it was lost, and the hopes of king Henry f intirely disappointed^a. He attended king Francis into Italy, and was taken prisoner with him at the battle of Pavia, but found means to make his escape^b. He espoused, the year following, the princess Margaret, widow of Charles count of Alençon, and the only sister of Francis the first, by whom he became the father of the princess Joanna, who in his life-time espoused Anthony Bourbon duke of Vendosme^c. King Henry survived to the year one thousand five hundred and fifty-five, and then deceased in his palace of Pau in Bearn, in the fifty-third a year of his age^d (A). The emperor Charles the fifth had tried every method to obtain from him a resignation of his title to Navarre, but without effect, though he did him the justice to own he merited that title as well as any prince of that age.

JOANNA D'ALBERT, and in her right Anthony duke of Vendosme, assumed the titles of king and queen of Navarre, and we shall have occasion to speak of them at large in the next chapter. As for the king, he was esteemed a gentle and a good prince; and the queen was justly admired for her strong parts and masculine understanding, as well as for her steadiness in support of the Protestant religion. The king was wounded at the siege of Rouen, and died at Andely on the Seine, in his way to Paris, November the seventeenth, one thousand five hundred and sixty-two, in the forty-fifth year of his age^e. The queen survived him almost ten years; and is generally supposed to have been poisoned by the artifice of the queen mother of France, at the marriage of her son, June the ninth, one thousand five hundred and seventy-two, in the forty-fourth year of her age^f. They had five children, three sons and two daughters; but of these only two survived, Henry, and Katherine, who became duchess of Lorraine, often solicited to become a Catholic, which, it is said, she sometimes promised, but died a zealous Protestant at last (B).

(A) The design of this note is to let the reader into certain circumstances regarding the personal history of Henry d'Albert, king of Navarre, which may facilitate the understanding some of the principal events that are mentioned in this and the next chapter. Henry had a mind truly royal, and so much of the spirit and majesty of a monarch, under all the weight of his misfortunes, that he appeared, in the eyes of the best judges, more worthy of wearing a crown than if he had actually wore it. An irreproachable witness of this was the emperor Charles the fifth, who, after he had passed through France, declared publicly, that he had but seen one man in that kingdom, and he was the king of Navarre (1). Henry applied himself, with great diligence, to regulate, in the best manner, the government in those provinces he had still left. He established a supreme court of justice at Pau. He constructed a regular fortress, called Navarreins, on an extensive plain, in which he kept always a strong garrison; and, in times of public danger, incamped a good corps of horse and foot under its walls (2). He encouraged both inland and foreign trade, to the utmost of his power; and, which was of the greatest consequence to his family, he educated Henry the young prince of Bearn, afterwards Henry the Great, while a boy, in a manner that qualified him for greatness. He suffered him to be ill clad and ill shod; made him fare coarsely, and lie hard, not by the exertion of his parental authority, but by his own example, and by persuading him, that he who is to command men ought to be equal, if not superior, to mankind in general, in those things especially which men with most difficulty sustain. He took care that he should be learned; but he would have his learning taught him by conversation rather than by books, obliging him to fix certain Latin and Greek maxims firmly in his memory; and taught him the use and application of them in the conduct of life (3). He made no attempts to recover his dominions, after that mentioned in the text; but he held a constant intelligence in Navarre, knew the state and forces in that kingdom exactly; and, it is said, if he had lived a month longer, would have made himself master of it (4). His personal character was the great point in this matter; the nobility of Navarre knew and confided in him; his successor was, in some measure, a stranger to them; and therefore, though he endeavoured to take up the enterprize where his father-in-law had left it, yet it was to no purpose; and from this period the recovery of the kingdom of Navarre became altogether impracticable, the persons of its lawful princes being very little known, and their interests gradually divided from those of their subjects; that is, in the same proportion they grew connected with those of France.

(B) Anthony, duke of Vendosme, was the heir-general of the house of Bourbon, and had great estates of his own, which might probably contribute to the first umbrage taken at court. The French king, Henry the second, was very unwilling, on the death of his father-in-law, to permit him to go to Bearn. He thought there ought not to be two sovereigns in one country; and proposed, therefore, the exchange of all that he had acquired by his marriage with the heiress of Navarre, for other lands in France; and when he could not succeed in this, he shewed his resentment by separating Languedoc from the government of Guienne, which his father Henry d'Albert had enjoyed (5). This Anthony of Bourbon was of so amorous a complexion, that it occasioned many quarrels between him and his queen, from whom, notwithstanding, he would never be divorced; though, after she became a widow, there was once a project for procuring for him Mary queen of Scots (6). In the end, it is said, this passion for women cost him his life, by his slighting the advice of his physicians, while he was under their cure for his wound (7). Joan of Albert was in all respects a very extraordinary woman. Her father would have married her to Philip the second, in the life-time of the emperor Charles the sixth; but the French monarch, Francis the first, her uncle, would not suffer it: on the contrary, he actually contracted, and even celebrated the marriage, July the 15th, 1540, between her and William duke of Cleves, whom the emperor Charles the fifth had deprived of his dominions, and with whom he made his peace, by deserting this princess; and upon this Francis married her to the duke of Vendosme, first prince of the blood of France (8). She was at first averse to what was called the new doctrines; but became afterwards a most zealous Protestant. After the death of her husband, and of his queen Elizabeth, Philip the second renewed his propositions of marriage; to which the queen prudently answered, that she thought herself sufficiently honoured by his esteem (9). With all her good qualities, she had one great defect, for she was insupportably haughty; and to this the hatred of queen Mary de Medicis has been attributed by such as allege she was poisoned by her direction, though that is a fact positively denied by authors. She was the seventh heiress and queen of Navarre in her own right.

Henry III. of Navarre, IV. of France. HENRY the third of Navarre was born at Pau, December the thirteenth, one thousand five hundred and fifty-three. He was stiled in his mother's life-time the prince of Bearn. He espoused the princess Margaret, sister to Charles the ninth, and Henry the third, successively kings of France; and by the demise of the duke of Anjou became presumptive heir to the crown of France; to which he succeeded on the murder of the last mentioned prince, on the second of August, one thousand five hundred and eighty-nine, and united thereby the titles of France and Navarre.

Present state of this kingdom. BEFORE we conclude this section, it may not be amiss to make a few remarks, which, we flatter ourselves, will not be disagreeable to our readers. Charles the fifth, as we before observed, engaged by treaty to restore this kingdom, and was so little pleased with his title, that amongst other hardships put upon the French monarch Francis the first, one was, that he should oblige his brother-in-law Henry to renounce in favour of Charles. That device failing, he recommended it to Philip the second to marry if possible the princess Joan, or to restore the kingdom; but Philip the second having, as he said, been so occupied during his whole reign as not to have time to examine this question maturely, devolved that care upon Philip the third, who, it may be thought, by his ancestors possessing it, had sufficient right. In process of time this has been settled by a superior power, since not only Navarre but all the dominions of Spain are at this day in the possession of a descendent from the house of Albert. But with respect to the people of Navarre, it is extremely worthy of notice, that they have preserved their laws and liberties intire; and though the king of Spain sends a viceroy, while the French king keeps the title, yet they are alike benefited in point of revenue, not a single crown passing out of Navarre, except it may be what a viceroy can save, whose salary is but six thousand pieces of eight; and the whole revenue amounts but to forty thousand, which is about a piece of eight for every family.

C H A P. IV.

The history of France, from the reign of Clovis to that of Lewis the Fifteenth.

S E C T. I.

The first or Merovingian race of kings to their extinction.

- ^a THE rise or origin of all nations is naturally obscure; that of the Franks is particularly so; all that can be said of it is founded chiefly in conjecture, and deriving its credit from a comparison, or concurrence of circumstances, falls short of certainty, and is at most but probable^a. What can be said worth considering, upon this perplexed subject, the reader has seen in the former part of this work very clearly and correctly stated^b. There, likewise, may be found what has been transmitted to posterity, with the greatest appearance of truth, concerning their four first kings, under whom they contested the dominion of Gaul with the Romans, who were then possessed of it, viz. Pharamond, Clodio, Mérovée and Childéric^c. It is very doubtful, whether the third of these princes was brother, or son, or kinsman, or of quite another family from his predecessor. The last has been held most probable, because the first line of the kings of the Franks in Gallia were from him stiled Merovingian, which looks as if he was the founder of a new family at least, if not of the monarchy^d. This indeed has by some learned men been bestowed on his son, while other learned critics, with a great modern historian^e, ascribe this honour wholly to Clovis, and affirm, that to him the honour is due, of laying the foundation of that empire, which has subsisted so long, and been extended so far. It is for this reason, that the reign of Clovis is also to be found in the former part of this work; so that we might enter on this section with the division of his dominions amongst his four sons: but as in this there would be something very abrupt, and as we must be frequently referring to what passed under the reign of their father, we are persuaded it will be more for the reader's ease, as well as our own, to enter upon our task by a very succinct recapitulation of his history.
- ^c CLODOVEUS, as he is called by Gregory of Tours, Clovis, as he is usually stiled, or Louis, for it is the same name differently written, succeeded his father Childéric, at the age of fifteen. The first five years of his government, for any thing we know, were spent in peace; but, at the expiration of that time, he had perfected all his preparations for attacking the Romans in Gaul. They were then governed by Syagrius, whom the Franks, at least, stiled their king, and he had fixed his residence at Soissons. Sigebert, one of the chiefs or kings of the Franks, made himself master of Cologne, where it is probable that Clovis passed the Rhine, and, thro' the forest of Ardennes, marched directly towards Soissons. Syagrius, having a numerous army under his command, gave him battle, in which Chararic, one of the chiefs of the Franks, and nearly related to Clovis, is said to have kept his troops entire, till he saw the Romans begin to break, whom he charged with great vivacity in their retreat; so that being totally defeated and dispersed, Syagrius fled to Toulouse, and put himself under the protection of Alaric, king of the Visigoths^f; who, apprehensive of the spirit and success of Clovis, some time after delivered him up; and the monarch of the Franks, keeping him some time in prison, where, by giving him false hopes, he wrought upon him to facilitate his conquest, when he was of no farther use in that respect, caused him to be privately beheaded^g. This was followed by the entire reduction of his dominions, which put an end to the power of the Romans in Gaul, and left the Franks in full possession of all the countries between the Rhine and the Loire. The power he had gained by the sword, he laboured to establish by a mild and equitable govern-

While Clovis was thus employed, Basin, king of Thuringia, attacked the country of the Franks on the other side of the Rhine, and treated the people with extreme cruelty; of which Clovis was no sooner informed, than he marched against him with a great force, defeated his army, and reduced his subjects to submit to become tributaries¹.

(A) There is no part of the modern history that stands more in need of explanatory remarks than this which lies before us, and therefore we conceive it our duty to afford the reader all the assistance we can in this way; but, at the same time, we must intreat him to bear in memory, that we write notes, not dissertations, which must excuse our being very succinct; that we propose what appears to us most probable; and that we pretend not to dictate, but to leave all to his own judgment and better information. And lastly, that the personal history of these monarchs of the first race, their marriages and posterity, are thrown into the notes, that the thread of the narrative might remain as uniform as possible. These points premised, we propose in this note to speak of the Salique law. The Franks, before their irruption into Gaul, inhabited a part of Germany, which, in the old geographical tables, is from thence denominated Francia; and, by some authors, is called Old France, and, by others, the Germanic France, to distinguish it from the country which now bears the same name (1). The Franks were composed of several tribes or clans, each of which had its particular chief. Thus, at the same time that Clovis was king of the Salians, Sigebert reigned in the same quality over the Ripuarians, and other princes over other tribes (2). Each of these tribes had their particular customs, which being collected and reduced to writing, formed the code of their laws; and hence it is most probable, that what is stiled the Salique Law received that name, from being the code of the customs that prevailed amongst the Salians (3). What we have now is not, strictly speaking, the Salique law, because it is not the entire code, but an abstract of it. There are two editions, the first printed from a manuscript in the abbey of Fulde, by the care of John Basil, herald, in 1557, and the other later, as comprehending the alterations and additions made by several kings; but they agree very well in the main, and shew very clearly, that they were the customs which prevailed amongst a barbarous and warlike people, in order to keep some kind of interior order, and to prevent their turning their swords, at every turn, against each other. This abstract is divided into seventy-one titles, heads, or articles, penned in miserable Latin, full of barbarous words, borrowed from different languages, but which proves its authenticity, from their being found in the most antient charters, chronicles, and records (4). They prescribe punishment for murder, theft, injuries, and all the various kinds of violence to which such fierce and rude nations are commonly addicted. There is not so much as a single word of priests, sacrifices, or any thing that respects religion, either Christian or Pagan. It is not easy, or rather it is impossible, to fix their origin: some attribute them to Pharamond, others believe them still more ancient; however, it seems to be generally agreed, that Clovis published them in the state they now stand in, or rather gave his sanction to that code from which this abstract is made (5). They are become chiefly famous from a few lines in the sixty-second title, which we will give the reader as they stand there: "De Terra

 "vero Salica nulla portio hæreditatis transit in mulierem, sed hoc virilis sexus acquirit hoc est filii
 "in ipsa hæreditate succedant." i. e. In respect to Salic Lands, no part of it shall ever be inherited by a woman, but being acquired by the males, males only shall be capable of the succession (6). It has been urged, that this law disabled the daughters from inheriting the crown of France; in which, if there be any truth, it must be by construction. Our business, at present, shall be to inquire into and explain what these Salique lands were. The Salians, as we before observed, were only one tribe or clan of the Franks; and, at the time Clovis invaded Gaul, their whole force consisted of but three thousand fighting men, and the whole strength of the associated clans did not exceed twenty or twenty-four thousand at most. When they were fixed in their conquests, the king rewarded eminent services by a grant of lands, but subject to military aids. These lands thus granted, were the lands mentioned in the law, and such an estate was stiled, Terra Salica, Terre Salique, or land held according to the Salic custom: these estates were opposed to another kind of estates, which were stiled allodial, and might be acquired by descent, by marriage, or by purchase. It is to these estates that the article which we have just cited properly belongs, as appears from the very title Alode, de l'Alcu, or of Allodials. This law consists of six short paragraphs, five of which regard the succession to such estates, and in them the females are to the full as much favoured as the males, and then comes the sixth paragraph by way of exception. "But in respect to Salic land, no part of it shall ever be inherited by a woman, but being acquired by the males, males only shall be capable of the succession." The English reader is now in a condition to judge for himself of the meaning of this law, and how far it may be extended by construction (7). We will only add two remarks; the first is, that the Roman emperor Alexander Severus had made grants of the very same nature to his soldiers, which custom had been followed by his successors: and some of the French lawyers are of opinion, that as these lands fell in, they were granted out again by Clovis and his successors to Salians (8). Our second remark is, that the subjects of these princes being of different descents, such as Gauls, Burgundians, as well as Franks, they lived under their separate laws, and hence, in the old writers, there is a distinction between nation and people; the former word being restrained to the Franks, and the latter implying subjects in general (9).

- a difficulty, he obtained ^k(B). St. Gregory of Tours calls her Chrotildis, but by modern writers she is called Clotilde, or Clotildis, and was a zealous Christian. Her endeavours to convert the king were not at first very successful; on the contrary, the death of her eldest son Ingomer, soon after he was baptized, made an untoward impression on the mind of Clovis, which was heightened by the dangerous sickness of Clodomir his second son, soon after he was initiated into the Christian faith, from which however he recovered ¹. The Allemands, a numerous and potent nation, passing the Rhine, suddenly wasted the country about Cologne in a most barbarous manner. Sigebert demanded the assistance of Clovis, who marched with a great army to his relief, and, as soon as he had joined his forces, gave the enemy battle at a place called Tolbiac, where, on the point of being defeated, Clovis made a vow, that if Providence granted him the victory, he would become a Christian. His prayers being heard, the king caused himself to be instructed in the faith, and was, at length, baptized by St. Remy, bishop of Rheims, which gave great satisfaction to the Gauls, and at Rome, as most of the princes in Europe were at that time Arians ^m. As for the miracles that are said to have attended this ceremony, we find no hints of it in the more ancient authors (C). Some time after, Clovis reduced

(B) Gundiac, king of the Burgundians, married the sister of the famous Ricimer, whom we have had frequent occasion to mention, in the former part of this history, and had by her Gondebald, Godegisles, Chilperic, called also Hilperic, and Godemar (1). They divided among them the country subject to the Burgundians; for Chilperic is styled by Sidonius, tetrarch; and by Jornandes, king. Chilperic and Godemar joining against Gondebald drove him out, and seized on his dominions; but Gondebald having in the end recovered them, found means to dispatch his two brothers, with their issue male (2). He likewise extended his cruelties so far, as to cause his brother Chilperic's queen to be bound with a heavy stone about her neck, and thrown into a well (3). This princess, as Sidonius tells us, was a woman of great prudence, and had such an influence over her husband, that, al- luding to the Roman history, he styles her another Tanaguil. By her wisdom, and affable behaviour, she qualified the natural severity and ruggedness of her husband's disposition, by which she preserved the lives of many innocent persons, and was from thence generally re- spected and beloved (4). By this princess, Chilperic left two daughters, who were both banished by Gondebald, or rather kept under confinement, in a castle, at some distance from the court. Mercuruna the elder, embraced the state of virginity, the other was Clotildis, of whom we are to speak in this note (5). It is probable, that not being able to resist the power of the Franks, and suspect- ing that his niece would omit nothing to inspire Clovis with her resentment against himself and his family, Gon- debald, or Gondebald, might be very averse to the mar- riage. But the stories we are told of the methods taken by Clovis to solicit her affection, and the rings exchanged between them, carry in them the air of romance (6). We might say the same thing of Gondebald sending horsemen after his niece when on the road to the court of Clovis, her apprehension of this, and her quitting the coach she was in, to make her escape more securely on horseback, but that it seems to be countenanced by the most authentic historian we have (7); and that the improbability of these facts arises solely from the contrariety between the manners of that age and our own, which, in the reason of things, ought to have no great weight (8). These are particulars in themselves of such a nature, and of so little moment, that we should not have given them a place here, if we had not been per- suaded, that they are in some measure a key to this history; for Clotildis resembled her mother, and by her prudence and complaisance came to have a great in- fluence over Clovis, and for some years after his death, in a great measure, commanded the Franks, in the name of her sons, whom she irritated against her own family, and at length brought both that and her country to de- struction (9).

(C) We have a very circumstantial account of the baptizing of Clovis, by St. Gregory of Tours, who lived near his time; we have a letter written to him by the bishop of Vienne, to felicitate him upon his conversion; and we have another long letter of a bishop, concern- ing the miracles wrought by St. Remy, or Remigius, bi- shop of Rheims; in all which there is not one syllable of the holy phial (1). The story was first broached, in the ninth century, by Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, in his life of that saint; and what he relates is this: the holy prelate not finding the oil when he was to use it, had recourse to heaven, begging, with a short but fervent prayer, that the want of what was necessary, to accom- plish the ceremony, might, by some means or other, be supplied. He had scarce done, when a dove, ex- ceeding the very snow in whiteness, was seen carrying a phial filled with oil, which the bishop had no sooner received than the dove disappeared, and was never afterwards seen. With this oil Remigius anointed the king, and the odour it spread was sweet, beyond ima- gination or expression (2). All that can be said in sup- port of this relation, is, that Hincmar took it from an ancient life of that holy person, or rather might have taken it from thence. But the misfortune is, that this life had been read by Gregory of Tours, and yet he says nothing of this amazing miracle, though he magnifies the sanctity of Remigius, and tells us, that he wrought miracles, and even raised a person from the dead (3). It is in vain to cite a crowd of authors, or even of offices and liturgies of later date (4), since all we find therein must depend upon the authority of Hincmar, and what sort of an authority his is may in a few words be shewn. That he was very inaccurate ap- pears from hence, that he places the baptism of Clovis

- reduced Armorica, or Brittany, and afterwards made war against the Burgundians, in which
 A. D. 500. he had for his ally Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths^a; Alaric taking umbrage at the great
 501. power of Clovis, and finding a disposition in his own subjects, who were Catholics, to revolt
 509. to him, engaged in a war, the fate of which was decided by a general battle in the plains of Vouillé near Poitiers, where his forces were totally defeated, and himself killed in the field.
 His ambition led Clovis to push his success a little too far; in consequence of which the Franks were soundly beaten before Arles by the forces of Theodoric; soon after which a general peace was made, in which the Burgundians and the Visigoths were included^b.

THE fame of his victories having penetrated as far as Constantinople, the emperor Anastasius sent him a diadem and a purple robe, with the title of Patrician, Consul, or Augustus, it does not clearly appear which^c. However, it was very kindly accepted, and the king caused himself to be invested with these pompous ornaments in a very solemn manner: it may be both princes had their views, and that these were very different. The emperor might propose preserving a title to the Gauls, now the possession was lost, by the conferring, and the acceptance of these honours; whereas the monarch of the Franks might consider this as an association in the empire, or at least desire it should be so considered by the inhabitants of the conquered countries. When he perceived that this had taken effect, he began to undermine the chiefs of other tribes, that he might leave all the Franks possessed to his own posterity. He began with Sigebert, king of Cologne, by hinting to his son Chlodoric, that he spun the thread of his life a little too long; upon which Chlodoric caused him to be put to death; but as he was busy in taking possession of his treasures, he was stabbed by one of his own retinue, and Clovis appearing immediately after with an army, left no room to doubt, that he directed the last murder, and was not ignorant of the first^d. He seized by treachery Chararic, king of Cambray, and his son, caused them both to be shaved, the old man to be ordained a priest, and the young one a deacon. This is the first instance of rendering a prince incapable of wearing a crown by taking off his hair; and the son having intimated to his father that it would grow again, and then they might take their revenge, Clovis, to prevent that, ordered that they should lose their heads^e. He engaged, by great promises, the ministers and captains of Ragnacharius to deliver both him and his brother Richarius into his hands; and after reproaching them for suffering themselves to be chained, he dispatched them with his battle-axe. Those who had betrayed them, complaining, that the money or presents he gave them was only copper gilt, he told them, that he always paid traitors in that coin^f.

His death and character.

HE removed the seat of his government first from Tournay to Soissons, and from thence to Paris, which he made the seat of his empire. He held a council at Orleans, at which on the Saturday before Easter, whereas it is certain, that he was baptized at Christmas (5). He was so credu-lous, that he tells us of another miracle wrought by the same prelate, in favour of the same king, which would be still more wonderful, if it was not absolutely ridiculous. He affirms, that St. Remy gave to Clovis

 a bottle of wine, which served him and all his family, nay, and all his army too; and which had this admirable property, that it would never diminish, but when Providence meant to restrain the success of his arms; so that it was not only an inexhaustible cordial, but a kind of prophetic barometer (6). This is but one instance out of many absurd and idle stories reported by this single champion of the holy phial; but it is such an instance as will certainly destroy his credit with every reasonable man, and oblige us to pity those who, after reading such things, will pretend to believe them. It is surprising, that, in the midst of so many miracles, we have not one word said of this holy bishop remonstrating to Clovis against those numberless acts of injustice and cruelty which he was continually committing. Miracles wrought in favour of such a man was but confirming him in his vices, by strengthening his power; and St. Remy would have done infinitely more for his subjects and himself, if he had wrought one miracle to restrain him, and convince him, that whatever authority he might have on earth, he was to answer for the abuse of it to him by whom it was bestowed. It is far from being impossible, on the contrary it is highly probable, that this good bishop might not be negligent in his duty, but might admonish the king on various occasions (7),

 of which however the monks have preserved us no remembrance, as being entirely bent on supporting and extending the power of the church, which they preferred to the honour and welfare of religion. This those who admire them most readily admit; for a very learned and judicious writer, who would notwithstanding be thought to believe the miracle of the holy phial, in order to answer the objection drawn from the silence of Gregory of Tours, hints, that he might be induced to let it pass in silence, to avoid raising the credit and supremacy of the see of Rheims, and giving it thereby an advantage over his own church of Tours (8).
 We say nothing of the banner covered with fleurs de lis, or, as we write them, fleur de lucas, put into Clovis's own hand by angels, or of the orri flame brought by the same conveyance, because these are given up by the French historians, and indeed some make no scruple of giving up the phial at Rheims (9).

a several bishops were present, and a letter written by them to the king, on that occasion, is still extant^u. He founded several monasteries, and built some churches; for these reasons, and because he professed the Catholic religion, the prelates were strongly attached to him, which was one great instrument of his success. He deceased in the month of November, in the year of our LORD five hundred and eleven, and was interred in the church of St. Peter and Paul at Paris, which now bears the name of St. Genevieve, where his tomb is still to be seen^v. He lived forty-five, and reigned thirty years. Authors are much divided as to his character: some admire him as a great captain; others commend him as a consummate politician; and some have been so complaisant as to stile him a saint^x. A late writer comes nearer to the truth: he says, he was a very great prince, and a very wicked man^y. His courage and his abilities, no doubt, were very remarkable, and his good fortune rather more conspicuous; but his morals were certainly detestable: to excuse these, is not the business of an historian; to dwell upon them would be invidious; but, without incurring this censure, we may affirm, that his boundless ambition, and the desire of securing to his own family the sovereignty of the Franks, which hitherto had been shared with the chiefs of their several tribes, was the source of those vices which tarnish his character, and leave other nations no great reason to regret the glory some writers would assume from having this prince for the founder of their empire.

THE sons of Clovis were four, amongst whom were divided all the dominions which their father had acquired. The eldest, whose name was Thieri, or Theodoric, was about twenty-six years of age, born before his father's marriage with Clotildis; whence some modern writers stile him a bastard, of which there is no proof. He had the eastern part of his father's dominions for his share, and, because that was his capital, had the title of king of Metz. Clodomir, the eldest son of Clovis by his queen, was about sixteen, and he had the kingdom of Orleans. Childebert and Clotaire were infants; the former had the kingdom of Paris, and the latter that of Soissons, under the tutelage of their mother. But though Gregory of Tours says this was a very equal division, yet it is not easy to assign the manner in which it was made, or the provinces of which each of their shares consisted^z. The authority of Clotildis, founded chiefly in her prudence, preserved the dominions of the Franks in peace for the first seven years after the death of Clovis, if we except a small dispute between Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths, and Thieri king of Metz, which was compromised upon terms not very advantageous to the latter: for this some conjectural reasons have been given, which we have not room to mention, and which are not of importance enough to create any obscurity in the course of our narration. It is however probable from thence, that the having so formidable a neighbour as Theodoric might contribute not a little to the tranquility of this new empire.

A NUMEROUS fleet, with a potent army of Danes on board, arrived at the mouth of the Meuse, and their king Cochiliac, having landed his forces, began to waste all the adjacent country with fire and sword; upon which Thieri sent an army against him, under the command of his son Theodobert, who had likewise the direction of a fleet that was also appointed to act against the Danes. In this expedition he acquitted himself with great reputation, defeated these cruel invaders on shore, beat their navy at sea, killed their king, compelled them to dismiss their prisoners, and to retire with the utmost precipitation^a. His father engaged soon after in a war less honourable, and, though attended with success, less advantageous. Hermanfroi, king of Thuringia, had, by the persuasion of his wife Amalberga, destroyed his brother Berthaire, and seized his part of their father's territories; and by her persuasion he meditated the like treatment towards Balderic, his only surviving brother, who was apprized of his intentions, and kept upon his guard. Hermanfroi, thereupon, applied himself to the king of Metz, and offered him half his brother's dominions, if he would join in this enterprize. He consented to this, and, in conjunction with his new ally, gave battle to Balderic, whose army being defeated, and himself killed on the spot, his brother seized all, and left Thieri no other recompence than the consciousness of having embarked in so foul an action. A prince of his spirit and temper could not help feeling and resenting this usage; but perceiving Hermanfroi in full possession of Thuringia, whereas he had only a part of his father's kingdoms, he stifled his indignation, till an opportunity should offer of indulging it in its full extent^b.

GONDEBAUD, king of Burgundy, who had murdered Chilperic his brother, and the father of queen Clotildis, being dead, left his dominions to his sons Sigismund and Godemar, against whom, her sons being now grown up, the widow of Clovis engaged them to make war. There was a circumstance which rendered Sigismund odious to his own subjects; of which a full account being given in another place, there is no need to repeat it here^c. The dispute was very unequal, and the forces of Sigismund quickly beat. The Franks plundering the country without mercy, the people, partly out of spite to the author of their misfortunes, and partly in hopes of pacifying the victors, seized upon the unfortunate Sigismund, who had cut off his long hair, and put on the dress of a hermit, and delivered him, together with his queen, and the two princes his sons, into the hands of Clodomir. He, after detaining them some time in prison at Orleans, upon the report of Godemar's being proclaimed king of the Burgundians, resolved to put them to death^a. Avitus, abbot of Mici, interposed in their behalf, and went so far as to promise the king victory, if he spared these miserable creatures; but in vain; they were thrown into a deep pit, by way of retaliation, Chilperic having suffered the same treatment from his brother Gondebaud. The universal pity that followed this outrageous act of cruelty procured Sigismund, who in other respects did not deserve it, the reputation of a saint^c. Clodomir, for it does not appear that his brethren took any share in this second war, entered the country of the Burgundians with his army, and gave battle to Godemar, in which he was defeated. But Clodomir pursuing indiscreetly, was surrounded and slain, and his head fixed on a pike, and carried about in triumph by his enemies, who believed that this would have struck the Franks with despair; but, on the contrary, it inspired them with so great fury, that, after destroying the greatest part of his army, they obliged Godemar to quit the field of battle^f. Clodomir left behind him three sons, notwithstanding which his brethren took possession of his dominions, under the specious pretence of being guardians to his children; and how honourably they discharged that trust will hereafter appear.

Thieri, king of Metz, seeing the power of the Ostrogoths much lessened by the death of king Theodoric, thought it a proper time to make Hermanfroi feel the weight of his vengeance; and having engaged his brother Clotaire, king of Soissons, to assist him, they, at the time agreed upon between them, entered the country of Thuringia, with two potent armies. They joined soon after they had passed the Rhine, and their force was quickly augmented by another powerful corps of troops under Theodobert^g. However, Hermanfroi had time enough to assemble the whole force of his dominions, and to dispose all things in the best manner for their reception. The allies found him, therefore, with his army ranged in order of battle, with a spacious plain in front, and a steep and rapid river in his rear. They formed with all the diligence possible, expecting they should have been attacked, but perceiving the Thuringians remained firm, they advanced to charge them. Hermanfroi had caused several large pits to be made in the front of his army, which were covered again with turf, and numbers of the Franks falling into them, were miserably slain. Clotaire, as soon as he perceived this, gave a signal to halt, and soon after passing with his cavalry through the spaces between the pits, pushed the Thuringians with such vigour that they soon fell into confusion. Theodobert followed his uncle's example with the infantry, and Thieri taking them in flank with his forces, the route became general, and the river behind them preventing their retreat, the far greater part of them were either killed or drowned^h. The queen Amalberga was conveyed to a place of safety by her brother Theodad; and Hermanfroi having with difficulty made his escape, fled from place to place in disguise. In consequence of this defeat, the capital was taken, and the country in general destroyed without mercy. Soon after this victory, Thieri invited his brother to a private conference; but Clotaire, as he entered the hall, perceiving mens feet behind a piece of tapestry, suspected, not without reason, a design to murder him; and stopping a little, made a signal for his attendants to advance, which they did in good time. Thieri caressed him extremely, presented him with a large silver basin, and proposed to him many things for their common benefit, to which he listened with great complaisance, but retired from the audience with a full resolution never to run a hazard of the like kind againⁱ. Thieri, at the close of the campaign, declared, that having avenged his breach of faith, Hermanfroi might meet him with safety at Tolbiac, in order to treat of peace. Thither he accordingly came, was kindly received, and the king walking with him upon the ramparts, advanced a little before him, when a person placed behind, for that purpose, threw him over into the ditch, where he was smothered. Thus his spacious territories became feudatory to Thieri^k.

CHILDEBERT, king of Paris, while his brothers were thus employed, was embarked in another war, of the cause and event of which having given a full account in the last chapter, we shall be as brief as possible here. His sister Clotilda had espoused Amalaric, king of the Visigoths in Spain, and being a zealous Catholic, and he an obstinate Arian, they were quickly upon such bad terms as induced Childebert to take up arms for her deliverance. In his march towards Septimania, or that district of Gaul still in the possession of the Goths, a false report

- a reached his ear, of his brother Tbieri's being defeated, and killed in Tburingia, which tempted him to make a short turn into Auvergne, a country belonging to his brother; and the capital being betrayed into his hands, he took possession of it, and had just received the oaths of the inhabitants¹, when he was informed of the truth, and that, instead of being defeated and dead, Tbieri was alive and victorious: he quitted his new conquest, therefore, with silence and shame; and, to efface the memory of it, recurred to his first expedition, in which he was as prosperous as he could desire; for having routed Amalaric in battle, and made himself master of Narbonne, the king of the Visigoths being slain by a conspiracy of his own subjects, his sister was restored to him, but died in her way to Paris, whither Childebert returned in triumph, his army loaded with plunder, amongst which was a great quantity of rich church plate, that, by his command, was distributed to the cathedrals in his dominions; by which he gained the love of the clergy, and the esteem of the prelates^m. His brother Clotaire congratulated him on the success of his enterprize, and the two brothers entered into a close alliance, being equally afraid of Tbieri, to whom notwithstanding they proposed a reconciliation, provided he would assist them in a war against the Burgundians, which they had now more than ever at heart. As this did not suit his scheme of policy, he refused to comply with their demand; upon which, to secure themselves from any disturbance, they excited a sedition amongst his troops by their intrigues, and fomented a rebellion against him in Auvergne, into which country he was thereby constrained to send the flower of his forces under the command of his son Theodobert. Having thus provided sufficient employment for him, they continued with all possible diligence their preparations against Godemar, who, while they were embarked in other expeditions, had gradually recovered his whole country, and was, at this instant, assembling all his forces to defend itⁿ.

- THE two brothers, Childebert and Clotaire, entered the country of their enemies with a superior army, and laid siege to Autun; of which, after a gallant defence, they made themselves masters, and proceeded next to reduce Vienne: which they found a work of greater difficulty, but which notwithstanding they accomplished at last; and being determined to keep what had cost them so dear, they put an end to the campaign, by taking winter quarters in the country adjacent^o. Tbieri, in the mean time, finding the war of Auvergne would prove a dangerous and troublesome business, went thither in person, as believing that his own temper and experience would suit better with an employment of such a nature, than the youth, and perhaps the gentleness and generosity, of his son's disposition. At first, he acted with great roughness and severity, which, on a sudden, under pretence of a dream, or vision, he relaxed, and by a tender of mercy to his subjects in despair, brought them to a submission, into which they would not have been so easily forced^p. Yet when he thought this arduous affair in a manner over, as having made his entry into Auvergne, where he contented himself with punishing the family of the senator Arcadius, who had betrayed it to Childebert, he found his work was to be begun again. A great lord of that country, whose name was Munderic, pretending that he was of the royal family of Clovis, not only took up arms, but assumed likewise the title of king, and quickly drew together an army, composed chiefly of those who had been ruined by the licentiousness of the king's troops^q. Tbieri attempted first to get him into his power by negotiation, but that failed him, for his character was too well known; he blocked him up in Vitri, which was then a strong place. The garrison being numerous, and composed of men absolutely desperate, the defence was obstinate, as might be expected. Upon this, the king sent a domestic of his, a man of great cunning, whose name was Argesile, to practise once more upon Munderic; and he having first represented his danger in very strong terms, and afterwards swearing at the high altar that he should have a free pardon, prevailed on him to render the place^r. As they came out together, with a few of Munderic's attendants, some of Tbieri's soldiers half-armed gathered about them; upon which Argesile cried out in an angry tone, "Who do you stare at? did you never see Munderic before?" At which signal they attacked him. Munderic, who had a short spear in his hand, turning on his guide, "Perjured traitor, said he, I know I shall die, but lead thou the way;" and so pinned him to the earth; but being surrounded, himself and his servants were quickly cut to pieces^s. Tbieri having reduced Auvergne a second time, left Theodobert with a competent number of forces to settle the country, and returned himself to Metz, having in his mind still greater projects, and burning with a desire to expel the Ostrogoths and Visigoths out of the provinces they still possessed in Gaul, esteeming, according to the maxim of his family, that they possessed nothing where they did not possess all.

Clotaire, by the advice of Childebert, murders their nephews, and shares their dominions.

A. D. 533.

The queen-dowager Clotildis, being at Paris with her grandsons, Gunthaire, Theodobald, and Clodoalde, the sons of Clodomir, and having pressed her son Childebert to do these orphans justice, he, seeming to acquiesce in her demand, sent for his brother Clotaire to regulate the method of putting them in possession of their dominions. After this interview, the two brothers sent to demand the young princes, whom the grandmother delivered without the least suspicion, saying, that she should forget the loss of her sons, in seeing them reign^a. Her surprize was great, at hearing they were put under a guard; but her apprehensions were still more heightened, when Arcadius, the senator of Auvergne, who betrayed that city to Childebert, brought her from that prince a pair of scissars and a sword, and bid her chuse which instrument she pleased. Confused at so horrid a message, she answered, "I had rather see my childred dead, than shaved;" which being reported to the two kings, Clotaire immediately dispatched Theodobald, who was about ten years old, with his dagger^b. Gunthaire, who was about seven, embraced the knees of his uncle Childebert, who was so much moved thereat, as to intreat Clotaire to spare him; but the brutal prince cried out, "It was by thy instigation that I entered upon this bloody scene, die thyself, or let me finish what I have begun." Childebert, affrighted, stepped out of his way, and he instantly dispatched the child. But during this short dispute, the attendants of Childebert conveyed away Clodoalde; at which the furious Clotaire was so provoked, that he caused all the tutors and domestics who attended the children to be destroyed^c. As to Clodoalde, he became a monk, and for his innocent life being reputed a saint, left his name to the village of St. Cloud, near Paris^d. It might be imagined that Thieri, who had no hand in these murders, would have revenged them, but having his share of their dominions, he was reconciled to his brethren, and entered into an alliance with Clotaire for driving the Ostrogoths out of Gaul, in order to share the countries they held between them^e.

While Thieri is acting against the Visigoths, Childebert and Clotaire complete the conquest of Burgundy.

A. D. 534.

In order to execute this great design, Clotaire ordered his son Gunthier to march with an army on the side of Rodez, while Theodobert, with his father Thieri's forces, acted from that of Auvergne. But, as soon as the war was begun, Gunthier, without any apparent cause, retired, and left Theodobert to carry it on as he could^f. This young prince, in the progress of his expedition, met with a lady, whose name was Deuteria, a married woman, but who had beauty and wit, tho' not youth to recommend her; and of her he was so enamoured, that, after a campaign not very active, he retired into Auvergne, and put his troops into winter quarters^g. His father Thieri had committed the civil administration of this province, after its reduction, to Sigivalde; who believing the people were not like to obtain much redress at court, had oppressed them in the most grievous manner; of which Thieri being informed, caused him to be seized and sent to court, where, upon full proof, he was beheaded. But believing that his son Givalde might, some time or other, endeavour to revenge his father's death, an order was dispatched to Theodobert to seize and execute him also. The prince, who had been this young man's godfather, sent for him, and, having shewed him his father's orders, advised him to withdraw, and not to venture into his own country again, so long as the king lived^h. In the mean time, Childebert and Clotaire finished the reduction of Burgundy, in which some say Godemar was killed, and others affirm that he retired into Spain, and from thence into *Africa*ⁱ. The necessity of employing their troops in this war, might be one reason for recalling Gunthier; but there was another; Thieri king of Metz was fallen into a declining state of health, and the two brothers had such intelligence in his dominions, that they had hopes of supplanting their nephew, to which they thought his being embarrassed in the war with the Ostrogoths might very probably contribute. But Theodobert being informed in time of their contrivances, returned so speedily that he disappointed them, and, upon his father's death, was proclaimed, and put into possession of all his dominions^j. He was not a little chagrined at the usage he met with, and the danger he had escaped, but was prudent enough to dissemble it.

Childebert finds it necessary to reconcile himself to Theodobert the successor of Thieri.

CHILDEBERT, who was naturally a timorous prince, fearing the resentment of his nephew, and at the same time hating his brother, resolved to reconcile himself to the former, and to make him forget, if possible, the attempt he had made to his prejudice; Theodobert came readily into all this, and obtained a share in the division of Burgundy. He afterwards accepted an invitation to Paris, where he was both kindly and magnificently treated; and, at the same time, Childebert declared him his heir^k. In Italy, Amalazunta, the daughter of Theodoric, after the death of her first husband, espoused Theodad her cousin, who, through jealousy and ingratitude, imprisoned and put her to death, which gave a colourable pretence to the emperor Justinian to undertake the expulsion of the Ostrogoths out of Italy^l. a this, he set on foot a negotiation with the three monarchs of the Franks, in order to obtain their assistance, and, by a dexterous management of this negotiation, they drew to themselves immense treasures in subsidies and presents; but this did not hinder their negotiating at the same time privately with Theodad, who offered them the provinces^a his nation still retained in Gaul. His conduct was so bad that his people revolted and killed him, bestowing the crown upon Witiges, whose only title was being a brave man and an experienced officer; but to fortify this, he married the princess Matazunta, the daughter of the deceased queen, and by him the negotiation was perfected, in consequence of which Provence was delivered up to the Franks^b. Childebert had Arles for his share; Marseilles fell to that of Clotaire. Theodobert, after the treaty was concluded, set up a demand for himself. He pretended, that b his family having subdued the Allemands in Germany, derived from thence a title to the countries those people had conquered and possessed on the frontiers of Gaul, and, upon this pretence, the Rhetian Alps, or the country of the Grisons, was yielded to him^c. At the very time this agreement was concluded and executed, Justinian depending on his promises, had adopted him, as a mark of his affection and esteem^d. We may have leave to treat this double-dealing as base and scandalous, since these and even harsher epithets are bestowed by a French historian, who with great spirit and impartiality has given a just representation of these reigns^e; which remark it was necessary to make, in order to prevent any suspicion of our having misrepresented them.

To push this matter to the utmost, Theodobert, by affording new hopes to Justinian, c obtained a concession from him of the same provinces that had been yielded by the Ostrogoths; so that now all claims of the emperors to any part of Gaul being extinct, it was universally considered as the patrimony of the Franks^f. Belizarius having managed the war in Italy very successfully, and brought the power of the Goths, notwithstanding the courage and conduct of Witiges, to the very last gasp, saw with amazement Theodobert pass the Alps with an army of one hundred thousand men, with which he traversed Italy, ruining and plundering the country wherever he came. He had before sent a corps of some thousand Burgundians, as auxiliaries to the Goths; and though they did them little service, yet they flattered themselves that he was come in person, with this potent army, to rescue them from destruction; while, on the other hand, Belizarius grounding his expectations on the late treaty, flattered himself d that the Franks would act as auxiliaries to the empire^g. Theodobert disappointed both; he attacked and cut to pieces the Goths, who received him as friends, and immediately after defeated a part of the imperial forces. It is difficult to conceive what his design was, except loading his army with plunder; with which view he made himself master of Genoa, ransacked it, and then finding his forces much diminished by sickness he quitted Italy, leaving one of his generals, with a sufficient body of forces, to secure the passes^h. Belizarius having shut up Witiges in the city of Ravenna, and held him there closely besieged, the monarchs of the Franks sent him the strongest assurances of relief, and Theodobert made preparations for entering Italy again, with a great army, for that purpose. But Witiges prevented this, by surrendering the city and his person to Belizarius, who sent him to Constantinople, where, e with the title of Patrician, he spent the remainder of his days in quietⁱ. This shews, however, that he had conceived a just diffidence of the Franks, and would not trust them in any treaty.

As they had no longer any foreign war to employ them, the Franks, unable to remain quiet, fell out among themselves; Clotaire, as some writers say, was the aggressor, by making an irruption into the territories of Childebert with a small body of forces. His brother, being supported by Theodobert, marched against him with such diligence, that they surprized him, at the entrance of the forests of Bretone, on the banks of the river Seine. He cut down the trees on every side, in order to embarrass his enemies, and to form a kind of hasty fortification about his camp^j. Childebert and Theodobert, much superior to him in numbers, disposed f all things for attacking him by break of day, when there arose so violent a storm of thunder, lightning and rain, that Childebert, who was naturally mild, regarding it as a miracle, sent to offer his brother peace, which was quickly concluded on equal terms^k. Some time after a council was held at Orleans, and from several of the canons made therein it clearly appears, that many of the Franks remained to this time Pagans, and that many more had a kind of mixed religion, professing the faith of Christians, and yet practising many Pagan ceremonies and superstitions: the body of the Salique Law was also reviewed, reformed, and augmented.

A. D. 543.

To give an evident testimony of the sincerity of their reconciliation, and, at the same time, to find some employment for a nation unable to remain long at rest, the two brothers Childebert and Clotaire determined to attack the Visigoths, as being desirous to have the Pyrenees as well as the Alps for the boundaries of their dominions^r. While they were employed in this expedition, Theodobert directed his attention to the affairs of Italy. Childebert and Clotaire penetrated as far as Saragossa almost without resistance, and their army having enriched themselves with the pillage of those opulent countries, they determined to return: most of the French writers speak of this retreat as performed with great courage and conduct; but the Spanish writers assert, with much more appearance of truth, that the two brothers did not retire till their forces were totally defeated by the Gothic general Tudiscles, and that few or none of them had found their way home, if avarice, which is the growth of all climes and all nations, had not induced an eminent officer among the Goths to leave open one of the passages of the Pyrenees a day and a night, in consideration of an immense reward, notwithstanding which the rear of their army was cut to pieces^s. It is however said, that the Franks had, in some measure, their revenge, in defeating with considerable slaughter, a Spanish army that had been transported into Languedoc by sea; but as this point has been elsewhere explained, there is no need of detaining the reader any longer upon it here, more especially as both parties seemed now to be at least weary of the war, if not inclined to peace^t; and the affairs of Italy drew once more their most serious attention, upon the old principle of fishing in troubled waters, and aggrandizing themselves at the expence of others. A maxim which rendered them equally formidable and detestable to their neighbours, who have not failed to set out the ill usage they met with from them in peace, as well as war, in the strongest colours.

THEODOBERT began with negotiating again with the emperor Justinian, from whom he procured the most authentic renunciations of the rights of the empire to those provinces and places, which, in the depth of their distress, the Ostrogoths had been forced to yield, and which he had also ceded, though not with an express demission of the sovereignty; and thus the claim on one side, and the possession on the other being relinquished, the Franks became the legal masters of those maritime parts of Gaul, which the power of Theodoric had protected against the ambition of Clovis. But Theodobert's views went farther; he negotiated likewise with Totila, who had in some measure restored the affairs of the Goths in Italy, and was willing to try what could be had from him^u. But this brave and generous prince, tho' he sought the friendship of the Franks, sought it in an honourable and noble way, and demanded the daughter of Theodobert in marriage, which that monarch rejected with an air of contempt; for as the Ostrogoths proposed to expell the Imperialists, and to preserve by arms the countries which by arms had been acquired; and as, on the other hand, the Imperialists proposed the extirpation of the Ostrogoths, that the emperors might enter again into the exercise of their authority in Italy; so Theodobert aimed at the destruction of both, that he might substitute the empire of the Franks in Italy, as his ancestors had done in Gaul^v. His lieutenant Bucelin proceeded to the execution of this design, by extending his conquest through the country of Liguria, along the sea coast, while Theodobert projected a diversion by an irruption into the dominions of Justinian, that might have brought his forces, and those of his allies, into the neighbourhood of Constantinople^w. Princes of his character seldom want pretences; from being the friend and ally, he was become the mortal enemy, of Justinian; interest dictated the measure, which was to be covered by a pretended zeal for glory. The emperor, elated by the victories which his generals had obtained, assumed, after the ancient Roman manner, a variety of surnames, and amongst them inserted Francicus, as if he had been the conqueror of the Franks. Theodobert, who wanted such an opportunity, seized it eagerly, remonstrated in high terms at Constantinople, and attempted to associate in an alliance all the northern nations, that had been outraged by the same unseasonable overflowing of imperial vanity^x. But, in the midst of these vast designs, which Theodobert might have found it very difficult to execute, he was removed by death, to the great grief of the Franks, and to the no small joy of their neighbours^y; all of whom dreaded his great abilities, which were directed by no other motives than ambition and interest.

THEODEBALDE, or Tbibaut, the only son of Theodobert, though a youth in the fourteenth year of his age, and to the legitimacy of whose birth there might have been some objection, succeeded to his father's dominions without trouble or dispute, which was, in a great measure, owing to the wise precautions which his father had taken, and the firm attachment to his family shewn by the generals who commanded the troops, and who, if they had acted upon

- a other principles, might have created a great deal of confusion^a. The emperor Justinian sent a splendid embassy to his court, in hopes of engaging those who had the direction of this young king's affairs, to enter into his views, instead of pursuing those of his father. The ministers of Theodebalde acted, however, as if their old master had been alive, and had dictated to them the rules of their behaviour. They treated the imperial ambassadors with all possible respect, gave them, in the name of the young king, a very favourable answer, and sent an ambassador also to Constantinople, fraught with pacific instructions, from whence, as in times past, they drew great advantages; for the Greek emperor never negotiated with the Franks without supporting the propositions he made with considerable presents^b. But when Justinian thought himself sure of this martial and enterprising nation, he found himself more
- b deceived than ever; for Bucelin and Leutharis, at the head of prodigious numbers of Franks, entered Italy, and professing that they acted on their own heads, and without receiving any orders from their court, put it out of the emperor's power to know what might be expected from them, or how to deal with them^c. His general Narses delivered him from these difficulties by the courage and conduct he shewed, in the management of a war, which had put a period to the sovereignty of the Ostrogoths, and gave a check to the impetuosity of the French, who suffered likewise by a misunderstanding between their generals, who were both Allemands by birth; and one of whom, Leutharis, had practised with the Ostrogoths, to grant them what assistance lay in his power, provided they would acknowledge him for their king, and which ended in the destruction of both^d. In the mean time, Theodebalde, after a short A. D. 555.
- c and inactive reign, breathed his last at Compiègne, when, according to the rule of succession which then prevailed, his dominions should have been divided between his two great uncles (D), as other principalities and even seignories among the Franks usually were.
- But Clotaire, king of Soissons, who, of all the sons of Clovis, inherited most of his father's spirit, having a puissant army on foot, went in person to Metz, and by a mixture of arguments, promises, and threats, so wrought upon the nobility, that they acknowledged him for the sole successor of his nephew^e. Childebert, king of Paris, who was the elder brother, affected the character of a pious prince, and had his attention, at this time, occupied chiefly by ecclesiastical affairs. He was, however, far from being void of ambition; and though he could not immediately devise a method of redressing or revenging it, he was sufficiently
- d sensible of the injustice that had been done him^f. He resolved not to let slip any opportunity of this kind, and it was not long before such an opportunity offered; for by aggrandizing his power, the security and the safety of Clotaire's monarchy were far from being rendered more stable. But whether the troubles he met with proceeded immediately from the turbulence and mutability of part of his new subjects, or whether they were not, in part at least,

(D) Theodowaldus, as the old historian calls him, or Theodobald, as he is commonly called, or Thibaut, for it is the same name, succeeded his father, though he was paralytic, which those who maintain the crown to have been, in these times, strictly hereditary, insist upon as a very strong proof (1). Immediately after the death of his father, there happened a sedition, in which Partibianus, who was looked upon to have been the deviser of some oppressive taxes in Theodobert's time, was stoned to death; for which the king is much blamed by a modern historian, as a weak and pusillanimous prince (2). But if we consider, that he was under fourteen, he may perhaps stand excused, though we should not put the reader in mind of his infirmity. It may be, however, that this was not the case, and that the king might act on another motive; for though his body was crazy, yet his mind seemed to have been tolerably sound, from the following story told of him, by Gregory of Tours, who says, at the same time, that it excited a general dislike to him amongst his courtiers, ought to have been added in a parenthesis. The king was talking one day, he tells us, of ministers who abused their trust, and plundered the people, and expressed himself to this purpose. There was a man who had some excellent wine, which he kept in a vessel that had a narrow neck, and a large body, which being left open, a serpent got in, and drank so plentifully, that she was unable to get out again. The owner of the wine came, and seeing the serpent wreathing and twisting about, there is but one way filthy creature, said he, to slip through this narrow passage, and that is to disgorge (3). He espoused Waldrada, whom Gregory calls Valdotrada, the younger daughter of Wacon, king of the Lombards, by whom he had no issue. Some say, that he bequeathed the kingdom by will to his great uncle Clotaire; but if he had a power of doing this, what became of the right of succession? for that, as the Greek historian plainly says, was in his great uncles jointly (4). It is much more probable, that Clotaire secured the succession by his intrigues, in which it is very likely he was strenuously assisted by the queen-dowager, whom he married. A wife more or less in such cases, these kings of the race of Clovis did not stand upon; however the bishops, either of their own accord, or because the king was willing to be rid of her, interposed; and so she was divorced: but that her services might not go wholly unrewarded, she was, a third time, bestowed in marriage upon Garibald duke of Bavaria (5), that is, governor of the Bavarians, and not prince of that country, as we now understand it.

excited by some acts of severity or oppression of his own, does not clearly appear^e; the historians of these times dwelling often on trivial, and omitting entirely circumstances of importance.

Is immediately plunged into foreign and domestic troubles, through the contrivance of Childebart. THE Saxons, who were tributaries to his predecessor and Theodebalde, threw off the yoke, and prevailed on the Thuringians to take the same step. He marched against them with an army composed of veteran well-disciplined troops, and by their assistance gained a complete victory; upon which the rebels submitted, on the best terms they could obtain^b. He did not long enjoy this satisfaction; for he had scarce withdrawn his forces out of that country before they revolted again. He was extremely provoked at this, and, having reinforced his troops, marched against them a second time, giving out, that he intended nothing less than to extirpate those whom duty could not restrain, or clemency recover; but he did this only with a view to shorten the war, and to prevent an effusion of blood, by bringing them to a speedy submission. The Saxons, as if they had known his intention, sent to intreat his pardon, offered immense contributions, and to be content with whatever terms he thought fit to impose, which the king was very well inclined to accept; but his army would hear of nothing but slaughter: they had figured to themselves the total destruction of a country, by which they were to be loaded with plunder; and they could not bear to see the king's coffers filled with what they had destined to enrich themselves. Clotaire was forced to comply with their humour, and to attack the Saxons in their retrenchments, who made so desperate a resistance, as not only obliged the Franks to retire, but took from them all inclination of attacking them again^c. Clotaire being left at liberty to pursue his own sentiments, granted them such terms as this change of circumstances required. This was a great, but not his sole misfortune. He had five sons; and the eldest of these, whose name was Chramnes, he had sent to command in Auvergne: he was a young prince who did not want parts; but the vivacity of his temper, and his inordinate love of pleasure, made even the good qualities he possessed turn to the prejudice of his father and himself. Clotaire had assigned him a very sage and sober person for his assistant and prime minister, but the virtues which recommended him to the father, rendered him disagreeable to the son; he disregarded him therefore, and bestowed his confidence on a man of his own character, which had so untoward an influence on his actions as obliged his father to recall him^d. Chramnes added disobedience to indiscretion; and, having married the daughter of a powerful nobleman, took up arms against his father. Childebert, pleased with this occasion, promised him assistance, and, by his intrigues, engaged the Saxons to rebel for the third time, which obliged Clotaire to turn his views and his forces on that side; but, however, he sent a considerable body of forces, commanded by two of his sons, to reduce their brother^e. They managed the war like young men, and, upon a false rumour of their father's death, spread out of policy by their brother, retired. This changed the face of affairs in respect to Chramnes; and his uncle, to favour his interest, made an irruption into Champagne; but they very suddenly changed again by Childebert's falling sick at Paris, on his return from that expedition; of which sickness he quickly die^m (E); and, as he was little beloved, was but little regretted.

(E) Childebert was in all respects a prince very unequal, and in all probability it is owing to this, that we find such different characters of him, in ancient and modern histories. The truth is, he did not deserve a good, and, at the same time, it would be unjust to give him a bad character (6). In point of morals he was more irreproachable than any of his brethren; for he was a lover of order and justice, and governed his people mildly (7). He was, according to the mode of the times, extremely pious; that is, he built hospitals, convents, and churches. Four councils held at Orleans, one at Arles, and two at Paris, under his auspices, are yet stronger proofs of this; but that which seems to be the strongest of all is, his obliging pope Pelagius, of whose principles he had some suspicion, to send him his confession of faith; of which the French historians boast as a point of great consequence (8). But with all these good he had a great many ill qualities; he was ambitious, fickle, and deceitful. He projected the murder of his nephews, the sons of Clodomir, though he afterwards relented; he encouraged his nephew Chramnes to take up arms against his father, and yet it does not appear he attempted to make him his successor, which, however, might be out of his power (9). He had but one consort, Ultrogotte, and by her he had two daughters, Chrothberge and Chrotisfinde, who were all very ill treated by Clotaire, being first imprisoned and then banished (1). This is the first instance that occurs of the setting aside daughters; but whether it was done by custom, by virtue of any law, or by downright force, is very far from being clear.

a what was past; the admonition was seasonable and salutary, but ineffectual. The king would not suddenly trust him with power, and to him a private life was insupportableⁿ. He began therefore to intrigue afresh; and having engaged the count of Bretagne to embrace his interest, he broke out into a second rebellion. Clotaire marched against him without loss of time. The count his protector advised him withdraw from the army, for the security of his person, while he gave the king battle; but the prince, though defective in other respects, wanted not courage, and therefore, rejecting this advice, appeared at the head of the troops, and shewed an intrepidity which had been laudable in a better cause^o. It is said, that, before the armies engaged, Clotaire put up his prayers to the Supreme Being, that he would assist him as he did David against Absalom: the dispute was short and bloody; the Bretons were beaten, and their count killed. Upon which Chramnes determined to make his escape, but perceiving that the quarter, where his wife and family were, had been surrounded by his father's forces, he attempted to rescue them, and in that attempt was taken^p. In this condition, they were all thrust into a thatched cottage near the field; of which the king was no sooner informed, than he ordered it to be set on fire on all sides; so that all within perished in the flames, though some say, that Chramnes was first strangled^q. The king, at his return from this expedition, made great offerings at the shrine of St. Martin of Tours, and performed many other acts of devotion, according to the mode of those times; he made also some political regulations for the benefit of his subjects, and the security of his posterity; but while he was thus employed, he was seized with a fever, while hunting in the neighbourhood of Compiègne, which carried him to the grave in a few days^r. He is said to have cried out, when very near his end, how puissant is the King of heaven, who thus at his pleasure removes the greatest kings upon earth^s. He had enjoyed the regal dignity fifty-one years, and was without doubt one of the most fortunate monarchs that hitherto had occupied the throne of the Franks; in whom many great qualities were conspicuous, which might have rendered his name immortal, if they had not been obscured by many odious vices^t.

A. D. 560.

THE empire of the Franks, upon the demise of Clotaire, descended to his four sons, Caribert, Gontran, Sigebert and Chilperic. It does not appear, that any division was made by him; but very soon after his decease, Chilperic, the most restless and enterprising of his sons, went with a strong party of his friends to Braime in Champagne, a country palace of his father's, where he knew his treasures remained, and having seized upon these, and distributed a part to the nobility and people, in the dominions of his uncle Childebert, he was by them conducted in triumph to Paris, and there seated on the throne^u. This was in itself a bold measure, and conducted with spirit, but in the end it proved altogether vain. The other three princes, assisted by the prelates and nobility, quickly assembled such a force as compelled Chilperic and his faction to abandon their enterprize, and to put things in the same state in which they were at the king's death^v. After this, according to custom, which seems to be the sole law against the Franks, the distribution was made by lot; by which means Caribert, who was the eldest, had the kingdom of Paris, Gontran, the second, had Orleans, Sigebert had Metz, or the kingdom of Austrasia, and Chilperic, the younger, was forced to be content with Soissons^w. Provence and Aquitaine were not comprehended in this division, but seem to have been possessed by all of them in common, and, which must appear strange, the empire of the Franks, though thus divided, continued for some years in peace, that is within itself; for the news of Clotaire's death, and the disturbance raised by Chilperic, no sooner reached the barbarous nations, on the frontiers of the Germanic France, than they began to form vast expectations of bettering their own condition, by taking advantage of this division and disorder^x.

THE author of this invasion is commonly stiled the Cagan, or more properly, the Khan Sigebert de- of the Abares, a barbarous nation, said to be the remains of the Huns, who, having served with credit in the imperial armies, had lands assigned them, on the banks of the Danube, by the emperor Justinian^y. These people were not only remarkably brave, and hardy to the last degree, but, at the same time, so hideous in their persons, that their very appearance struck those who beheld them with terror: in stature they exceeded the common race of men, their limbs half-naked, and of an unusual size, their hair long and platted with cords, their faces squalid, their voice hoarse and disagreeable. They fell first into the country of Thuringia; the inhabitants of which being always averse to the yoke of the Franks, received them favourably, and very readily joined them^z. Sigebert, a gallant young prince, then about twenty-six years of age, knowing that his future peace must depend upon the conduct^a and success of this expedition, laboured all he could to raise a numerous army, and to lessen the apprehensions they were under from the reports spread of their terrible enemies. He succeeded in this; and, instead of waiting for these bold invaders, he marched to attack them in Thuringia, took his measures with the coolness and skill of a great captain, and exposed himself, at the beginning of the action, like a private man, that his example might encourage his troops, and prevent all danger of a panic^b. The Huns were beat by superiority of discipline, in spite of their ferocity and strength. Sigebert prosecuted his victory to the utmost, pursuing the Huns till he forced them to pass the Elbe with precipitation, yet accepted the first proposition made by their king for concluding a peace^c. He was induced to this by the news that his brother Chilperic had invaded his dominions, and taken Rheims, and some other^b places in the neighbourhood; and therefore, as soon as his treaty with the Huns was concluded, he repassed the Rhine, and with his victorious army invested Soissons, the capital of Chilperic's dominions, of which he became master, and of the person of his eldest son Theodobert; he defeated, likewise, Chilperic himself in battle, and not only recovered all the places he had taken, but despoiled him, likewise, of the best part of his dominions. The two eldest brothers interposed upon this; and Sigebert, under their mediation, not only concluded a peace, but abandoned his conquests, and set Theodobert at liberty, whom he loaded with presents, but exacted from him an oath, that he would never bear arms against him more^d; and thus the empire of the Franks was again restored to quiet.

THIS Sigebert was incontestably the most prudent as well as the bravest of the sons of Clotaire; and, therefore, perceiving how much all his brethren had sunk themselves in the^c opinion of their subjects, as well as with foreign nations, by their intemperance, and, more especially, by their mean and unequal marriages, he determined to avoid that blemish, and to give a good example to those from whom he should have received it. With this view, by the advice of his council, he sent Gogon mayor of the palace (Maire du Palais) which, at this time, implied prime minister, but came afterwards to signify both that and generalissimo, to procure for him Brunichilde, or more commonly Brunehaut, daughter to Athanagilde, king of the Visigoths. This princess was easily obtained; and Gogon brought her into France with a magnificent equipage and immense treasure^e. Her birth, her beauty, and her behaviour, which was perfectly affable and modest, and her speedy conversion from the Arian heresy to^d the Catholic faith, rendered her the delight of her subjects, and raised the character of Sigebert extremely. Soon after died Caribert, king of Paris^f (F). His dominions were divided amongst his brethren, but in so strange a manner, that we should run the hazard of deceiving ourselves and the reader if we should attempt to explain it; only this is certain, that they agreed that the city of Paris should be given to none of them, but be possessed in common, and they required three of the greatest prelates in their dominions to curse, in the most solemn manner,

(F) Charibert, or Caribert, king of Paris, was the ablest monarch of his time, as appears by his preserving his authority, and reigning in peace, notwithstanding the dissolute life he led, which did not hinder his being highly complimented by some prelates (2), though, for the honour of religion, there were others who would not prostitute their consciences, but took an honest liberty of remonstrating, in the strongest terms, against his unchristian and unprincely vices (3). His first wife was Ingoberge, who survived him nineteen years, and by whom he had Edilberge, or Berta, by the Saxons stiled Emma, who espoused Ethelbert, king of Kent, and was very instrumental in converting him to christianity (4). Queen Ingoberge had two servants, the daughters of a wool-comber, with whom the king fell in love, and married first the younger of the two, whose name was Mirefleur; and though she was exquisitely handsome, this did not hinder his taking a third wife, Theudechilde, the daughter of a shepherd, who brought him a son, which, however, quickly died (5). Germanus, bishop of Paris, expostulated with him very sharply for these scandalous actions, and more especially for his repudiating his lawful queen. Charibert, however, so little regarded the good prelate's admonitions, that he took the wool-comber's elder daughter Marcouese out of a convent, and married her likewise. On which Germanus excommunicated him; but it does not appear the king was ever reclaimed (6). He was a very learned and polite prince, spoke Latin elegantly, kept his treaties punctually, caused justice to be strictly administered throughout his dominions, and was highly respected by his neighbours. Besides his four wives, he must have had concubines, for he left behind him two natural daughters, Bertoflede and Crodielle, who became nuns (7). His widow Theudechilde, who by his bounty had amassed immense treasures, wrote to his brother Gontran, that all she had was at his service, provided that with her wealth he took her person. Gontran encouraged her to come to him; but, instead of marrying her, seized a part of her riches, and put her into a convent; from which she endeavoured to make her escape, in order to fly into Spain; but was prevented by the vigilance of the abbess, and compelled to spend the remainder of her days in a cloister, much against her will (8).

a which ever of these kings should, at any time, presume to enter it without the consent of the other two^e.

CHILPERIC, king of Soissons, jealous of his brother in all respects, saw with regret the great reputation he had acquired, and therefore resolved to alter, at least in appearance, his own course of life, and to espouse the elder sister of Brunebaut, who was reputed little inferior to her in beauty, and, in all other respects, at least her equal. As soon as he had taken this resolution, he sent to demand that princess from her father, but the negotiation proved harder than he expected^b (G). It was however at length accomplished; and, before the arrival of the princess Galswintha, he dismissed from court his mistress Fredegonde, and took some other steps of the same nature, which were extremely acceptable to his subjects, to whom, in many respects, he was become highly obnoxious. The queen, who brought with her immense treasures from Spain, and who made it her whole study to please the king, made herself for a time entirely acceptable; but, by degrees, Chilperic suffered Fredegonde to appear at court, and was suspected to have renewed his intercourse with her, which gave the queen such distaste, that she intreated Chilperic's leave to return into her own country, offering to leave behind her all she had brought from thenceⁱ. The king rejected this proposal, because he thought it would render him odious: but, at the same time, he framed and executed a design, which covered him with indelible ignominy. He cajoled the poor queen in such a manner as to dissipate her suspicions, and when they seemed to live in the utmost harmony, she was found dead in her bed^k. He appeared inconsolable upon this, which he would have had taken for a sudden death; whereas it was known that the queen was strangled, and, upon his publicly espousing Fredegonde soon after, it was suspected he did the murder with his own hands. Brunebaut not only stirred up her husband Sigebert to A. ^k Gesta Rerum Francorum, c. xxxi. ADON. Breviar. Chron.

(G) In this note we are to give the character of Fredegonde, which is extremely necessary to the right understanding of this part of the history, as she made a far greater figure in her time than any of the monarchs of the Franks. She was the daughter of a peasant, in that part of France now called Picardy, and, in all probability, her education corresponded with her descent; so that she must have stood equally indebted to nature for her capacity as well as beauty; and, which very rarely happens, they were illustrious in the same degree. Chilperic took her for his concubine when they were both very young; and though he was extremely enamoured of her, yet he married Andovera, who was likewise a finished beauty, but was far from having the parts of Fredegonde, who, in compliance with the king's will, and to serve her own purposes, made no scruple of waiting of her, or of taking all the methods possible to gain her favour and confidence, which that innocent and unsuspecting princess easily bestowed (g). Fredegonde believing she had obtained such an ascendancy over Chilperic as might induce him to make her the partner of his throne, as well as of his bed, if it was empty, contrived to put this in his power. In order to which, when one of the queen's daughters was to be baptized, she prevailed on a lady, who was to be the godmother, to make the ceremony wait, and then taking advantage of the queen's impatience, proposed, as there was nobody present worthy of the honour, that she should herself hold the child, as the king himself was sponsor, which she inadvertently did. Fredegonde, when she next saw Chilperic, told him, that he had now no queen, for, according to the discipline of that age, a kind of spiritual, or rather ecclesiastical kindred, was contracted between those who answered for a child at the font, which rendered a marriage between them unlawful. Upon this slight and silly pretence the queen was dismissed the court, and sent to a convent (1), to the great satisfaction of Chilperic as well as Fredegonde; but they acted upon different motives: the king was struck with the marriage of his brother Sigebert to a princess of Spain, and resolved to follow his example. For the present, therefore, the politics of Fredegonde were not only unsuccessful, but produced an event directly opposite to her wishes; but she dissembled her chagrin, and began to weave her devices anew. She was a woman, who with infinite address and intrigue could appear the most simple and sincere in her behaviour: by an affected tenderness, and a constant complaisance, she retained the affections of Chilperic, who was the most mutable man in the world. At the same time she held him by her arts, she governed him by her capacity: his ambition inspired him with projects, which he wanted abilities to execute; Fredegonde pointed out the means, and taught him how to conduct them. She was his mistress, his confidant, and his minister; and she was content to be these, that she might be his queen (2). She had certainly great talents, as the bitterest of her enemies allow, but, in spite of all the apologies that have been made for her, she had certainly many of the blackest vices. She was covetous; cruel, envious, vindictive, and lewd, but she knew how to conceal all these detestable qualities under the veil of state policy, and even of religion. There was one vice she could not hide; and this taught the court and the world to pry into all the rest, and perhaps to publish more wicked things of her than were true. This predominant vice was pride, a thing inseparable from mean birth, when elevated not by merit, but by fortune. It may be corrected by good sense, it will be extinguished by religion; but where these are not united, it will sooner or later break out; and haughtiness in such persons is ever insupportable, as being without any foundation.

The Huns invade the dominions of the Franks on the one side, and the Lombards on the other.

THIS war was scarce finished before the Huns made a new irruption into the dominions of the king of Austrasia, who immediately marched with an army to oppose them; but he was not so successful as at the beginning of his reign. The ancient historians say, that by magical arts the Franks were so terrified, that they abandoned their monarch; but it will appear, in the sequel, that Sigebert ought rather to be esteemed a magician than they, who, seeing that his troops would not act, called to his assistance those engines of witchcraft that affect alike the barbarous and the polite; that is, he distributed presents so plentifully, and, in a conference he had with a king of the Abares, touched his humour so happily, and made him so thoroughly sensible of his liberality, that they swore a perpetual friendship^m. In their retreat, the Huns found themselves embarrassed in a woody country, without provisions, where they might have been easily and totally cut off. Thither Sigebert directed his march with vast herds of live cattle, and all kinds of necessaries; and took care that they should be plentifully supplied till they arrived in their own territories: an action, of which the Huns had so strong a sense, that they never disturbed his dominions afterⁿ. While he was thus employed, the Lombards, who had lately got possession of Italy, made an irruption into Burgundy, where they did a great deal of mischief, till they were defeated by Mummol, who commanded king Gontran's forces. The Lombards had carried into Italy a body of twenty thousand Saxons, with their wives and children, who they promised should share their fortune; but, when this exceeded their own expectation, they became so enamoured of their new conquest as absolutely to refuse any settlement to the Saxons, who threw themselves into the country of Burgundy, where they were defeated by the same general with great loss^o. The next year, they entered the same country a little before harvest, and traversed it in as short a time as they were able, in hopes of gaining their own, and proceeding from thence into their old country, professing themselves subjects to the king of Austrasia; but this Mummol prevented, and obliged them to make satisfaction, in money and rich furniture, for the depredations they had committed. He then permitted them to return home, where they found the Suevi in possession, by whom they were in a great measure cut off and destroyed^p.

Gontran, Sigebert, and Chilperic, often break with, and as often make peace with each other. 570.

AFTER the return of Sigebert to Metz, having some pretensions on the city of Arles, he caused it to be taken, in some measure by surprize, from his brother Gontran, who quickly recovered it, and who soon after made a peace, and an alliance against his brother Chilperic, who, during this war, had made himself master of several places in Sigebert's territories^q; for these he had paid very dear, if, about some quarrel as to ecclesiastical jurisdictions, Gontran had not broke again with Sigebert, whose forces being entirely defeated by Clovis, the youngest son of Chilperic, he found himself under a necessity of bringing a numerous army of his German subjects into the field, and, putting himself at their head, marched to repair this loss. Gontran, terrified at their appearance, joined his forces to those of Chilperic, in order to cover the Seine, which they did very effectually^r. Sigebert opened to himself a passage, by acquainting Gontran, that, if he persisted in this measure, he would make an irruption into Burgundy; upon which Gontran abandoning Chilperic, he was in a short time reduced so low, that he was obliged to send to his brother for peace; to which Sigebert, as he had formerly done, readily consented. But his army, who were for the most part Pagans, who had already acquired both booty and slaves, and who had promised themselves the plunder of the best part of France, mutinied as soon as they knew the peace was signed^s. Sigebert, who had a strong corps of Franks, put them immediately under arms, rode in person to the mutineers, seized some of the chiefs, and caused them to be stoned; on which the rest submitted; and, receiving good words and presents, returned again into their own country, to the great satisfaction of the Franks, who were subjects of the same prince^t.

Sigebert is assassinated before Tournay, which changes the whole face of affairs.

THE peace had not subsisted a year, when Chilperic, burning with impatience to renew the war, procured an interview with his brother Gontran, in which he laboured to persuade him, that, as his own situation was extremely precarious, and depended rather on the moderation of Sigebert than any power he had to maintain himself; so the moment himself or his posterity should be subdued, the dominions of Gontran would be held by no better tenure. This alarmed him exceedingly, inasmuch that he promised Chilperic to support him with all his forces. The king of Soissons, on this promise, made an irruption into Champagne, and laid all the country waste with fire and sword; Sigebert was so much provoked at this, that he recalled the forces he had dismissed, and dispatched, at the same time, two of his generals,

- a with a body of his best troops, to meet prince Theodobert, son to Chilperic, who, with a numerous army, was marching into the neighbourhood of Paris^u. In the course of his march, however, the best part of his forces deserted him, and, in this distress, he was attacked by Sigebert's generals, who cut him, and a few lords who remained firm to him, in pieces. This news threw Chilperic into great consternation, more especially when he saw his subjects took no share in his distress, but seemed rather pleased with what had happened, and no longer paid a ready obedience to his order. But what increased his perplexity, to a degree that was insupportable, was Gontran's acting as he did before, and making, as soon as the ill news came, a separate peace^w. To prevent worse consequences, he retired with his forces to Tournay, and, having fortified the place in the best manner he was able, determined to make his
- b last efforts for its defence. Sigebert, with a potent and victorious army, entered Paris in triumph, and, after compelling the subjects of the kingdom of Soissons to swear allegiance to him, he continued his march to Tournay, which he invested, notwithstanding the warmest applications were made to him and Brunebaut, by prelates of the first rank, in order to pacify their resentments, and dispose them to offer Chilperic some terms of peace^x. In this state of things, Fredegonde prevailed on two desperate villains to undertake the murder of Sigebert, which they effected with great ease; for, going into his camp, and pretending that they had matters of great importance to communicate to him, the king gave them audience, and, while he listened to a feigned tale they told him, they buried both their daggers in his bowels^y. Two lords, who were at some distance, advancing to seize the assassins, one was
- c killed, and the other grievously wounded; but the guards, taking the alarm, came to their relief, and, seeing what had happened, cut those execrable wretches to pieces on the spot^z. Thus fell the most accomplished prince of the Franks, about the fortieth year of his age, and in the fourteenth of his reign^a. His army, thereupon, immediately raised the siege, and retired, as fast as possible, into Austrasia.

- CHILPERIC, or rather Fredegonde, as soon as this dreadful blow was struck, sent to Paris, Meroveus the eldest son of Chilperic, in order to seize the widow, the children, and the treasures of Sigebert. Gondebaude, one of the ablest generals of the deceased king, made his escape out of that city, and carried with him privately Childebert, the only son of his master, then about five years of age, whom he conveyed safely to Metz, where the nobility proclaimed him king of Austrasia. Brunebaut, which occasions great confusion. A.D. 576.
- d with her two daughters Ingurda and Clodowinda, were confined, and an immense mass of treasure seized^b. On the arrival of Chilperic at Paris, he ordered Brunebaut to remove to Rouen, where she had the city for her prison, but he took from her both her daughters. Some time after, he sent his son prince Meroveus, with a considerable body of forces, to Tours. His conduct was such as surprized the Franks, and alarmed his father; for, instead of executing his orders, he went to Rouen; and the bishop of that city, whose name was Pretextatus, was prevailed upon to solemnize a marriage between him and Brunebaut, who was still a young woman, and most amazingly handsome^c. Chilperic, upon receiving this news, by the advice of his queen, marched thither immediately, and the prince and his consort, not being able to assemble any force to oppose him, took sanctuary; but, upon a solemn promise of
- e safety, they quitted it, to throw themselves at the king's feet. Chilperic entertained them kindly, caused them, for several days, to eat with him at his own table, then carried his son with him to Soissons, and sent Brunebaut and her two daughters back to Metz, under pretence of complying with the demand which Childebert, by the advice of his council, had made, that his mothers and sisters should be set at liberty, though in truth he was afraid to suffer her to remain in his dominions^d.

- BRUNEHAUT was no sooner returned into the kingdom of Austrasia, than she began to meditate revenge against Chilperic, in appearance, whom she stiled, murderer of his brother, and her husband; but, in reality, against Fredegonde; for these two ambitious princesses were irreconcilable enemies to each other, and the whole nation of the Franks were, for many
- f years, the victims of their passions. It is not easy to conceive how the lords of Austrasia, who were extremely jealous of Brunebaut, came to adopt this measure; but it is certain they did; and that Godin, one of their generals, at the head of a considerable army, marched directly to Soissons, in hopes of surprizing Fredegonde; but she having timely notice, made her escape. Godin, however, caused the city to be invested, knowing that prince Meroveus was still there, and would not be displeased if it fell into his hands^e. Chilperic marched with what troops he could assemble to save his capital, and, after engaging and beating the troops of Austrasia, compelled them to raise the siege. In order to prosecute this victory, he sent

Gontran, taking his nephew under his protection, sent his general Mummol to oppose Didier, whom he routed, and killed him twenty-five thousand men^f. Chilperic, who attributed all his misfortunes to Meroveus, caused that unhappy prince to be seized, and shaved, who, notwithstanding, made his escape, and took shelter in the church of St. Martin at Tours; from whence, with infinite difficulty, he found means to withdraw into the kingdom of Austrasia, where Brunebaut would have protected him, if it had been in her power; but the jealousy of the nobles was so strong, that he was obliged to withdraw, and to hide himself where he could^e. Chilperic then turned his vengeance against Pretextatus, bishop of Rouen, whom he accused, in person, before an assembly of bishops, of treason, and other enormous crimes;
 but the prelate defended himself so well, that his brethren could not be prevailed upon, by b intreaties, promises, or threatenings, to condemn him; notwithstanding which, Chilperic sent him into banishment^h. Meroveus was not long after betrayed, and made prisoner; but, as they were conveying him to a fortress, where he was to remain in confinement, a person, who was near him, ran him through the body; of which he died upon the spot. It was given out, that he was slain by a servant of his at his own earnest request; but this was generally looked upon as an artifice to cover Fredegonde from the reproach of having caused her son-in-law to be assassinated.

 A. D. 579.

As two of the sons of queen Andovera were now removed out of her way, Fredegonde looked upon the destruction of Clovis as the single step wanting to transfer the succession to her own sons; of whom she had three^k. But while she meditated the means of effecting c this, a very strange event happened, which had almost brought about her own. One Leu- daste, who had been removed from the government of Tours for oppression, framed, in conjunction with Riculphe, an ecclesiastic of that diocese, an accusation against St. Gregory, then bishop, and the great historian of this period, as if he should have thrown out a charge against the queen of committing adultery with the bishop of Bordeaux: they likewise added, that he had entered into intrigues for betraying the city to the king of Austrasia. The king suspected the first part of this information, and paid no credit to the latter^l. He left it, notwithstanding, to be examined by an assembly of bishops, who, upon Gregory's swearing, in the most solemn manner, that he never said any such thing, declared him innocent. Leudaste made his escape in time; but Riculphe, being in prison, was put to the torture, who confessed, that d
 the true design was not against the bishop, but against the queen; on a supposition that Chil- peric would have believed the charge, and have either put her to death, or banished her; and, in that case, Leudaste intended to have assassinated him, with the three young princes, and to have set Clovis upon the throne; but it was not so much as pretended, that he was at all privy to this conspiracy^m. Chilperic had, about this time, a dispute with Varoc, count of Bre- tagne, who refused to do him homage: he sent a body of troops against him, which were defeated, and consented afterwards to a treaty, which did him no great honour. This want of spirit, which was not very consistent with his character, might, very probably, be owing to the untoward situation of his affairs, which was such as might have perplexed a wiser prince. His brother and his nephew lived in strict union, and both had no great reason to be e well pleased with him; his subjects had been so harrassed with taxes, through his own avarice, and that of Fredegonde, that they were miserably poor, and universally discontented. His son Clovis abhorred Fredegonde, and made no secret of his aversion. To increase his embarrassments, the seasons were, for a long time, so unfavourable, that famine and pestilence threatened at the same timeⁿ. The king and queen were both attacked with the epidemic disease that then raged, and both escaped; but their three sons Clodobert, Samson, and Dagobert, were attacked by this dangerous disease, which staggered even the fortitude of Fredegonde, whom all historians allow to have been, in her temper, one of the firmest women that ever lived. She had not only recourse to processions, public prayers, and all the exterior modes of religion then in fashion, but also prevailed upon the king to remit various taxes, and to f throw the rolls of some heavy impositions into the fire: notwithstanding all which, these children died, upon which the queen resumed her former fortitude^o.

THE sight of Clovis, who was now become his father's sole heir, was more uneasy to her than ever: the great court paid him by persons of all ranks excited her envy; and the threats, which, like a young man, he sometimes threw out, alarmed her so much, that she practised various methods to remove him, and even went so far as to send him into the most infected provinces, in hopes the prevailing malady might dispatch him. At length, her design became so apparent, that some of those obsequious wretches, who are the disgrace of courts, to make

- a. themselves agreeable to her who ruled all things, charged the prince with procuring the destruction of her children. To give some colour to this strange tale, they affirmed, that he was in love with a young person, whose mother was a witch, and that the three young princes were destroyed by her incantations : upon which incredible, as well as improbable story, the prince was confined, the young woman treated in the most shameful manner, and the old one, after being racked into a confession, condemned^p. Prince Clovis, being entirely delivered up to her resentment, she sent him to the castle of Noisy, on the other side the Marne, where he was found, a few days after, extended in his apartment, with a wound in his breast, and a bloody dagger lying by him, to countenance a report, which was spread, as if he had fallen by his own hand. But reflecting afterwards, that Chilperic might possibly learn the truth, and, suspecting his own safety, recall his queen Andovera, who, though banished his court, was not entirely banished his heart, she, to complete her design, and to fix that absolute dominion she so long enjoyed, caused her likewise to be removed out of the world^q. Thus Chilperic was left alone, in the hands of an ambitious and cruel woman, who, by degrees, had dispatched his whole family.

- THE young king of Austrasia seemed to be born to unusual good fortune ; though raised to the throne while a child, though his mother was excluded from the government, and though, from the disputes incident to minority, his councils were in a great measure distracted ; yet, instead of being in any distress or danger, he lived in splendor and security^r. His uncle Gontran, king of Burgundy, being without children, considered him as his heir, sent for him to his court, shewed him as his successor to his people, and caressed him in such a manner, that Chilperic, and even Fredegonde, were afraid to give him any disturbance, knowing that the Austrasians and Burgundians united would be an over-match for all the forces they could raise ; besides, Chilperic was again embarrassed with the count of Bretagne^s. By degrees the scene changed ; the bishop of Rheims gained the ascendancy in the council at Metz, and he had such a spleen at Lupus, duke of Champagne, as divided the whole kingdom into two factions, queen Brunebaut siding with the duke, who likewise stood well with the king of Burgundy. This led the bishop of Rheims to suggest to the regency of Austrasia, that Chilperic was the king's uncle as well as Gontran ; that he had likewise no children ; and that, notwithstanding the professions of the former, he still kept the moiety of Marseilles, which he had seized upon the death of Sigebert. He advised, therefore, that Childebert should make a league with his uncle Chilperic, for the recovery of Marseilles ; and, at the same time, recover Poitiers, which that monarch had seized, because it was convenient to him. Chilperic entered readily into the league, but avoided the restitution, by saying, that Childebert would quickly inherit that and the rest of his dominions^t. This war might have been fatal to Gontran, if Childebert could have acted with the same vigour as his uncle Chilperic did ; but this the factions in his dominions prevented. However, Chilperic prosecuted the war with such spirit and success, that Gontran was glad to make peace upon hard terms ; and the king of Soissons took care that one article of the peace should be the restitution of the moiety of Marseilles to his nephew^u. This policy gained him a great interest amongst the Austrasians, with whom he held a constant correspondence.

- CHILPERIC, of all the kings of the Franks, was the most considered in foreign nations, and had the greatest respect paid him ; which induced him to pique himself upon his magnificence, and in which, it is also probable, he gratified Fredegonde, whose address was so great, that she kept a fair correspondence with Childebert, or at least with those who had the direction of his affairs ; insomuch that he negotiated a new league with Chilperic against Gontran, who had seized again the moiety of Marseilles, which he had so lately restored. But this war was not over fortunate. Childebert did not perform what might be expected from a good ally. Gontran gained some advantage over the troops of the king of Soissons, in the battle of Melun ; upon which a peace was concluded, and Childebert was again put into possession of his share of Marseilles^v. By this time the queen dowager Brunebaut had regained the ascendancy in Childebert's cabinet, whom she engaged in a close alliance with his uncle, the king of Burgundy, with an intent to despoil Chilperic of the best part of his dominions. The king of Soissons judged it best to act upon the defensive ; and therefore he retired to Cambray with his treasures, and ordered all his generals to put their forces into the most defensible places, upon a supposition that this formidable alliance would not subsist long^w. In this turn of his affairs, he had the consolation of seeing a son born, and of marrying his daughter, the princess Rigunthe, to Recared, son to the king of the Visigoths^x. But while he was occupied with these and other cares, a sudden and sad end was put to his days, at a juncture when his affairs were in the most critical situation. For, being at the castle of Chelbes, a country-house about four leagues from Paris, and taking there the diversion of hunting, he returned one evening, somewhat late, and as he was dismounting from his horse, and leaning his hand upon the shoulder of one of his domestics, he received two stabs with a long knife, one under the arm-pit, and the other in the belly; of which wounds he died upon the spot, and the assassins made their escape; neither is it clear by what intrigues he was brought to this strange end² (H).

FREDEGONDE found herself in a most distressed condition, deserted by most of those she had raised, and insulted by those she had formerly treated ill; her son, who was then no more than four months old, was then at Tournay, by Chilperic's appointment: those who were entrusted with his treasures carried them to Childebert at Metz; the better part of her own she had bestowed upon her daughter, and these were seized by Didier, who commanded the escorte that was to attend her into Spain; and her daughter, after some confinement at Toulouse, was brought back in a contemptuous manner to Paris; to which city she herself repaired, with the few persons of distinction who still followed her fortune³. The character of this princess was unshaken fortitude; and she displayed it, in the highest degree, upon this occasion. She addressed herself to Gontran, king of Burgundy, and, in the most humble manner, intreated him to become the protector of an unhappy widow, and of an orphan king, who was also his nephew. Gontran gave her good words, and marched directly to Paris with his army, and, upon mature deliberation, consented to what she desired; whether on the motive of duty, compassion, or policy, is very uncertain. On the other hand, Childebert, king of Austrasia, either from his own disposition, or through the persuasion of his mother Brunebaut, marched also to Paris; but Gontran caused the gates to be shut against him, and treated very cavalierly the ambassadors sent him by that prince⁴. They demanded, in their master's name, a share in the dominions of Chilperic, and that Fredegonde should be delivered up to be punished, for a multitude of crimes, which they laid to her charge. Gontran told them, that the dominions of Chilperic were to be inherited by his son, and that he yielded no credit to the stories they told him of his widow. He added, that, immediately on his bro-

(H) In respect of the death of Chilperic, the fault of modern historians is to speak of the author of it with any kind of certainty, since it is out of all doubt, that, at the time it happened, either it was not known, or those who knew it durst not publish it. The prelate of Tours gives us not the least hint of his own opinion (3). The author, nearest in point of time to him, is very explicit; he says, that he was assassinated by the commanded of Brunebaut, and affirms, that the name of him who did it was Faucon (4). Yet this is not likely to be true, since, if it had been so, Fredegonde must have known it, and, as the reader will see in the history, she charged another person with it, which cost him his life. The truth is, this happened before Brunebaut began to practise those wicked actions, with which most historians charge her. Another historian is as confident, that Fredegonde herself was the author of her husband's death (5). This must appear very improbable from the circumstances in which she was left; but this improbability is taken away by the story he tells, provided that story be not thought a greater improbability. It amounts to this: the king, before he went to the chase, came accidentally into the queen's apartment, and found her washing her face; upon which he touched her neck with a switch he had in his hand. The queen, without turning her head, cried, Ah, Landry, is it you! is the king gone? The tone, in which this was spoken, affected Chilperic so much, that, in turning out of the room, he muttered somewhat, which alarmed the queen to such a degree, that she sent immediately for her gallant, and represented their common danger in so strong a light, as produced the stabbing the king when he returned in the evening from hunting. The silence of Gregory of Tours, who was no friend to Fredegonde, is a great argument that nothing of this sort was reported at that time; and he is so absolutely silent, that the very name of Landry does not occur in his history. He deals, however, very roundly with the character of Chilperic, whom he stiles the Nero and the Herod of his time, alluding to his tyranny in point of government, and the cruelties he exercised upon his own children (6). He resembled that prince in other respects, since he was setting himself up for a legislator in spiritual as well as civil affairs. He conceived of himself so highly, that he thought of putting an end, by an edict of his own penning, to the disputes between the Orthodox and the Arians; from which scheme he was with difficulty dissuaded (7). He invented four letters, which he directed should be added to the alphabet, and ordered, that where they would have occurred, in ancient books, the letters originally used should be neatly erased, and these of his invention substituted; but these letters of his were so little relished, that, except what Gregory of Tours suggests, it is not at this day very well known what they were (8). He composed, likewise, two or three volumes upon different subjects; and, amongst these royal labours, there were a great many poems, which, we are assured, were very bad; and, in all probability, they must have been so, since they had the misfortune to be considered in that light, in an age when very bad performances were esteemed excellent (9). The bishop of Poitiers, indeed, has a better opinion of them, and has bestowed some commendations upon this prince, which, perhaps, would have had a better effect, if he had not been inclined to commend all princes (10). As to Chilperic's first queen, and his issue by her, all that we need to say of them has been interwoven in the history. With respect to the second, Galswintha, we may say the same thing, and as to the history of Fredegonde, besides what has been already mentioned, we shall be obliged to treat of her and her issue in another place (11).

a ther's death, he had promised to defend them, and that he meant to keep his word. The ambassadors replied, that they were glad to find him a prince of such punctuality : and therefore hoped he would keep his treaties as well as his word. Gontran, exceedingly provoked at this behaviour, produced a treaty that Childebert had made with Chilperic to deprive him of his dominions, which had been put into his hands by Fredegonde ; upbraiding them with their corruption and oppressions, charging them with betraying their master, and telling them, that whatever he had he would keep, even if it did of right belong to his nephew, as believing it to be safer in his hands than theirs. All things seemed now tending towards a rupture ; but the heats on both sides were quickly qualified, by the breaking out of a scheme which had been long in agitation, and which tended to no less than setting up a new king ^c.

b THIS is one of the darkest transactions that falls within the compass of this period, and the most difficult to explain ; but, at the same time, it is one of the most curious and instructive. The ministers, in the several courts of the kings of the Franks, found themselves less powerful, and less at their ease, than they could wish, and this chiefly through that balance, which either the piety or the policy of Gontran had established, and which Chilperic, before his death, began to comprehend and admire. The confederates, therefore, resolved to confer the title of king upon Gondebaut, who was generally esteemed to be the son of Clotaire ; and they took their measures with more prudence, and with a greater degree of foresight, than has been common in such intrigues. These conspirators were duke Didier and duke Mummol, with duke Boson, who had been raised by the favour of king Childebert, and, in his turn, had been trusted by and betrayed every one of the monarchs who then reigned over the Franks. This man had been sent by the rest to Constantinople, to bring over this son of Clotaire, whom he cheated with the promise of a crown ; and to whom, either out of friendship, or to embroil the affairs of the Franks, the Greek emperor Tiberius freely gave an immense treasure ^d. Soon after the return of Boson, Gondebaut followed him, as he had promised, and landed at Mar-seilles ; the bishop of which city, whose name was Theodorus, received him very respectfully, and furnished him with the carriages requisite for him and his train to proceed to Avignon, of which Mummol was governor. He was no sooner gone, than Boson caused the bishop to be arrested, and charged him with treason, that he might seize the treasures of Gondebaut, which he divided with the governor of Mar-seilles ; but, at the same time, hinted to the conspirators, under-hand, that he did this only to save appearances ^e. While he was intriguing with all the courts, without the least intention of being true to any, he was, with all his family, seized by the order of king Gontran, and conducted prisoner to Paris. There he accused Mummol of being the author of the whole contrivance, and offered to betray him into the king's hands, leaving his son an hostage for the execution of his promise, which, though he endeavoured with great address, yet he was not able to perform. In the mean time Childebert, by the advice of queen Brunebaut, and some of his council, in order to mortify the king of Burgundy, drew Gondebaut out of the retreat which he had chosen, upon the loss of his treasures, and put him at the head of a numerous army, commanded under him by duke Mummol, who, at Brive-la-Gaillarde, in the Limousins, proclaimed him king, and, in quality of his brother, the true heir of Chilperic, in the realm of Soissons ; and, by the assistance of Didier, put him in the possession of a great part of the kingdom ; by which his credit and his spirits were so raised, that he sent ambassadors to Gontran, to demand restitution of all the rest. These the king of Burgundy, without ceremony, seized as rebels, put them to the torture, and drew from them an entire discovery of the whole intrigue ; a step bold and well timed, by which his dignity was secured ^f.

UPON these discoveries, Gontran invited his nephew Childebert to come and make him a visit, assuring him, that he would find in him, not only the affection of an uncle, but the tenderness of a father, and the candour of a friend. Many of the great lords of Austrasia opposed this journey with great warmth, alleging, that the king ought not to hazard himself, in the power of a monarch, with whom he stood already upon ill terms ; but Childebert, now in his fifteenth year, decided for himself, and went, with a small retinue, to the court of his uncle. Gontran began, very roundly, with the performance of his promise ; shewed him publicly to the people as his heir ; carried him to the review of his army ; put the javelin, that was in his own hand, into his ; desired them to consider Childebert, for the future, not as his nephew, but as his son ; and restored to him freely all the places to which he had any claim ^g. He next acquainted him, that he was surrounded by traitors ; that some of the principal persons in his cabinet were in the interests of Gondebaut ; and, particularly, advised him to beware of the queen-dowager Brunebaut, and the bishop of Rheims. The two kings were speedily and sincerely reconciled ; and this was no sooner known than Didier abandoned the party of Gonde- baut, and made his peace with the king of Burgundy; the captains, and most of the troops, ^a that were subjects to the king of Austrasia, took the same method. So that Gondebaut, with Mummol, and those who still remained firm, made choice of the fortrefs of Comminge, very strong by situation, and well fortified for those times, in which they determined to stand a siege ^b. It was not long before Leudegisile, who commanded the forces of Gontran, arrived before the place, invested it, and carried on the siege with all the activity and vigour that the art of war, as it then stood, would allow; but, however, with no great success; for the besieged, being well supplied with all things, and the soldiers looking upon their case to be desperate, neglected nothing that might contribute to a good defence, and shewed so much skill and resolution, that Leudegisile began to doubt of the success of his undertaking. There were, however, those about him, who suggested, that other methods might be found, more ^c sure and more speedy than those he had hitherto practised. Having once taken the resolution of following their advice, he left the management of these schemes entirely to those who contrived them ^d, and who were grown expert in the management of such intricate contrivances, by an almost perpetual practice of such intrigues, without any restraint from principle or conscience.

Gondebaut is betrayed by Mummol, who is afterwards put to death, by the orders of Gontran.

Boson was the principal author of these new measures, which consisted in negotiating with Mummol, to seize the unfortunate Gondebaut, and to deliver him up. Mummol knew how obnoxious he was to his old master Gontran, and would not, therefore, listen to any thing, till Leudegisile swore, in the most solemn manner, that he would employ his most zealous ^e endeavours to procure an indemnity for this lord. When he was once brought over, he quickly seduced the other chiefs, men of abandoned characters, who had embarked in this business solely with a view to profit, and who were, therefore, ready to abandon it, when they perceived this was to be found on the other side. As soon as they had made their own terms, they cut the matter very short with their master; they told him, that it was in vain to stay, till the garrison should be reduced to extremity; that, therefore, it would be best to surrender in time; and that Gontran would not probably imbrue his hands in the blood of his brother. Though much surprized at this address, Gondebaut endeavoured to make them sensible of the weakness of this expedient; to which they replied, that arguments came too late, and that their measures were taken. They used him very rudely, hurried him to the gates, and there delivered him to Ollon, count of Berry, and duke Boson ^f. As they rode with him to the camp, the count, in crossing a hollow way, jostled him from his horse. As soon as he recovered his feet, he endeavoured to make his escape back to the city; but Boson threw a great stone at his head, which beat him to the earth, and broke his skull. Mummol and his confederates, having first secured the treasures of this unfortunate phantom of royalty, next betrayed their army, by letting in the troops of Leudegisile in the night, who slaughtered the best part of them, and plundered the place ^g. For these glorious exploits, Mummol and his associates were exceedingly carested, and splendidly feasted; but, in the mean time, Leudegisile had sent to Gontran for instructions, and no sooner received his answer, "That with men who kept no faith, no faith was to be kept," than he took the shortest method of rewarding them according to their deserts. A mutiny was excited amongst Mummol's own ^h guards, who killed him after a desperate resistance; almost all the rest of these traitors were dispatched by the general's command: and thus an end was put to a revolt, that might have been attended with great danger, since both Brunebaut and Fredegonde had their eyes upon Gondebaut; the former for herself, and the latter for her daughter Rigunthe; so that if Mummol had listened to his remonstrances, it is not impossible his affairs might have changed their aspect once again ⁱ.

Gontran restrains Fredegonde, and inquires into the murder of Chilperic, and after the body of Clovis.

GONTRAN, who now began to consider himself as the monarch of the Franks, and believed himself secure on the side of his nephew Childebert, resolved to put the affairs of the kingdom of Soissons into some order; and, with this view, appointed a council of regency to assist Fredegonde in the administration of affairs; a circumstance of attention which she would willingly ^j have spared him. He took another step, which it is likely was as unwelcome. He desired to know, if she could give him no light as to the death of her husband, which he was inclined to punish, as the most effectual means of securing herself. The queen, not in the least disconcerted, said, that, at the time of his death, she had some suspicions of his chamberlain Berulfe; and that she apprehended they were but too just, as he had withdrawn himself since, and secreted her husband's treasures. This man had been formerly a favourite of the queen's; but, upon the death of her husband, believing that she was absolutely undone, had abandoned her party, which she took this method of revenging. Berulfe immediately took shelter at the

- a tomb of St. Martin of Tours; and, in process of time, being persuaded to leave that sanctuary, was murdered, and all his estate confiscated; but those who tell us this do not inform us, that the world was at all better satisfied as to the manner of his master's death °. Fredegonde, growing doubtful of her own and her son's situation, devised what she thought an effectual method of embarrassing Gontran with his nephew Childebert, and his mother Brunebaut, whom she suspected of having advised those troublesome enquiries, which had been lately made. With this view, she intreated the king of Burgundy would become godfather to his nephew, which was, in those days, regarded as a closer tie than that of blood; to which Gontran yielded, and came, for that purpose, to Paris. Fredegonde, however, having carried her point, with respect to the court of Metz, put off the ceremony, being afraid to trust her son in the power of his uncle, for fear he should be taken from her p. At this Gontran was so much provoked, that he declared publicly he would give himself no farther trouble about a child, which he had good reason to doubt was none of his brother's, but the bastard of some of his courtiers. By this declaration Fredegonde was so much alarmed, that she publicly made oath of the legitimacy of her son, and brought three bishops, and three hundred of the nobility, who swore to the belief of what she had sworn q. This did not wholly deliver the queen from her inquietudes, because Gontran shewed a great desire to pay the last funeral honours to his nephews Meroveus and Clovis, who were considered as the victims of her ambition, and the body of the latter not to be found; at length, a poor fisherman, upon the promise of the king's protection, acquainted him, that the body of the prince Clovis, having been interred in the chapel of a certain convent, was taken up again, by Fredegonde's orders, and thrown into the river Marne, where being intangled in his nets, and known by his long hair, he buried it in a private place known only to himself. The king, under pretence of hunting, went to the very spot; and, being convinced that the body was that of his nephew, caused it to be transported to Paris, and, with that of his brother Meroveus, to be interred with great solemnity r.

- A WAR broke out, about this time, with the Visigoths, which continued, with great obstinacy, for several years; the true cause of which seems to be very obscure. The ancient historians, both of France and Spain, ascribe it to the ill usage of the princess Ingonde, the daughter of Brunebaut and the sister of Childebert; and there is no doubt that this was the pretence; but it is very extraordinary, that Gontran should pursue this war with such inflexible obstinacy, in spite of repeated defeats, in spite of the repeated assurances that king Reccared gave of his having no concern in the ill treatment of that princess, and in spite of the danger to which he thought his own life exposed, by the practices of Fredegonde, who immediately entered into a secret correspondence with the Visigoths, and was suspected of undertaking various black designs in their favour; the proofs of which, however, are not very clear s. It is most likely, that Gontran was desirous of expelling the Visigoths out of France entirely; and possibly might think it his interest to keep up a war, on that side, to find employment for Didier, Boson, and some other malignant spirits, who might have cut out new troubles for him in time of peace. Whatever the cause was, he remained inflexible in maintaining this war, even after his nephew Childebert, who, strictly speaking, was the principal in it, had, by the advice of his mother, who was always a Spaniard in her heart, concluded a separate peace t.

- THE great object of the king of Burgundy's politics was to keep the balance even, and to retain both Brunebaut and Fredegonde in a strict state of dependence; and this he found it impossible to do, without seeming to incline sometimes on one side, and sometimes on the other. Brunebaut was once so much in his favour, that he negotiated with her personally, and concluded a long treaty, which is still extant, and bears the name of the treaty of Andlaw; by which he regulated many points of importance, in regard to the intricate claims that arose as to the succession of his brothers u. At this time he was jealous, or at least appeared to be very jealous, of Fredegonde, and of her practices against his life; but that artful princess soon turned the tables, and found means to give him as strong or stronger suspicions of Brunebaut, insinuating, that she had not only contracted her daughter to the king of Spain, but was likewise negotiating a match for herself at Constantinople with the eldest son of Gondebaut, whose pretensions she meant to revive; but when this came to be known to the court of Metz, the queen, who was now in full possession of the regency, and governed her son as if he had been still in his infancy, purged herself in such a manner as gave full satisfaction to the king of Burgundy v. We should account these but light and trivial matters, unworthy of being preserved in history, if we did not reflect, that Sigebert and Chilperic had been actually dispatched by assassins; so that Gontran was not alarmed without cause, and such was the misery and malignity of these times, that when the ambassadors of Childebert were once sent to expostulate with Gontran, who, as we have observed before, treated them but roughly, they amongst other things, told him, that he ought to soften his language, and give their master satisfaction, since the poniards were not yet lost that had been exercised in correcting his brethren^x. These are very strange and very disagreeable facts; but they are such as characterise this age, and give us proper ideas of their policy and manners; of which we may collect some farther notions from transactions of greater importance.

Childebert,

himself of the disputes between the Greeks and the Lombards.

THE emperor Maurice, being desirous of expelling the Lombards out of Italy, in the same manner that his predecessor Justinian had depressed the Ostrogoths, sought to make an alliance, for that purpose, with the Franks. Gontran being still embarrassed in his war with Spain, the emperor concluded a subsidiary treaty with Childebert, who promised his assistance, in consideration of a large sum of money; and accordingly sent, at different times, several armies into Italy, but none with any great success; for some were destroyed by sickness, others beaten by the Lombards, with whom truces were sometimes concluded; in which Childebert, likewise, found his advantage, and of which the emperor bitterly complained, as contrary to those alliances which had cost him so dear^y. Childebert, as the French historians say, being conscious that he did not complain without cause, and that he had sold peace on one side as dear as he had done war on the other, did not aggravate the dispute by frivolous apologies, but remained silent, till such time as the necessities of the Greeks obliged them to forget past disappointments, and make fresh offers for future assistance. At length, under the mediation of Gontran, he concluded a peace with the Lombards; by which he secured an annual subsidy, which is the more extraordinary, since it is, on all hands, allowed, that, notwithstanding several numerous armies of Franks entered Italy, and one particularly, commanded by twenty general officers, yet they had never been successful. The situation of their country giving them an easy access, and their affording them such critical diversions, when engaged with other enemies, compelled the Lombards to purchase quiet upon any terms, which, having the pretence of his uncle's mediation, Childebert sold them upon high terms, notwithstanding his contrary engagements with the emperor, and though Brunebaut opposed this treaty, because her grandson Athanagilde was protected, and subsisted in a manner suitable to his birth at Constantinople; for which she professed herself highly obliged, and gave, upon all occasions, very warm testimonies of her gratitude^z. It was this correspondence with the court of Constantinople that afforded Fredegonde an opportunity of instilling jealousies into Gontran, that the queen dowager of Austrasia held a constant intercourse with the family of Gondebaut, which, though it might be false, was, however, far from being improbable.

A conspiracy against Childebert, which is discovered, and the conspirators are put to death.

A. D. 585.

In the midst of these foreign wars, the court of Metz was distracted by factions, and the king's person more than once in danger from conspiracies. He was still a young man without experience; and all who served him, in any considerable station, thought they had a right to govern him; to which if he did not submit, they considered it as an injury, and had recourse to methods, which, if they were not in all ages too common to be denied, reason would teach us to think incredible. Duke Raucinde, who was the most powerful of the Austrasian nobility, was at the head of this plot, and was directed and supported by Fredegonde. He had gained two other great men, duke Ursion and duke Bertbrefrede: their scheme was to poison king Childebert, and, when this was once done, to proclaim his eldest son Theodobert, and to govern in his name. His younger son Thierry, scarce out of his cradle, was to be put under the care of the other two conspirators, who, with the assistance of Fredegonde, were to depose Gontran, and put their pupil upon the throne of Burgundy^a. This black design was brought almost to the very point of execution; when Gontran, who had his spies about the person of Fredegonde, discovered it; and that the mother and consort of Childebert were to be banished and imprisoned. He sent upon this a hint to Childebert, to find some pretence for meeting him; and, at their interview, gave him a full account of the matter. At his return, Childebert sent for Raucinde, who, by this time, had improved the original plan of his detestable project; and by giving out amongst his friends that he was himself the son of Clotaire, had paved his way to the throne. When the king sent for him, therefore, confiding in his own great power, and the multitude of his friends, he went boldly to court, and, in a long audience, discovered no signs of apprehension or confusion. But as he came out of the king's apartment, the gates of the palace were shut, and by some persons, posted properly for the purpose, he was cut to pieces^b. In the mean time, some of the king's servants were sent to his house, where they seized his papers, in which were the clearest testimonies of his guilt; and his wealth, which was superior to the contents of the royal treasury. The dukes Ursion and Bertbrefrede, no sooner saw his fate, than they took up arms, and endeavoured to retire out of Childebert's dominions; but he sent Godegisile, the son of duke Lupus, with an army, to sup-

a press them, which, after an obstinate resistance, he performed, and both the conspirators were killed^c.

Out of the ashes of this there quickly sprang up another contrivance, in which were embarked the constable Sunegifile, the referendary (or, as we now stile him, chancellor) Gallus, and Septimina, who was governess to the young princes: their aim was to persuade Childebert to send his mother into exile, to repudiate his wife, and to govern the kingdom by their advice; and, if in this they could not prevail, Septimina undertook to poison him. The queen, though she is represented as a woman of no parts, discovered this plot, by comparing certain expressions that Septimina let fall^d. The king caused the constable to be put to the torture, when he accused Giles, bishop of Rheims, as being the original author of both plots.

b This prelate, being seized, was brought before an assembly of bishops, where it was proved, that he had forged grants, and corresponded with Chilperic, that he had represented queen Brunebaut in his letter in the blackest light, and, in one of his letters, said plainly, that, without cutting the root, there was no hopes of seeing the branch wither; and that, pretending to have full powers from Childebert, he had concluded in his name, but without his knowledge, a treaty with Chilperic for dethroning Gontran. The bishops were unwilling to condemn, and yet were unable to acquit him; they desired he might have some days given him to make his defence. At the end of that time, the bishop told them plainly, that he had nothing to say, so much as an excuse; that he had betrayed the king, abused his authority, excited all the confusion that had for many years happened amongst the Franks; and had no merit to plead, but freely confessing himself the author of all these mischiefs^e. Upon this he was degraded, and left to the king's mercy, who banished him to Straßburgh, and allowed him a handsome maintenance. As these discoveries were made by the other criminals, he would not put them to death, but deprived them of their employments, and sent them into banishment^f.

FREDEGONDE, whose maxim it was to keep Gontran continually employed, excited the count of Bretagne to seize Rennes and Nantes, tho' these towns really belonged to her son, and Gontran entered into the war only as his guardian. She assisted the count therein under-hand, in such a manner that much blood was spilt; but at length this count, whose name was Warroc, was constrained to submit, and to acknowledge himself feudatory to the son of Chilperic. While she was acting this double part, with respect to the Bretons and the king of Burgundy, she was, likewise, managing a new design against the king of Austrasia, which failed; and if the officer, intrusted with the command of Childebert's troops, had done his duty, she had paid very dearly for all her dark intrigues. For, being at Tournay, she caused three of the principal persons in the city to be murdered at a feast: upon which the people rose in a tumultuous manner, and sent to Childebert for assistance, which if it had come in time she had been taken prisoner^g. This was not her only escape; for her son falling sick, she saw herself in extreme peril: on which she had recourse, as her custom was, to acts of devotion; and, amongst the rest, prevailed upon the count de Bretagne to release the Franks, that were prisoners in her dominions, which was the clearest proof that could be of her interest and correspondence with him. The child, however, recovered, and she went to Paris to visit him. She renewed her solicitations from thence to Gontran, who kept his court at Chalons, beseeching him to perform the promise he had made her six years before, of being sponsor at her son's baptism; to which, at the request of the bishops, to whom he could refuse nothing, the good old king assented. This alarmed the court of Austrasia, and Childebert immediately dispatched ambassadors to put his uncle in mind of the engagements subsisting between them^h. Gontran reminded them of many things done by his nephew, which were not very consistent with those engagements, particularly the surprising of Soissons; which he had just reason to look upon as an invasion of that dignity, which, in virtue of his birth, and of his years, he was entitled to among the Franks; but added, at the same time, that his nephew had nothing to fear; that he meant to perform his engagements strictly; that the young prince was the son of his brother; and that he could not refuse to do for him what might be expected by any lord of his household. He assisted, therefore, at the ceremony, and gave the young prince the name of Clotaire, adding, that he wished him the wisdom, courage, and good fortune of his grandfather, whose name he bore. He afterwards entertained him at his own table, and, having made the child rich presents, and received some from him, returned to Chalons. This is the last event recorded by Gregory of Tours, the father of the French history, and, perhaps, this is the reason that we know nothing of what was done in the two last years of Gontran's life, who, some would have us believe, became a monk; but for this there is no sufficient authority. He deceased at Chalons, on the 28th of March, in the year five hundred ninety-three, when he had reigned thirty-two, and lived upwards of threescore yearsⁱ.

ⁱ Gesta Regum Francorum. FRED. CHRON.

After a troublesome reign
Childebert,
king of Austrasia, dies a young man.

CHILDEBERT, without any opposition, succeeded, pursuant to the testament of Gontran, to his dominions, which comprehended all that was then stiled Burgundy, together with the kingdom of Orleans, the best part of that of Paris, and their dependencies; but Soissons and some other places fell again under the dominion of Clotaire, to whose territories they of right belonged. How this happened, the French history nowhere informs us; but it is most likely that Fredegonde, in virtue of some intelligence she had in those places, surprized them, since we find that Childebert immediately raised an army, and entered into a war to recover them^k. The truth seems to be, that the affairs of the Franks were now entirely directed by these two queens, who mortally hated each other, and who willingly sacrificed the subjects of their respective sons, and even those sons, to the gratification of their passions. The forces of Childebert were very numerous, commanded by two generals, Gondebaud and Vintrion, whom he directed first to recover Soissons, and then to pursue Fredegonde wherever she retired, so as to deliver her into his hands alive or dead. Fredegonde little regarded this threat, tho' her forces were much inferior to the king of Austrasia's; instead, therefore, of shutting herself up in any fortrefs, she marched directly towards the enemy, and surprized them near Trouci, on the little river Delette, at no great distance from Soissons. At the beginning of the action she passed between the ranks with her son, intreated the soldiers to defend their prince, and assured them of his and her gratitude^l. The fact is in itself very extraordinary, but the historian, who thought to heighten it, by assuring us, that Clotaire was then at his mother's breast^m, has only destroyed his own credit, since the young king was then in the tenth year of his age. After a long and bloody engagement, the Austrasians were defeated, with the loss of thirty thousand men. We are not told what loss the army of Fredegonde sustained; but it must have been, in all likelihood, very great; since we find she lay quiet for two years, depending on the diversions she excited by the Bretons on one side, and the Varnes, a barbarous nation, who possessed the country about Leyden, on the other. Against the count of Bretagne Childebert sent the flower of his forces, to whom the count gave battle; in which both parties behaved with equal bravery, and with equal success; by which the two armies were so much weakened, that the war was for the present suspended. Childebert was more fortunate against the Varnes, whom he not only reduced, but extirpated; so that, from this time, they ceased to be a nation, or at least we meet with nothing more of them in history. In a short space after this victory, Childebert breathed his last, in the twenty-sixth year of his age, and the twentieth of his reign. His queen did not survive him long; and as this threw the government entirely into the hands of Brunebaut, some have charged her with poisoning them both; but as this is destitute of evidence on one side, so it is highly improbable on the other.

Fredegonde,
after establishing her son Clotaire II.
dies in peace.

THEODOBERT was declared king of Austrasia, being then in the eleventh year of his age; and Tbierri, who was in his tenth, was sent to reside at Orleans, with the title of king of Burgundy, having the bishop of Autun for his governor, and Garnier for the mayor of his palace. Brunebaut resided with her eldest grandson at Metz; notwithstanding which, she governed the kingdom of Burgundy, as appears by letters, full of compliments, written to her by pope Gregory the Great, with the most absolute powerⁿ. Fredegonde would not suffer so remarkable an event, as the death of Childebert, to pass, without taking some advantage: having, by her arts, raised some disturbances on the side of Italy, and engaged the Abares to threaten Austrasia with an invasion, she, with the best body of troops she was able to bring into the field, made herself mistress of Paris, and some other places of consequence on the Seine. Brunebaut, tho' she loved not war, could not be a tame spectator of such an action as this; and therefore directed the best part of the forces in Austrasia to begin their march for Paris. It was not the custom of Fredegonde to give her enemies time to find her; she marched without delay to meet the troops of her rival, and gave them a total defeat. What the consequences might have been of this second victory, gained by a princess of so active and so enterprising a spirit, we can only conjecture; but, in all probability, she would have pushed her good fortune, at the expence of Brunebaut at least, if not of her grandchildren, if she had not been prevented by death, when she had governed her husband and her son for near thirty years^o (I).

(I) We have already spoken of the character of Fredegonde, and, in the course of the history, of the many execrable actions of which she was guilty, at least with which she was charged. There remain, however, some things necessary to be said here. That she was a woman of strong passions, and capable, under their influence, of doing the wickedest actions, is certain, if there be any faith due to history. Amongst these, there is none that can shew her in so strong a light as the case of Pretextatus, bishop of Rouen. It has been mentioned in the text, that he married Mercoveus to Brunebaut, and that for this he was banished by Chilperic, after whose death he

- a By the death of her rival, Brunebaut seemed to have attained, not only to the height of her hopes, but of her wishes. She was undoubtedly a princess endowed with many great qualities, but these were diminished by a variety of foibles; and, as far as we can judge from history, tho' in beauty, behaviour, and conversation, she might exceed Fredegonde, yet in point of penetration, solidity of judgment, and steadiness in action, she was much inferior to her. Her conduct in Austrasia, and in the direction of Burgundy, for some time, was truly laudable; she quieted the Abares with presents; she renewed the treaty of peace with the Lombards; and seemed to have nothing so much at heart as preserving their dominions in perfect peace, till her grandchildren were of age to govern themselves^p. This may be called the right side of her administration; but there was also a wrong: she governed absolutely, raised and disgraced whom she pleased, and, instead of cultivating the genius of Theodobert, if he had any, took pains to amuse him, and none at all to instruct him. She pushed this so far, as to suffer him to marry a slave of his father's, who was young and handsome, but without parts or education. In process of time, as will be always the case where virtue and honour are not the basis of policy, her arts proved fatal to herself. The consort of Theodobert had a great deal of affability and good nature, by which she entirely gained the heart of the young king, and rendered herself a fit instrument for the ambitious nobility; who told her, she had great talents for government, and, as may be easily believed, she was quickly inclined to take their words for it. By their persuasion, she undermined the queen-dowager in Theodobert's opinion, and upon some commotions, occasioned by the death of duke Vintrion, with A. D. 599.
- b which Brunebaut was charged, she engaged the king to consent to her being banished. Upon which she withdrew into the dominions of Thierry, king of Burgundy, by whom she was very kindly received^q.

It might have been expected, that her first care would have been to have inspired her grandson, and his ministers, who were firmly attached to her, with a warm sense of the indignity that had been offered her; but, from whatever motive it arose, she pursued a quite contrary conduct. She palliated, in the best manner she was able, what had happened at Metz, and, instead of exciting jealousies or misunderstandings between the brothers, she engaged Thierry to attempt the recovery of Paris, and other places on the Seine, which had

he was restored by Gontran (3). This prelate, as he officiated at the altar on the Lord's Day, was stabbed, without any of his clergy interposing to stop the assassin. As soon as he came home, Fredegonde went to make him a visit, accompanied by several lords, and told him, how glad she should be to see the criminal apprehended. "The criminal, said the bishop, is no other than the person who has filled the whole kingdom with crimes, who has murdered kings, and shed rivers of innocent blood." The queen pretended not to understand him, but offered her physicians; which so provoked the dying bishop, that he told her, "You are yourself the person who caused me to be assassinated, who have been practised in the blackest crimes, who in this world will be universally cursed, and severely punished in the next." One of the lords who accompanied her took the liberty of saying, that such enormous crimes ought to be enquired into with all the strictness possible, and punished in the most exemplary manner. This lord did not live to return home; for the queen inviting him to take a collation with her, he was poisoned in the first morsel he eat, and died in an hour (4). Gontran sent commissioners to enquire into the bishop's murder; but she had the address to gain the nobility to declare against this as the effects of Gontran's ambition, and as an intrusion on the rights of their king (5). She caused a slave, however, to be apprehended, who actually killed the bishop, and, after chastising him severely, delivered him up to the nephew of that prelate, who caused him to be put to the torture: on which he confessed, that Fredegonde gave him an hundred shillings, that Melantius gave him fifty, and the archdeacon fifty more. This Melantius had intruded himself into the bishopric of Rouen, when Pretextatus was banished; and this very man, notwithstanding this charge, Fredegonde made bishop again in his room (6). By the way, it will not be amiss to mention, that the bishop of Baieux, as soon as he was informed of the fact, caused all the churches in Rouen to be shut up, and forbid the celebration of divine service, till such time as this fact should be enquired into, which some think is the first instance of an interdict (7). Another singular instance of her passion and appetite to vengeance occurs in her conduct towards her daughter the princess Rigunthe, who, after her return to Paris, did not lead the life of a vestal; for which being reproved by Fredegonde, she reproached her with the meanness of her birth. The mother pretending to recollect herself, told her, it was against both their interests to differ, and to expose each other; that though she had formerly given her immense wealth, most of which was lost, yet she had still something to bestow; and carrying her into her cabinet, opened a large coffer, out of which she took many rich things. At length, as if she had been weary, she bid Rigunthe go and take what she pleased. Fredegonde, seeing her head in the trunk, pulled the lid of it upon her, and had broke her neck, if, upon her struggles, some of her attendants had not come in, and rescued the princess (8). With all her vices, and with all her crimes, she was a woman of a surprising and a superior genius, bold without being rash, and shewed great firmness without obstinacy (9). At the time of her demise she was upwards of fifty; her corpse was interred in the church then stiled St. Vincent, now St. Germain des Prez, where her tomb is still preserved, with her figure in Mosaic, as the inscription says; but this is not altogether certain, since the inscription is much more modern than the picture (1).

been torn from their family on the death of their father; and procured from Reccared, king of the Visigoths, a strong body of auxiliaries. This measure was so acceptable to Theodobert, that he likewise raised a numerous army, and, having joined the king of Burgundy, they marched directly into the territories of Clotaire. That monarch, remembering his former victories, moved with his forces to give them battle^r. Their armies engaged near the village of Dormelle, in the Senonais; and perhaps history has scarce recorded an instance of such young captains; for the age of the three kings, taken together, did not exceed forty. The dispute was obstinate and bloody, but the two brothers were victors in the end, the army of Clotaire being almost entirely cut to pieces. It was with some difficulty that he retired, with the broken remains of his forces, to Melun, and from thence to Paris. He halted there but for a very short time, and, finding himself vigorously pursued, chose for his retreat the forest of Bretagne, where his grandfather Clotaire the first had withdrawn from the fury of his two brothers. His forces were so weak, and so fatigued, that he foresaw, if he was attacked in his retrenchments they must be defeated and destroyed^s. He sent, therefore, to his cousins, to demand peace; and though the terms they prescribed took from him the best part of his dominions, and left him a very precarious tenure in the rest, yet he found it necessary to submit, and remained, for some time, a quiet spectator of their endeavours to extend the dominions of the Franks on the other side of the Rhine on one frontier, and by pushing the fierce nation of Gascons on the other^t. His indignation was, however, never the less, from the want of an opportunity to let it appear. Fredegonde had taken due care of his education, and had instructed him herself in the art of government; and, particularly, advised him to command his army in person, to hear his ministers with patience, but to take his own measures, and to observe with the greatest diligence, the causes of his success, and the sources of his disappointments, recommending to him above all things a settled temper of mind, equally superior to the smiles and to the frowns of fortune.

THE conduct of Brunebaut had never been extremely regular; but this great flow of prosperity induced her to throw off all restraint, and to make use of that plenitude of power, which was now in her possession, to gratify her desires of every kind. She remembered the mistake she had made at Metz, in permitting Theodobert to marry, when he was so very young; she thought to correct this, by hindering Thierry from marrying at all; but she laid no restraint upon his pleasures; so that by several mistresses he had three natural sons, which so balanced the credit of their respective mothers, that the old queen had nothing to fear. She cast her eyes on a young nobleman, whose name was Protade, and whose disposition nearly resembled her own, with a handsome person, and all the accomplishments of a court, great address, and boundless ambition, which she endeavoured to gratify, by making him mayor of the palace; from whence the scandal of those times insinuated he was her gallant. But there was a great obstacle in the way of his preferment. Bertoalde, a man in years, of great virtue and distinguished valour, was in possession of this employment, and could not be removed^u. However, a pretence being found to send him to the frontiers, Protade performed the functions of his office in his absence. Clotaire, who had exact information of all that passed, thought he had now a favourable opportunity of surprizing Bertoalde, and of making a great impression on the kingdom of Burgundy. With this view he sent duke Landri, and with him his son prince Meroveus, tho' he was then but in the fifth year of his age, with instructions to surprize Bertoalde, who had but a small guard, and then to march directly to Orleans, where he knew there were many malecontents. Landri did all he could, and indeed all that could be expected, but succeeded in neither. Bertoalde made his escape, and threw himself into Orleans, which he gallantly defended, till his master Thierry came with a potent army to his relief^w. The war was carried on the next spring with great vigour; the king of Burgundy at length forcing Landri to a battle, near Estampes, in the beginning of which Bertoalde having discovered the intrigues of the old queen, in a fit of despair threw away his life, and at the same time opened a path to victory for his ungrateful master, which Thierry so well improved, that Landri's army was entirely beaten, the unfortunate Meroveus surrounded, and, as Clotaire believed, or affected to believe, massacred, to gratify the hatred of Brunebaut. Thierry marched on to Paris, fully bent on the destruction of his cousin, which appeared indeed inevitable; for Theodobert had invaded his dominions on the other side, and the two armies were on the very point of engaging, when the news of the battle of Estampes arrived, and produced a very wonderful effect. Theodobert became of a sudden jealous of his brother's success, and offered Clotaire such terms of peace as he readily accepted; and, being thus delivered from all fear of danger on that side, he quickly obliged the king of Burgundy to listen also to terms of accommodation; and thus, very unexpectedly, the nation of the Franks was again blessed with peace^x.

- a THIERRI, who wanted not abilities, was extremely provoked at his brother's behaviour, and furnished many things in relation to the peace at Compeigne, which had rescued Clotaire out of their hands. Brunebaut, who, tho' she had long dissembled, never forgave the insult received from Theodobert and his ministers, did not fail to heighten the king of Burgundy's resentments; and, it is said, went so far as to assure him, that Theodobert was not the son of king Childebert, but of a gardener, and imposed upon that prince to answer some particular purposes^y. The war being declared, the king took the field with a very numerous army, commanded under him by Protade, his mayor of the palace. The nobility of Burgundy in general disapproved this war highly; and when the armies drew near each other they dealt very plainly with the king, and advised him, instead of fighting, to treat with king Theodobert, since it would be an impious as well as impolitic action to shed the blood of the Franks on both sides, merely to gratify the pride of an ambitious minister, and the rage of his imperious mistress. When the king would hear nothing, the soldiers surrounded the tent where the mayor of the palace was playing at chess with the king's physician, in Thierry's presence; upon which that monarch ordered one of the lords of his court to go and pacify the troops, by assuring them that he would pay a proper respect to their remonstrances; he thought proper, however, to deliver quite another message, assuring the forces that the king did not enter into their quarrel with Protade, but left him to their disposal; on which they entered immediately, and cut him in pieces^z. Thierry saw now the necessity of a peace, which was easily concluded; and in the room of the late unhappy favourite, Claudius, who was also a Gaul by descent, and a man of abilities and honour, was raised to the post of mayor of the palace. He very honestly represented to his master, that it was time for him to reform the disorders of his court, and to make choice of some princess of equal birth for his queen, to which Thierry readily consented, and, at his persuasion, demanded the daughter of Witeric, king of the Visigoths, whom he obtained, upon condition that his ambassadors should swear that this princess should never be degraded from her dignity^a. Brunebaut, who could not prevent the marriage from being concluded, had the address to hinder it from being consummated, or even celebrated, by engaging the king's sister to give him a distaste to the Spanish princess; who, after bearing a great deal of ill usage for a full year, was sent home upon some frivolous pretence, which irritated the king of the Visigoths to the last degree. He endeavoured to negotiate a league with Clotaire, Theodobert, and the king of the Lombards; but Brunebaut, by a dextrous distribution of presents, and coining a multitude of plausible excuses, parry'd this blow, and preserved the kingdom in peace, that is with regard to other nations, for otherwise Thierry was far from enjoying quiet at home^b. His subjects in general were highly dissatisfied, and some of the clergy expostulated with him very freely. Amongst these was Didier, bishop of Vienne, who was soon after assassinated, either by the express orders of Brunebaut, or by those who thought it would be acceptable to her. The famous Irish abbot Colombanus, who had the reputation of being a saint and a prophet, was ordered to depart the kingdom, and to return to his own country, for having reproached the queen in very rude terms; and very probably had not escaped so well, if his credit with the people had not been raised to such a pitch, that the taking away his life might have occasioned public confusion^c.

f We have before observed that, in the division of Childebert's dominions, some districts were detached from the kingdom of Austrasia, and added to that of Burgundy: these Theodobert now demanded by an embassy, and Thierry prepared to defend them by force of arms. The nobility of both kingdoms were averse to a war, and constrained the two kings to consent to a conference, attended by an equal number of troops; but Theodobert, by a scandalous breach of his faith, brought double the number, and compelled his brother to accept of what terms he pleased. Instead of extinguishing, this heightened the flame, for Thierry was bent upon revenge; and his nobility conceiving that he had right on his side, concurred in his design of doing himself justice by the sword^d. One obstacle remained; Clotaire had many causes of complaint, and was not likely to let slip so fair an opportunity of mending his condition; it was therefore necessary to secure him by a negotiation, and upon a promise to restore to him what had been taken when the war should be over, he consented to a neutrality. Thierry then invaded Austrasia with a numerous army, commanded by all the great lords of Burgundy. He pushed his conquests as far as Toul, before he met with his brother Theodobert's army: but there, believing he had an advantage, the king of Austrasia attacked him with great vigour. The dispute was very obstinate, but in the end the king of Burgundy gained a complete victory; in consequence of which he became master of Metz, and compelled his brother to take shelter on the other side the Rhine^c. The place Theodobert chose for his retreat was Cologne, where he laboured to form a new army out of his German subjects; and in a short space of time he accomplished it, vast numbers of Saxons, Thuringians, and other nations, subject or tributary to his crown, repairing to his standards. Thierry also having recruited his victorious army, penetrated the forest of Arden, and encamped at Tolbiac, where Theodobert, who believed that his advantage lay in being the aggressor, endeavoured to surprize him. The forces of Thierry received those whom they stiled barbarians with great intrepidity, and having stood the first shock, broke and defeated them. Theodobert endeavoured to make his escape by passing the Rhine, but he was taken and carried to Cologne, where his brother treated him with the utmost inhumanity, and, after stripping him of all marks of sovereign dignity, sent him to his grandmother at Chalons, but caused his son Mérovée, though a child, to be put to death upon the spot; and some say another likewise, whose name was Clotaire^f. Brunebaut had no sooner Theodobert in her hands, than she ordered him to be shaved; but suspecting afterwards that he might make his escape, and believing herself secure of governing both kingdoms if they remained to Thierry, she ordered the unfortunate king of Austrasia to be put to death, who was not then above twenty-seven years of age^g.

Thierry, and the miserable fate of queen Brunebaut.

CLOTAIRE, king of Soissons, foreseeing that Thierry, proud of his late victory, and relying on the great acquisition that he had made, would infallibly refuse to comply with his promise, thought it both the surest and the wisest way to take possession of what had been consigned to him before his return from his expedition, which he accordingly did. It appeared from the event that he had formed a right judgment; for Thierry was no sooner acquainted with it, than he dispatched certain persons to summon him to withdraw his forces out of the places he had seized, and, in case he refused, to declare war. Clotaire, who expected this, was prepared; and believing it better to fight for the whole than for a part, assembled the whole forces of his dominions, and resolved to give Thierry battle^h. That monarch, who flattered himself with the hopes of becoming the lord of all France, began his march with the whole forces of Austrasia and Burgundy, but in passing by Metz he was seized with a dysentery, of which he died in a few days, in the twenty-sixth year of his age, and the seventeenth of his reignⁱ (K). Brunebaut appeared so little disconcerted by this extraordinary event, that it gave occasion to a report that her grandson was poisoned by her orders, which however is very improbable. She caused immediately Sigebert, the eldest of his four sons, to be proclaimed king. He was then in the tenth year of his age; and it seems to have been the view of that ambitious princess to have governed both kingdoms in his name: but Clotaire did not leave her so much time as to discover her plan. He had great intelligence in Austrasia and in Burgundy: he knew that the nobility in both kingdoms hated Brunebaut, and were little attached to the sons of Thierry; and therefore he advanced with his army, without giving himself much pain about the forces that Brunebaut laboured to assemble, tho' they might easily have been rendered much superior to his own^k. The infatuated Brunebaut became an accomplice in her own destruction: she suspected Garnier, who was mayor of the palace in Austrasia; but knowing he had a great interest amongst the nations on the other side of the

(K) At the time of Theodobert's death, and the destruction of his family, we are told that Thierry was so exceedingly struck with the beauty of Berthaire, that he was inclined to marry her; which alarmed his grandmother to such a degree, that she presently interposed, and represented, in the strongest terms, how much it would tarnish his reputation, if, in the sight of the world, he should be guilty of so flagrant an act of incest, and how much his person and authority might be exposed by taking to his bed the daughter of a prince whom he had deprived of his life, and of his dominions. This opposition irritated Thierry to such a degree, that he told his grandmother in a rage, that it was her ambition, and not her zeal for his reputation, that induced her to talk after this manner; since, if what she affirmed was true, that Theodobert was a supposititious child, Berthaire could not be his niece, and that she had no right to upbraid him with murders, in which she had so great a hand (1). This quarrel swelled at last so high, that he was on the point of killing her; and from hence the suspicion arose, that, having made use of him to destroy his brother, she, to secure her person and power, removed him by poison (2). In the slaughter of his family we have mentioned the escape of his son Childebert, which it seems gave infinite disquiet to Clotaire; who, as an antient writer tells us, cruelly persecuted a certain pious abbess in the city of Arles, upon a rumour that a king was privately educated in her monastery (3). It appeared from hence, that, in the sense of those times, all the children of Thierry, whatever their mothers might be, were considered as kings of the Franks: however, this unhappy young man was never afterwards discovered.

- a Rhine, she confided to him the command of the army, and the person of Sigebert; but at the same time sent an order to Alboin, who accompanied him, to dispatch Garnier as soon as he had rendered the army complete. Alboin tore this order to pieces, which some person, who observed him, gathered up; and having put it together, so as that the sense might appear, carried it to Garnier, who dissembling his knowledge of what was intended, engaged the nobility both in Austrasia and in Burgundy to abandon Brunebaut, as soon as Clotaire's army approached near them. Of Thierry's four sons, Sigebert and Corbon were put to death by Clotaire's orders: Childebert was carried away and never seen afterwards: as for Mæroveus, to whom Clotaire had been sponsor, he sent him into his own dominions, and caused him to be bred up there as a private man¹. In the end, Brunebaut herself was betrayed into his hands; and to gratify the nobility, whom she had generally provoked, after the bitterest reproaches, some that were well and others that were ill founded, he suffered her to be led for three days about the camp, and exposed to the clamours and outrages of all who could be mean enough to insult a great queen in her misery. At length she was tied by the leg and the arm to the tail of an untamed horse, which running full speed quickly dashed out her brains; after this her mangled body being taken up by some charitable person, or, as others say, by the soldiers, was consumed to ashes; but these wretched remains afterwards found a tomb, in which they remain at this day^m (L). In succeeding times some attempts have been made to vindicate her memory.
- c CLOTAIRE II. was now the absolute master of the whole empire of the Franks, and resolved to continue so. He settled the three mayors of the palace, who from this time became a sort of viceroys, and treated the nobility with much mildness and familiarity. He was not one of those refined politicians who put on the appearances of virtues, of which they have no feeling in their hearts, but thought the shortest method best; and that to become a good prince, was the most effectual means of being believed so. He established that freedom which the great lords were afraid he would suppress, but with it he established the power of the law, which he observed with great punctuality; for which reason people saw no harm in his requiring the same degree of respect should be shewn to it by othersⁿ. He might have extended his dominions, but he chose rather to govern them, and to extirpate those vices that, from the licentiousness of the times, were grown both frequent and flagrant. In order to this he held a general council at Paris, where he recommended it in a particular manner to the prelates to restore the ancient discipline of the church. He instituted also a kind of parliaments, or courts, held in his palace, for determining what in the Latin of those times was stiled placita, in French plads, and in our own language pleas^o. He carried this so far, that when the governor of the remoter part of Burgundy conspired against him, and he had him in his hands, he remitted him to the justice of that court, and by their sentence he was beheaded; and this example prevented any other conspiracy in his reign^p. He permitted the Lombards to redeem the annual tribute they paid his predecessors, by laying down the amount of three years at once, for which he is severely censured by modern writers, who think that in this he departed from his dignity; but it seems Clotaire thought the dignity of a king consisted in governing his own subjects well, and in being upon good terms with his neighbours^q.
- d THE king, in order to lessen his fatigues, sent his eldest son Dagobert to reside at Metz, with the title of king of Austrasia, detaching however from thence some districts that lay at a great distance, and some others that were requisite to a due communication between the territories
- Clotaire, sole master of the three kingdoms of the Franks, changes his conduct, and becomes a mild prince.*

Regum Francorum.

(L) If we were to take the character of Brunebaut from the epistles written to her by Gregory the Great, or even from the history of the bishop of Tours, we should suppose her a very different person from what other historians represent her. But both these Gregories died many years before her, and both had very particular reasons to speak well of her as long as they lived (4). It is true she has been defended by Mariana, as being a native of Spain, and by Cordemoy, a learned and judicious French writer; but rhetoric and conjectures will do nothing against facts. We may, and indeed we ought to agree, that those who wrote under the immediate descendents of Clotaire, might make their court by exaggerating the wickedness of this princess. We ought also to allow that she was a very extraordinary woman: she founded many monasteries, erected several churches, built many hospitals, raised prodigious causeways, and, in short, was the founder of so many other public works, that the monk Aimon expresses the utmost amazement that a single queen could perform so many and so great things in such different places; but this shews that she had boundless authority, and immense wealth at her disposal (5). The tomb of this queen Brunebaut is still to be seen in the abbey of St. Martin at Autun, which she founded, and where in 1632 it was opened, and nothing discovered that could at all discredit the general tradition on this head of what the old historians have asserted, since there were ashes, burnt bones, and the rowel of a spur, which it is known was the custom in those times to fix to the sides of the horses that were used in such executions, in order to render them the more furious (6).

His government resembled that of his father's: so that, by the mildness of it, many of the barbarous nations, that hitherto had preferred freedom in woods and morasses, voluntarily submitted themselves, and became his subjects. As soon as he arrived at a proper age, Clotaire caused him to be married; and upon that occasion entertained him in a most splendid manner at one of his country palaces, declaring at the same time, that he associated him in the government². This did not hinder the young prince from demanding, in a very peremptory manner, that all the cities and districts, formerly belonging to it, should be re-united to the kingdom of Austrasia, which highly provoked Clotaire. At length this dispute was left to the decision of twelve prelates and barons, who determined that such of the places as lay most conveniently for the young king should be yielded to him, and that he should quit all claim to the rest³. An insurrection happened among the Gascons, which was quickly suppressed, without any effusion of blood; but it was otherwise with the Saxons. Bertoalde, their duke, despising the pacific temper of the two kings, and having drawn many barbarous nations into his alliance, threw off his dependence on Dagobert, and made an irruption into Austrasia with a powerful army. The young king marched against him with all the forces that he could immediately assemble, but had the misfortune to be defeated, and very narrowly escaped being killed, his head-piece being cleft by the stroke of a sword. He retired with the remains of his forces to an entrenched camp, and sent to his father for his assistance⁴. Clotaire marched with all possible haste to join him, and immediately after advanced towards the Saxons, who were encamped on the other side the Wefer. The two armies being drawn up in order of battle, Bertoalde abused the king in the grossest language, which so provoked Clotaire, that he plunged into the river on horseback, followed by his guards and some of the principal nobility, when charging the Saxons with great fury, he killed their duke with his own hand; and having caused his head to be cut off, ordered it to be placed on the top of a pike and carried at the head of his army, the best part of which had by this time passed the river: the enemy were soon routed with prodigious slaughter⁵. He did not survive this victory many months, but lived and died in full possession of the hearts of his people, as appears from his being stiled in some antient monuments Clotaire le Grand, and in others, *le Debonnaire*⁶. On the death of Garnier, who was mayor of the palace in Burgundy, he summoned the nobility to chuse another: but having intimated his inclinations in a short speech, they waved the election, and chose to live under his immediate administration, which was the highest mark of popularity and confidence that they could bestow, and a very singular instance of his policy, who chose to obtain, in the most gentle manner, what he might have taken thro' the plenitude of his power; but he knew that an absolute monarch must reign in the minds, as well as over the bodies of his subjects⁷. He died in the forty-fifth year of his life⁸.

628. Dagobert succeeds his father in all his dominions, and becomes the fourth monarch of France.

DAGOBERT succeeded his father in the kingdoms of Neustria and Burgundy, partly thro' his intrigues, and partly thro' the terror of his army, to the prejudice of his younger brother Charibert; who, according to the custom, not to say the law, of the Franks, ought to have had at least one of these kingdoms⁹. He had indeed a small party for him: after a faint struggle Dagobert prevailed. By the advice of his ministers however, he, of his own accord, bestowed on Charibert the country between the Loire and the Pyrenees; upon which he took the title of king of Aquitaine, and fixed his residence at *Toulouse*¹⁰. Dagobert began his reign by visiting the kingdom of Burgundy, where his father had not been in person since the office of mayor of the palace had been suppressed; and where, having no superior, the nobility had ran into great excesses and disorders; the king applied himself to redressing these with all the spirit and diligence possible. He was not only accessible, but affable to all sorts of people, and borrowed from his meals, and from his sleep, time to enquire into and redress grievances¹¹. But all was not after this manner; for, on his return from this progress, he repudiated his wife, under pretence that she was barren: and having once transgressed the bounds of virtue and religion, he left them every day at a greater distance, insomuch that he was not ashamed to have three queens at a time¹². The truth is, that Arnoul, bishop of Metz, had a great influence over this monarch, who had bred him from a child, and, so long as he remained in the ministry, Dagobert retained the character of being the greatest prince that had hitherto reigned over the Franks: but Arnoul having quitted his see and his employment, for a life of solitude and retirement, Dagobert became careless and dissolute, notwithstanding all that Pepin, and the remains of the old ministry, could say to restrain him;

^a and yet, by a piece of injustice but too frequent, the people of Austrasia imputed to the ministers all the mischiefs to which they were exposed, and earnestly pressed the king to give up Pepin to their resentment; but Dagobert, thoroughly acquainted with his innocence, had both the courage and the honour to protect him. Charibert, king of Aquitaine, dying, Dagobert took possession of his dominions and of his treasures, though he left several children, who were the victims of their uncle's ambition^c: an action, in all respects, as iniquitous as it was unnatural and inexcusable.

ABOUT this time a war broke out with the numerous and potent nation of the Sclavonians; The war with who, like the Franks, were divided into several tribes, occupied a vast country, and were the Sclavonians is attended not inferior in valour to any of their neighbours^f. They had at this time for their king a with many stranger, who came amongst them at first in no higher character than that of a pedlar; his unforeseen and name was Samon; but whether a native of France or of Hainault is very uncertain. He unfoward consequences. managed his private affairs so well as to become rich; the Sclavonians judged from thence that his talents might be useful to the public; they made the trial, and they had no reason to repent it. In compliance with the custom of the country, he married twelve wives, by whom he had twenty-two sons and fifteen daughters. He was wise and brave. Dagobert had sent an ambassador to complain of some injuries that had been done to traders who were his subjects^g. This minister was very unfit for his employment. Samon expressed a concern for what had happened, and offered to concert proper measures to prevent the like for the future. The Franks took this ill, and told Samon he might think himself and his people ^c honoured, if they were considered as servants to the king his master. Samon answered, with great moderation, that they should not disdain that title, provided the king honoured them with his friendship. Friendship! replied the Frank, What friendship can there be between Christians, worshippers of the true God, and such pagan dogs as you and your subjects? Be it so, friend, said Samon; but since it is your custom to cheat, to abuse, and to insult us, you must not wonder we make use of our teeth, who are dogs, or that we bite you as often as you deserve it. Upon the representation of this accomplished minister, Dagobert, having first engaged the Allemands and the Lombards to act as his allies, began the war, in which he was very far from being successful^h. This gave him such an aversion to these barbarous people as produced an action, which did no great credit either to his religious or political principles. The ^d Bulgarians being ill-treated by the Abares, with whom they had hitherto lived united as if they had been but one people, took shelter, to the number of nine thousand, in the country of the Bavarians, who were subjects to Dagobert, and desired to put themselves under his protection. They had winter-quarters given them for the present, and a promise that lands should be assigned them; but from a jealousy, or rather timidity, unworthy of a great prince, orders were sent to the Bavarians to cut them off as they lay dispersed through their country; which was so completely executed, that not above seven hundred escaped, who threw themselves into the territories of the *Sclavonians*ⁱ. About this juncture Dagobert assisted Sisenand to mount the throne of Spain, on a promise that he should send him the famous gold basin weighing five hundred pounds, which the Roman general Aetius ^e presented to Torismond, king of the Gotbs; but he, not being able to keep his word, was obliged to compromise the matter by paying him an immense sum of money^k. The Saxons perceiving how much Dagobert was disturbed by the continual irruptions of the Sclavonians, which with all his care he could not prevent or suppress, conceived this to be a proper juncture for them to be rid of the annual tribute of five hundred head of cattle imposed upon them by Clotaire the first. The method they took was very singular; for instead of taking up arms, or joining themselves to the Sclavonians, they petitioned Dagobert to remit their tribute, in consideration of defending their frontiers against the Sclavonians, which they offered to take upon themselves, to which Dagobert readily consented; but from this time the Saxons did not either pay the tribute or defend the frontier^l. But the king ^f was so much perplexed by the depredations of one nation of Barbarians, that he had not either leisure or force to subdue the other; so that they procured by their cunning what they had attempted in vain by force of arms. It may be Dagobert acted right, and avoided an insurrection, which, in his circumstances must have given him much trouble.

At length another expedient was found, which, though it might not be very acceptable to Dagobert, he thought requisite to admit. This expedient consisted in declaring his son Sigebert, then a child of three years old, king of Austrasia. This he did, and appointed Cunibert, bishop of Cologne, to be his governor, and Adalgise, duke of the palace, which some think was a different office from that of mayor, which was still preserved to Pepin, though others believe Adalgise to have been his successor, and that the king chose rather to appoint him to that office than part with Pepin from about his person^m. We cannot pretend to a say how this expedient operated; but that it did operate is certain. It is very probable that the people of Austrasia found great inconvenience in the king's residing constantly at Paris, or some of his country palaces, a small distance from that city, and were very desirous of having a court of their own, in which, though a child bore the title of king, yet, having all the prerogatives annexed to that dignity, and the proper officers to carry them into execution, they found themselves much more at their ease; and, to preserve these advantages, acted so vigorously under their own officers on the frontiers, that they quickly cured the Sclavonians of any inclination to approach themⁿ. The same year the king had another son born, to whom he gave the name of Clovis. The rejoicings upon this occasion were scarce ended, when the prelates and nobility of the kingdoms of Neustria and Burgundy intreated Dagobert to declare him his successor in regard to those two crowns. This he accordingly did, and, by an authentic instrument, settled the manner in which all his dominions were to be divided between these two infant princes^o. The French historians differ much in their sentiments as to the reasons which induced the lords in Neustria and Burgundy to take this step; but it seems pretty evident, that the king's own conduct, at the beginning of his reign, was the source of it; his ambition inspired him with the design of making himself master of the whole monarchy, which they, judging to be prejudicial to their interests, though they could not prevent it then for want of an army and a successor, declared they resolved to avoid for the future by such a precaution. The Gascons and Bretons, presuming on the indolent temper of Dagobert, had renewed their excursions into his dominions; the former were the most troublesome, and had the greatest force. Against them, therefore, Dagobert sent a numerous army, commanded by the flower of his young nobility, under a general in years, of distinguished bravery and great reputation. He quickly reduced the Gascons to such distress, by closing up their caves and burning their cabins, that they were constrained to implore the king's clemency; which Dagobert was sure to extend, as having nothing more in view than to spend his days in quiet^p. He then sent a minister to the Bretons, a man of character, very different from him who occasioned the war with the Sclavonians; this minister was St. Eloi, originally a goldsmith, now a statesman, and afterwards bishop of Noïon. He managed his negotiation with such address, that he engaged the prince of Bretagne to renew the antient treaties, to give an hostage for the due performance of them, and for his coming in person to Paris to do homage to Dagobert. The name of this count of Bretagne was Judicaël, who had a high reputation for prudence and piety; whom the king received with kindness, and dismissed with honour. The duke of the Gascons, was forced to follow his example, and brought many of the chiefs of his little nation with him^q. These events must have been very grateful to a monarch of his disposition; but he did not long survive the satisfaction they gave him, since he died of a dysentery, on the 19th of January, in the year six hundred and thirty-eight, at Epinai, a palace of his upon the river Seine, not far from Paris, in the sixteenth year of his reign over Austrasia, in the tenth from the death of his father, and the thirty-sixth of his age (M). His corpse was carried from thence, and interred with great solemnity in the abby of St. Denis^r.

(M) It is no very easy task to settle the number and the order of this prince's wives. It is pretty plain, that, by his father's direction, Dagobert first espoused Gomatrude, the younger sister of his mother-in-law Sichilde, and the aunt of his brother Alibert; which very probably might contribute, as well as her barrenness, to his repudiating her. He had next Ragetrude, but whether as a concubine or queen may be doubted; by her, however, he had Sigebert, whom, to content the nobility of Austrasia, he placed on the throne before he was well out of the cradle (6). After this, with some extraordinary deliberation, and the consent of the nobility, he espoused Nantilde; but one can scarce, from these circumstances, conceive that she was at this time a nun, and that it was by the consent of his nobility he took her out of the cloister, which, however, is expressly said by the old historian, in these words (7): "Cum consilio Francorum, Nantildem, unam ex puellis de monasterio, in

"matrimonium accipiens, reginam sublimavit." In order to be rid of so strange an absurdity, some modern critics have suggested the reading ministerium, instead of monasterio, and then of a nun she will become only a maid of honour (8). He had besides two mistresses, whose names were Colgonde and Bertilde. Notwithstanding this, we find the piety of Dagobert magnified by the monk, who undertook to write the history of his reign, chiefly on account of his founding the monastery of St. Denis; to which it is said he was excited by a very ridiculous accident, not worth repeating; but inasmuch as he took the liberty to spoil the church of St. Hilary, of Poitiers, the bishop of that diocese, after his decease, pretended to have seen in a vision the soul of Dagobert carried by demons on board a vessel bound for their fiery regions, and cruelly beaten in his passage, till St. Denis, having taken to his assistance St. Maurice, and St. Martin, came to his relief, and delivered him

- a At the demise of this monarch the wealth of the kingdom was great, and there were few courts in Europe more splendid than that of Paris. St. Eloi, who, as we before observed, was originally a goldsmith, and made for Clotaire the second a chair of state of massy gold, and a throne of the same metal for Dagobert; but towards the close of his reign things began to decline, yet in no proportion to what they did afterwards^a. It seems that at the time of his demise there was no mayor of the palace in Burgundy; but recommending one of his ministers, whose name was Æga, to his queen Nantilde, as the properest person to direct the affairs of the young king, he was presently advanced to that important post; upon which Pepin and some other Austrasian lords returned into their own country. He summoned immediately the prelates and nobility to do homage to Clovis, which they very willingly performed; but at the same time many of them complained that they had suffered injustice in the former reign, and they hoped redress from the equity of the present government. The new minister promised to content them, and he did all that was in his power to keep his word^b. Soon after came ambassadors from Sigebert, king of Austrasia, to demand his share of his father's moveables and treasure, pursuant, as it is very likely, to that king's will. A conference was held for this purpose at Compeigne, where the bishop of Cologne and Pepin assisted; there one third of the treasures which the king had acquired since his marriage was set apart for the queen, and the remainder divided between his sons^c. This was one of the last acts of Pepin's ministry, who died soon after with the reputation of a saint. A. D. 639.

- c which was exercised in succeeding times by the mayor of the palace, and which was in some measure grounded on the behaviour of Pepin and Æga, both men of great parts, true piety, and uncorrupted probity. To the former of these succeeded his son Grimoalde, who made his way to that post by the murder of Otbo, his rival, and we may from thence be satisfied that he was no saint^d. His intention of removing Rodolfe, duke of Thuringia, from his government, produced an insurrection, in which that duke was totally beaten, and compelled to take shelter in a fortress, or intrenched camp, where he collected all the remains of his forces, with a full resolution of making an obstinate defence; but, in all probability, this would have ended in his own destruction, if a spirit of dissension had not broke out in the king of Austrasia's camp; for Grimoalde carried his master, young as he was, into the field; but those, who hated that minister, prevented his attacking Rodolfe with the whole of the army, and by this means that part of it which did attack was beaten. Upon this a negotiation ensued, which ended in a peace very dishonourable to the young king, who consented that Rodolfe should retain his government, upon his promise to be faithful for the future^e. He governed after this, if, in truth, he could be said to govern at all, fourteen years, or, as some compute, sixteen; but we know nothing of what he did in that time, except that he built and endowed monasteries, from whence he came to be reputed a saint. Grimoalde pretended that, in despair of having a son, he adopted his, and desired that he might succeed him^f. But after this, notwithstanding, he had a son, named Dagobert, by his queen Innechilde, whom on his death-bed he recommended, with great tenderness, to the care of Grimoalde, his mayor of the palace. This monarch died at Metz, and was buried in the church of St. Martin, in the suburbs of that city; from whence his remains were removed to Nancy, on the demolition of that church, when the French, in 1552, were preparing to sustain a siege, under the command of the duke De Guise^g. 640.

out of their hands (9). It is a melancholy thing to be obliged to transcribe such idle tales, but it is much more melancholy to reflect, that, for many ages together, such idle tales were regarded as serious truths; but as this was really the case, and becomes thereby the characteristic of those ages, we are from thence put under a necessity of transcribing them, since nothing else can persuade the reader, that the facts, which really compose the history of those times, could ever have happened.

in the state, if Flaochat himself had not died soon after of a fever. The nobility of Burgundy ^a did not replace him, so that both kingdoms were governed by Archambaud. This minister having presented to the king a very beautiful slave, named Batild, whom he had bought of some English merchants, the monarch became quickly so enamoured of her, that he took her to his bed, and soon after declared her his queen ^b. She must have been a very extraordinary woman, for she is highly commended by all who mention her, since, to do her honour, instead of reproaching her with the meanness of her former condition, invented a fable of her being a princess born, and since, having a large share in the government, she gave indubitable proofs of her great capacity. The only remarkable action of Clovis's life, was, his causing the silver shrines in the monastery of St. Denis to be melted, and coined into money, to purchase corn in a time of scarcity for the relief of the poor ^c. Though by his royal authority, with the consent of Landeric, bishop ^b of Paris, he exempted this convent from all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, yet the monks gave out, that, for this act of impiety, he became disordered in his senses, and that the weakness and stupidity of the father became intailed upon his descendants ^d. Modern historians have truly observed, that this lying judgment was invented, partly to deter other princes from having recourse, in times of public calamity, to the treasures of the church, and partly to make their court to the second race of French kings, who deprived the posterity of Clovis of their territories, under the plausible pretence of their being unable to govern them (N). He had by his queen three sons, Clotaire, Childeric, and Thierri. We must now return to Austrasia.

Dagobert deposed and exiled, Childebert substituted, deposed, & Childeric placed on the throne.

^c GRIMOALDE, as far as can be discovered, caused Dagobert, the son of his master Sigebert, to be proclaimed and acknowledged king; but how long he suffered him to wear that title is uncertain ^e. He had not the cruelty to put him to death; but having employed Didon, bishop of Poitiers, to shave him, he sent him to a monastery, in some of the western islands of Scotland, and then, giving out he was dead, advanced his son Childebert, under pretence of his master's adoption, to the throne; which, however, he did not long enjoy ^f. It does not appear, that the nobility had any suspicion of Dagobert's being alive; but they had no opinion of Grimoalde's setting up his son; and therefore they encouraged queen Innechilde to go to the court of king Clovis, and to demand his protection and support. This speedily produced a revolution; for Archambaud, who was himself allied to the royal line, came with an army into Austrasia, where he deposed Childebert, carried away Grimoalde prisoner to Paris, where he perished not long after, and placed his master's second son Childeric, then ^d about three years old, upon the throne ^g. It does not appear what became of Childebert; but, in all probability, his youth, and his being barely the instrument of his father's ambition, saved him from punishment. Clovis did not survive this great event any long time; he is said to have been addicted to women and to wine, and is, properly speaking, the first of those on whom the French writers have bestowed the opprobrious name of Les Rois Faineans, i. e. incapable or indolent princes; though some late writers have suspected this was rather Gesta Regum Francorum. AIMON.

(N) When it is said, as we find it in many of the French historians, that Clovis the second was the first of the stupid or indolent kings, we are to understand this of his falling, in the two last years of his life, into a state of lunacy, concerning which something has been said in the text: but in cases of this nature it is always best to derive our knowledge from original authors (1). The monk then, from whose relation all that other historians have said is borrowed, speaks thus: "This prince spent all his days in peace; but so fortune would have it, that, towards the close of his life, he came, as if it had been to pray, to the dormitory, where St. Dionysius the martyr and his fellow saints were reposed, and, being desirous to have some of their relicks with him, he commanded that the sepulchre should be opened; when looking upon the corpse of the blessed and excellent martyr and priest Dionysius, with an irreligious and covetous eye, he broke and seized upon his arm bone, and, being stupified, fell immediately into madness. But it was not on him alone that this fear and terror fell, but on those who attended him, which, the place becoming dark of a sudden, terrified them so much, that they placed all safety in flight. After some space of time, in order "to recover his senses, he gave certain lands to the convent, and, causing the bone to be richly inshrined in gold, set with precious stones, he sent it back to be deposited with the body. Some lucid intervals after this he had; but in the space of two years, without ever recovering his senses perfectly, he finished his life and reign." Later historians have referred the king's weakness of mind to his voluptuous course of life, and to his excesses in wine and women (2). But it is somewhat strange, that those, who had good sense enough to reject the judgment, should nevertheless think themselves obliged to account for the fact. It is highly probable they were both true alike, or, in plain terms, that there was not a syllable of truth in either (3). His making free with the treasures of this rich convent in a time of scarcity is not to be disputed; and though he replaced them, and was in other respects a great benefactor to the house, yet, to set aside what they esteemed so dangerous a precedent, the monks had recourse to this pious fraud, and, as it came to be afterwards countenanced from a maxim of state, we need not wonder that it gained belief (4). We shall see that this attempt having succeeded so well, tales of the like nature were invented upon other occasions, and met with the same fortune (5).

- a contrived to gratify the descendents of Pepin the short, than the real sense of the people who lived under them, and who expressed great regard for them^b.

CLOTAIRE the third was immediately declared king of Burgundy and Neustria, being about five years of age, under the tuition of his mother, queen Batilde, Ebroin being chosen mayor of the palaceⁱ. We find different and very opposite characters of this minister, since the best part of what is styled the history of France, under this period, is drawn out of the lives of certain ecclesiastics, who were reputed saints, and lived in these times. Accordingly, therefore, as these saints lived upon good or bad terms with Ebroin, his character appears in the writings of their panegyrist. This seems to be tolerably clear, that, while the queen had no other minister than him, she maintained the character of a wise and virtuous princess, governing with great reputation and tranquility, and her son had all the respect and obedience shewn that his birth and dignity required; but after she brought Leger, bishop of Autun, and Sigebrand, who was also a bishop, though history has not preserved the name of his see, into her cabinet, there was nothing but jealousy and confusion. This last prelate was not only a man of a troublesome temper, which embroiled him with Ebroin, but of a suspicious character likewise, which drew some censures upon the queen, and, in a popular insurrection, proved the cause of his being sacrificed to the public hate. That princess was so much offended at this, that she not only quitted the regency of her son's dominions, and the court, but withdrew likewise from the world, retiring into the monastery of Chelles, which she had rebuilt, and in a manner refounded, and where she passed the remainder of her life in the most irreproachable manner, universally respected and revered^k. Ebroin, now left to himself, became in reality what his enemies represent him to have been always; that is, haughty and covetous, vindictive in regard to his enemies, and oppressive with respect to the people, which excited universal discontent. While things were in this critical situation, Clotaire died, when he had reigned fourteen, and lived about nineteen years^l. Upon this, Ebroin caused Thierry, who, being a child at the breast when his father died, had no provision made for him, to be proclaimed king. The nobility and the people, considering his tender age, and conceiving there would be no alteration in the government, rose up immediately in arms, plundered the palace, seized the wealth of Ebroin, who retired to a monastery to save his life; and, not content with this, caused Thierry likewise to be thrust into a convent and shaved; who it was not so much as pretended had given the least cause of complaint^m.

CHILDERIC, king of Austrasia, being called to the throne, in this time of confusion, very readily accepted it; and, coming to take possession of his new dominions at Paris, some of the nobility presented his brother Thierry to him. The king seeing him in the habit of a private man, and with his locks shorn, shewed great tenderness and concern, and asked him, what he could do for him to comfort him in his distress? Thierry answered, "that he left his cause entirely in the hands of God, who, in due time, would avenge him of those who had thus insulted him without the least provocationⁿ." The king ordered him the best apartments in the monastery of St. Denis, with liberal appointments for his support. The nobility, as soon as the ferment was a little ceased, held a kind of general assembly, in which they recommended various things to their new king; such as, that he would restore vigour to the laws, oblige the governors of provinces, and other ministers, to act according to them, and that for the future he would not repose his entire confidence upon any single minister. Childeric, desirous of peace, and of enjoying his pleasures, promised them whatever they asked^o. But, notwithstanding this, Wulfoade, who had been mayor of the palace in Austrasia, continued to act in that capacity in all the three kingdoms; but it must be owned his master did not rely entirely upon him; Leger, bishop of Autun, who had been his mother's minister, and the principal author of this revolt, had a great share in his esteem. He was a man of a singular character; for, with great piety and incorruptible probity, he was opinionative and very narrow. He treated the king as if he had been his scholar; which in a little time disgusted him, and that to such a degree, that suspecting, or pretending to suspect, him of treasonable practices, he caused him to be apprehended, and sent him to the monastery of Luxeuil, to pass the rest of his days in retreat^p. It was to this very convent that Ebroin had retired, and their misfortunes having extinguished, or at least suspended, their hatred, they became in appearance very good friends, and took their measures together how to get once more abroad; for, having been so long used to courts, neither of them could digest the austerities or the privacies of a convent. In the mean time Childeric was employed in paving the way to his own destruction. He was naturally light and inconstant, and being young, without experience, and without the assistance of wise ministers, gave a loose to his passions: considering whatever contradicted them as an act of disobedience, though founded in reason and respect to the laws, he became at first wanton and wilful, and in the end cruel. This excited general discontent; and the Franks were not in these days silent when displeased^a. Bodillon, a man of quality, having represented some grievances to this prince pretty freely, when he happened to be in an ill humour, Childeric ordered his guards to lay him flat on the floor, and beat him severely; which they performed. Bodillon, who was very brave, and had many friends, assembled them as soon as he was able, surprised the king while he was hunting near one of his country palaces, and, after reproaching him bitterly, thrust him through with his sword. It had been well if his vengeance had stopped here; but proceeding to the palace, with those who had perpetrated this murder, he there killed the unfortunate queen Blitide, or Bilichilde, then pregnant and near her time, and the innocent prince Dagobert, then in his infancy; but another young prince, afterwards named Daniel, escaped this massacre, and came in process of time to wear his father's crown^b. There never was certainly a country in a more wretched and deplorable condition than France at this time, without king, without magistrate, without law, a wild and bloody anarchy prevailing. Others, imitating the example of Bodillon, and being, or believing themselves, injured, armed their friends and dependents, and wreaked their resentments without mercy; or gratified their avarice and their hate, almost without giving themselves the trouble of covering them with specious pretences^c. Such were the consequences of this extravagant and extrajudicial stroke of private justice.

Sigebert restored to his father's dominions, which, however, he enjoyed but a few years.

WULFOADE, mayor of the palace, thought himself so little in safety, that he retired with what friends he had into Austrasia, in hopes of restoring some form of government to that kingdom, and perhaps of assembling, by degrees, a strength sufficient to put an end to these disorders. Some think that with this view he proclaimed Dagobert the second, son to king Sigebert, and who was returned out of Scotland, with Wilfrid, afterwards archbishop of York, king of that part of Austrasia which lay on the other side the Rhine^d. It seems more probable to others that he found him already king; Childeric, who had a great respect for his mother Innechilde, having consented that he should enjoy that part of his father's country^e. But, taking advantage of these confusions, it is allowed that he extended his territories, and recovered at length the best part, if not at all, of his father's kingdom; which he enjoyed, however, but a few years, being treacherously killed as he was hunting, together, as some writers say, with his son Sigebert, by the remnant of the inveterate faction of Grimoalde, who in the end extirminated the whole race of Clovis. The bodies of Dagobert and Sigebert were interred at Stenai, where the former was invoked as a saint^f.

Thierry is proclaimed king, and is compelled to receive Ebroin for his mayor of the palace.

A. D. 673.

In a short time after his brother's death, Thierry, quitting the monastery of St. Denis, where he had lived as a private man, but not as a monk, went to Nogent on the Seine, now called St. Cloud, and, being attended there by many of the nobility, declared Leudesie, the son of Erchinoald, mayor of the palace. The bishop of Autun, who, with Ebroin, had quitted his monastery and resumed his episcopal function, quickly joined the king, and was very graciously received, though he had been the principal author of that revolt which occasioned his deposition^g. Thierry himself, as appears by authentic charters, considered this only as resuming the government, and not as inheriting the regal dignity from his brother Childeric. But the hopes that had been conceived of Ebroin's submitting were quickly dissipated. He drew together his old friends, and chiefly such as had suffered for him, and to these he added such of the banditti of all parties as thought it inconsistent with their interests, as well as repugnant to their inclinations, to submit to any government. His party being become very strong, he drove the king, through fear, from place to place, though he did not pretend to question his title; but insisted that he ought to be replaced in his employment^h. He pushed his dissimulation so far as to invite Leudesie, who then held it, to a conference; to which the latter, sincerely desirous of restoring peace, willingly consented; but in his way thither was assassinated. This raised so general and so just an aversion to Ebroin, that he saw it would be more difficult for him than ever to succeed in his design; upon which, retiring into Austrasia, he set up an unknown youth, upon whom he bestowed the name of Clovis, and the quality of son of Clotaire, which gained him so great an accession of strength, more especially as he affirmed that Thierry was dead, that he became more formidable than everⁱ. The first use he made of his power was to send a strong body of forces, under the command of some lords as wicked as himself, and two bishops, who had been deposed for a variety of crimes, to invest Autun; where, to preserve the city, the bishop, who was the object of his venge-

a ance, surrendered himself into their hands ; and they, by his directions, put out his eyes, and would have left him to starve, if the duke of Champagne, out of pure humanity, had not relieved him^a.

It might have been imagined, that the miserable situation of the bishop of Autun would have satiated the malice of Ebroin, and that the king's accepting him in quality of mayor of the palace, to which he was compelled, and which, in effect, was receiving him for his master, might have gratified his ambition^b. Ebroin, however, was not either appeased or content. He published a general amnesty, that he might fix his own power upon the firmest basis; and, when he had brought things into tolerable order, he made no scruple of declaring, that, notwithstanding this amnesty, there were two points, into which, for the safety of the state, it was absolutely necessary to enquire; the first was the deposition of Thierri, and the second the murder of Childeric. By this contrivance there were none left innocent, whom he had a mind to consider in another light. The bishop of Autun and his brother were charged with procuring the death of Childeric; the former had his lips and part of his tongue cut off, the latter was stoned. Two years after the bishop, upon a new accusation, was condemned, degraded, and put to death^c. Others, who had provoked him, felt the weight of Ebroin's resentment in as high a degree, the king, who was no less in his power than his subjects, not daring to interpose. We need not wonder, therefore, that the nobility of Austrasia, though rent into faction amongst themselves, were universally disposed to hinder Ebroin from extending his power into that country; to prevent which they set up two rich and potent men, who were cousins, and bestowed on them the title of dukes of Austrasia. The names of these two dukes were Martin and Pepin; the former had the greater interest, but the latter was the abler man^d. Ebroin, who had a numerous and well-disciplined army, marched against them as if they had been rebels to Thierri, which they really were not. He had the good fortune to defeat them in battle, and afterwards besieged Martin in the city of Laon; where, having prevailed upon him to surrender that place, upon a promise of safety made by the bishops of Paris and Rheims, he was no sooner master of it than he caused him to be beheaded^e. Pepin in the mean time had recruited his forces, and, having chosen a strong camp, resolved to defend himself there to the last extremity. The mayor of the palace was preparing to attack him, when he fell by the hand of an enemy whom he did not suspect. Ermenfroi, who was steward of the king's household, had been guilty of oppressions, for which Ebroin had caused him to be deeply fined. This man had a resentment quick as his own, and, having engaged some of his friends to assist him, they attacked the mayor of the palace as he was going to his devotions on a Sunday morning, and dispatched him with their knives, being without other arms to prevent suspicion; after which they fled to the camp of Pepin, who very readily granted them his protection^f. Upon this foundation some have supposed him to be the author of the murder.

THE nobility elected Waraton to succeed him as mayor of the palace, by which they put into his hands the supreme direction of affairs in the kingdoms of Neustria and Burgundy. He was a man of a mild and peaceable disposition, and who seemed to have been raised to that eminent employment rather out of respect to his quality than his talents. He carried on the war against Pepin timorously and tardily, which provoked his son Gislemar to supplant him in a post for which he was much fitter^g. He pressed the Austrasians exceedingly, and in all probability had determined the war in his own favour at last, if not in his master's, had not death interposed and removed him at a very critical conjuncture. He was succeeded by his brother-in-law Bertaire, a man of a haughty and haughty disposition, who treated the nobility with such disrespect, that some of them retired into Austrasia, and many more began to enter into intrigues with Pepin, whom they sought to draw into Neustria, assuring him that they had much rather see him at the head of their councils and armies than Bertaire, who had treated them so unworthily. Pepin proceeded slowly and cautiously, and, before he would invade either Neustria or Burgundy, sent deputies to intreat Thierri to restore the exiles, that had retired to him, to their posts and patrimonies, and to redress certain grievances that were highly detrimental to the nation in general. This was rejected with great contempt; upon which Pepin advanced towards the frontiers with his forces. Thierri, and his mayor of the palace, marched with a numerous army to meet them in the Vermandois; they engaged, and though the royal army behaved well, and disputed the victory for many hours, yet in the end they were beaten. The king fled to Paris, and Bertaire much farther; but, being much embarrassed with his treasures, his own soldiers conspired against him, murdered him, and shared his wealth amongst them^h. This put an end to the dispute, and delivered into the hands of Pepin both the king and his kingdom.

king barely the title and assumes absolutely the sovereignty of the Franks.

It is requisite to say something more particularly of this great man, who had himself the power, and whose grandson assumed the title of king, of France. He is commonly called Pepin d'Heristal, from a palace of his on the Meuse, about three miles above Liege, where there is now a town of the same name. He is sometimes denominated, from the figure of his person, Pepin le Gros, or Pepin the Fat. We find him sometimes stiled Pepin le Vieux, or Pepin the Old, in, opposition to his grandson Pepin the Short; and sometimes Pepin le Jeune, or Pepin the Young, to distinguish him from Pepin de Landen, who was mayor of the palace to Sigebert II. This Pepin d'Heristal was, in all respects, one of the greatest men that age produced, extremely brave in his person, affable in his manner, easy of access, mild in his discourse, very ambitious, and withal modest and moderate in appearance: in short, a great captain, a consummate statesman, and, which was more than either, so prudent in every thing he did and said, that he seldom lost a friend, and never created an enemy¹. He received Thierry as if he had intended to be the most humble and the most dutiful of his servants: he paid him all the respect possible, and took all the care he could to hide his chains from himself and the public. Whenever it was necessary for him to appear, he appeared in state. A chariot, drawn by oxen, rolled him along the street, surrounded by guards, partly for pomp, partly for security, but chiefly to prevent any from approaching him. He gave audience to ambassadors, he received homage from tributary princes, and was present at all public solemnities, with a pageantry that at once pleased and deceived the people. The rest of his time he spent at some country palace, where he had a good table, kept his great officers, and a competent number of domestics, but he was not troubled with affairs^k. Pepin bestowed the commands in the army, distributed provinces, appointed dukes and counts, and in short sustained all the fatigues of sovereignty, though he was so humble as to content himself with the title of duke and prince of the Franks. Here in fact ended the empire of Clovis. Pepin d'Heristal might with propriety enough be said to put an end to the Merovingian race, since from this time they lost all authority, and were, in reality, not more than breathing shadows, and phantoms of royalty, which, except their hair and their robes, had nothing in them of kings. But whatever became of the family, we must do him the justice to say, that he preserved the empire of Clovis, which otherwise must have crumbled to pieces through its own weight, and the incapacity of those who should have supported it^l.

Pepin brings public affairs into order, and is highly respected by sovereign powers.

At his entrance on the administration, Pepin applied himself vigorously to correct the faults of his predecessors, and to bring all things into order: but he began very wisely with popular measures; he recalled such as were exiled; he restored many to their employments, and many more to their patrimonies; he heard grievances patiently, and redressed them willingly; he shewed profound respect to the clergy, but constrained them to maintain an exact discipline; he brought the finances into good order, and obliged the dukes and counts to govern the people according to the laws, and to be obedient to them themselves. He received the assemblies at the beginning of March, at which the prelates, as well as the nobility, were present; where laws were made and repealed, and where the state of the empire, in all respects, was strictly and punctually examined^m. In these assemblies Thierry was always present, seated on a throne, and surrounded by his officers; all proceedings being in his name, and all grants said to issue through his favour. This sudden and extraordinary alteration rendered Pepin so famous, that not only the Sclavonians and the Huns, but the king of the Lombards, also the Greek emperor Justinian II. and even the Saracens, sent their ambassadors to the court of France, where they made their presents, and paid their respects to Thierry, and saw with astonishment the plainness and simplicity of Pepin's appearance, who took all the pains imaginable to hide from the public that love of power, which, notwithstanding, occupied his whole thoughts. Thierry survived this change about three years, and then died, under forty years of age, leaving by his wife Clotilda two sons, Clovis and *Childebert*ⁿ.

Clovis III.
bears the title
of king.

On the demise of Thierry, Pepin proclaimed his eldest son Clovis III. then about ten years old, without taking any notice of the younger, as, perhaps, not caring to have the trouble of two sons. This young prince bore the regal title about four years; during which space Pepin was employed in humbling the Frisons, and other barbarous nations, who, disdaining to be the tributaries of the mayor of the palace, thought to have shaken off the yoke of the Franks, with the same ease that he had done his master; in which, however, they found themselves extremely mistaken^o. After the demise of Clovis, his brother Childebert was saluted king, and led the same inactive life his father had done, while Pepin humbled the Allemands and the Bavarians, and other nations, which rendered him highly respected. His care of the public did not hinder his being very assiduous in providing for his family: he had by his first wife Plectrude two sons; Drogon, whom he made duke of Burgundy, and

- a Grimoalde, who was mayor of the palace to Childebert^p. Being divorced from her, he married Alpaide, and had by her two sons also; Charles surnamed Martel, and Childebrand: but Plectrude being restored to his favour, they were not raised to any great post during the life of their father. As for Drogon, duke of Burgundy, he was of a warm and active disposition; brave, liberal, and magnificent; but he died in the flower of his age, and, as some say, not without issue. Grimoalde was of quite another character, mild, humane, pious, but without a man of great parts and prudence, which rendered him the favourite of his father, who depended upon him for the support of his house. Childebert II. dying, after a reign of seventeen years, his son Dagobert II. was declared king, and Grimoalde mayor of the palace: he acted, however, intirely under his father's orders, and obeyed him with all the exactness possible^q. His power, and his good fortune, could not defend him from the effects of age and infirmities. In the third year of Dagobert's reign, he had a dangerous fit of sickness at Jütil, not far from Heristal: as it was believed he could not recover, the enemies of his family resolved to take this opportunity of destroying it, and with this view entered into a conspiracy against Grimoalde, who, in other respects, had no ways deserved it; and Rengaire, who was at the head of this plot, stabbed him as he was at prayers in the church of St. Lambert at Liège^r. Pepin recovered, and revenged himself with great severity on all who were embarked in that conspiracy; and, to shew his great power, as well as his warm affection for his son, he appointed his only child Theudoalde mayor of the palace, though he was then but six years old. This was one of the last acts of his life, for he died not long after, in the twenty-eighth year of his administration^s.
- b PLECTRUDE, in quality of tutorefs to her grandson, assumed the direction of affairs, and had the honour to be at the head of such a government, as scarce any history can shew the like; a woman and a child presuming to rule three kingdoms, while the king was alive and in full health^t! It would have been surprising if she could have carried on this government; and yet it cannot be said to have failed through her imprudence. She was apprehensive of some trouble from her son-in-law Charles Martel; to prevent which, she caused him to be imprisoned; she secured the treasure of her deceased husband; and she spared no pains in caressing the nobility whom Pepin had intrusted with the principal employments. She quickly found that this was to little purpose; the remains of that faction, which had opposed her husband, took up arms to rescue, as they gave out, Dagobert from his confinement. Plectrude had recourse to the Austrasians, who, out of affection to the family of Pepin, raised a formidable army; which, however, was beaten by that of Dagobert and Rainfroi, whom the nobility had elected mayor of the palace^u. Theudoalde was with difficulty saved, and died not long after; so that the vast structure which Pepin had erected, was in great danger of being overthrown, and the old constitution restored. It was, however, preserved by an accident; for, in the midst of this confusion, Charles Martel made his escape, and going into Austrasia, was, without hesitation, received there as duke, and quickly collected a good body of troops out of the army that had been defeated. As for Plectrude, she had still a strong party, which enabled her to retire to Cologne, with the treasures of her husband. Dagobert resolved to pursue her thither, and was on the point of undertaking that expedition, when, very fortunately for the family of Pepin, he was removed by death, in the fifth year of his reign, having an only son Thierry, surnamed from the place of his birth Thierry of Chelles, at the breast^v. This accident threw the mayor of the palace Rainfroi, and the nobility of Neustria, into great disorder; they wanted a king for their own security, who had some degree of capacity and courage; and, therefore, setting aside Thierry, they drew out of a convent Daniel, the son of Childeric II. though a clerk, and having bestowed on him the name of Chilperic, they advanced him to the throne^w. In spite of his education and misfortunes, this young king shewed a spirit suitable to his birth^x; and putting himself, with the mayor of the palace, at the head of his army, prosecuted the design of his predecessor, and marched directly into Austrasia^y. He at the same time entered into a negotiation with the duke of the Frisons, who speedily assembled a great army, and with it marched directly towards Cologne. Charles Martel found himself between two armies, and his forces much inferior to either; he ventured, notwithstanding, to give battle to the Frisons, over whom he gained no advantage^z. This check put it out of his power to prevent the junction of their forces with those of Chilperic, who thereupon laid siege to Cologne. Plectrude had a strong garrison, and seemed disposed to make an obstinate defence; but, however, she offered the king and his allies a very large sum of money if they would raise the siege. In all probability this tempted the Frisons, and the king found himself under a necessity of complying with his allies. However it happened, the proposition was accepted, the money received, and the siege raised ^b. The Frisons thereupon retired into their own country; and the king, finding it difficult to subsist his army, was obliged to retreat. Charles Martel, dividing his forces into several bodies, harassed the king's army continually, and, in the forest of Arden, entering the camp by surprise, cut off a great number: this raised his reputation highly, more especially as he treated his prisoners kindly, and dismissed them without ransom. It also revived the spirits of the Austrasians; so that, in a short time, he found himself at the head of a very numerous army, and in a condition of acting offensively against his enemies ^c.

THE virtues of Pepin were inherited by Charles; he knew perfectly how to improve good fortune, as well as how to support the want of it. He marched his forces towards Cambray, ^b where Chilperic and the mayor of his palace had established their head quarters; but being arrived between Arras and that city, he did not immediately give the king battle, but, on the contrary, entered into a negotiation, declaring, that he sought no more than to be restored to what his father possessed, and that those who had suffered with him might likewise share in this change of fortune, which was immediately rejected. By this measure he convinced his troops that he had a proper concern for their safety: he persuaded them that right was on their side, and that, without victory, they were not to expect either safety or justice ^d. This had a proper effect; his troops attacked those of the king's with spirit, and continued the engagement with such resolution, that they gained a complete victory, on Sunday the 19th of March, according to the best computations; after which he ravaged all the country as far as Paris, and then returned with his victorious army into Austrasia. His view in taking this step was to reduce Cologne, and get thereby into his hands the treasures of his father Pepin, which he accomplished without much difficulty; for having persuaded Plectrude to admit him into the city, a sedition presently ensued, which put him in possession, and her in his power ^e. He used his fortune in this case with great moderation; but perceiving that Chilperic would not listen to any terms, and that the people of Austrasia were desirous of a king, he took the same step that Ebroin had done in like circumstances, and set up Clotaire, a prince very probably of the royal blood; but how or from whom descended no history informs us. Chilperic, and Rainfroi the mayor of his palace, saw clearly that nothing now was to be expected but from arms, and therefore they had recourse to Eudes, duke of Aquitaine, who, in the course ^d of these troubles, had made himself master of all that the Franks had possessed on the other side the Loire, and promised him, if he would assist them with his forces against the Austrasians, to acknowledge his right to the provinces he had seized ^f. It may be that Eudes little regarded this sanction, since he was very well able to defend against them what he had acquired; but it was his interest as well as theirs to lessen the power of Charles, who might, some time or other, endeavour to recover this country to the Franks: he embraced therefore the offer that was made him, and with a very numerous army joined that of the king. They had scarce time to deliberate on the properest method for carrying on the war; since Charles Martel, who had now the means of augmenting and maintaining an army, was advanced as far as Soissons, and seemed disposed to find them out, if they did not march to find him. If they had taken ^e this step immediately, possibly things might have succeeded better; but this unexpected march of the Austrasians visibly disconcerted them: while they endeavoured to delay coming to an action, their forces dwindled and disbanded, and being rather driven than defeated by Charles, Rainfroi marched one way, and the king and the duke of Aquitaine another ^e. Chilperic carried with him his treasures, and persuaded Eudes to augment his army, that they might again try their fortune in the field; but Charles demanded the king and his treasures, and promised the duke, if they were delivered up, his friendship, and the peaceable possession of all that he now held. Eudes, intirely guided by his own interest, and having no reason to expect greater advantages from supporting any longer the side he had taken, accepted these terms, and delivered up Chilperic and his treasures ^f.

The civil war ended, and the death of Chilperic after an uneasy reign.

THE reception offered the king by Charles Martel, was as honourable and as kind as his circumstances would permit: Clotaire dying about this time, he caused him to be acknowledged in Austrasia; and, as it appears from charters and other authentic instruments, he was owned for the sovereign of all the dominions of the Franks. Rainfroi was not so easily reduced; he had an interest amongst the nobility; they saw clearly that his cause was theirs; and that, if he was once reduced, as they had nothing to hope from the favour, so their safety must depend upon the clemency, of the victor. Charles took the same method to put an end to this war, that he had done with regard to the former ¹. He pushed Rainfroi vigorously, till he had shut him up in Aungier, where he offered him the county of Anjou, with the

- a strongest assurance of his enjoying it peaceably, which Rainfroi readily accepted; and the terms, thus settled, were very honourably maintained on both sides^k. Charles was equally successful in reducing those who had thrown off the yoke of the Franks: he beat the Suevians by sea, the Frisons by land; twice he defeated the Allemands, and gained no less than five victories over the Saxons, so much the more acceptable to him, as they were purchased at a small expence of blood. His prudence in taking his measures, and his promptness in the execution of them, were the principal causes of his constant victories; which, while he was pursuing, Chilperic, who had a deep sense of his misfortunes, died, after a short as well as a restless and unhappy reign. The critics in French history have very justly excluded the name of this monarch from the list of the Faineans, as he was personally present in three battles, and upon all other occasions gave incontestable proofs of his activity and address; so that there seemed to be nothing wanting to render him a great prince, but a little better fortune, or less courage or capacity in his competitors^l.

A.D. 725.

- Thierry of Chelles* was brought out of the convent upon this occasion, and proclaimed king Thierry IV. of Austrasia, as well as Neustria and Burgundy: he is usually stiled Thierry III. but with greater propriety Thierry IV. and, at the time of his accession, could not be above seven years old at most. His name was all that was of any use to Charles, and that indeed stood him in great stead. He was always in arms, and always in the cause of the king of the Franks; the dukes, and the counts, who controverted his orders, he considered as rebels to the king; the barbarous nations that did not pay their tribute, were the enemies of the Franks. Thus he never wanted specious pretences for perpetual expeditions, which kept up a numerous army, without being either a burthen or a terror to his own subjects; for the vanquished always bore the expence of the war, the bounds of the empire were continually enlarged, the clergy were constantly sent into the new conquests, and large grants to the church were to him equivalent to garrisons, in which he followed the maxims of his father Pepin; and whether his actions were good law or ill, they had always a fair colour, which, with full coffers and veteran troops, secured his fame and fortune^m: but the quality which, of all others, contributed most to his greatness, was his sagacity in foreseeing, and his activity in taking his measures. In consequence of his foresight, Eudes, duke of Aquitaine, who had the same faculty in a great degree, had more than once infringed the treaty he made with him, and had an intention of proceeding further, if fortune had favoured him; but Charles had ever his army at hand to check him, and, by ravaging his country in revenge, obliged him to renew the peace he had brokenⁿ. That prince might, however, some time or other, have created him much uneasiness, had he not had his hands full with another, no less potent enemy, the Moors, who were masters of Spain. He was continually embarrassed with them for several years together, being sometimes in war, sometimes in league with their chiefs, one of whom he tempted to revolt, by giving him his daughter; but he being defeated and slain, the duke of Aquitaine found himself in a very distressed condition^o. Abderaman, governor of Spain for the Khalif, meditated not only the punishment of Eudes, and the conquest of his country, but to penetrate into the heart of France, and to establish there the enormous swarms of Moors, who were continually transporting themselves from Africa. Eudes penetrating his design from the prodigious army he understood was forming, and knowing how unable he was to defend himself and his country from such an inundation of Infidels, applied himself, though unwillingly, to the duke and prince of the Franks. Charles readily promised him his assistance; and, having long before expected such an invitation, had his troops in perfect readiness, contrary to his usual custom, and had brought into the field many thousands of his subjects from beyond the Rhine^p.

- ABDERAMAN* broke like a torrent into Aquitaine, with an army so numerous, that, in attempting to define it, some historians have rendered their accounts incredible. Duke Eudes was so little in a condition to resist, that all the forces he could raise served only to form a flying camp, and this was all that Charles expected^q. The Moors wasted all the country as they proceeded, took and destroyed the great towns, and seemed to place the hopes of their possession in leaving no places of strength, to which, when they recovered from their consternation, the inhabitants might retire. Charles marched with his army to meet them, but slowly, and in good order^r. Between Tours and Poitier the armies came in sight, and spent seven days in skirmishes; at length they came to a decisive battle, in which the troops from beyond the Rhine did wonders; their gigantic size in comparison of the Moors, and the weight of their battle-axes, ballanced the inequality of numbers. Abderaman behaved like a great captain, and his forces defended themselves with great intrepidity; the Christians fought with much bravery and spirit; but though they killed multitudes, the Infidels did not break or give way. At length, a multitude appeared flying, and a great cloud of smoke and dust rose behind the army of the Moors, the duke of Aquitaine had broke into their camp, slaughtered a their women, children, and servants, and set fire to their tents: this determined the fate of the day, and obliged the Moors to retreat as fast as they were able. Charles did not prosecute his victory, which seems to be a clear proof that his loss was much greater than those historians make it, who say this victory did not cost him above fifteen hundred men¹. The next year the Infidels made another attempt on Aquitaine, to no purpose; but they had better fortune in Provence, which was betrayed into their hands by its governor. This drew Charles into those parts with a numerous army, with which he made himself master of *Avignon*². He soon transferred the war into Languedoc, and gained another great victory over the Saracens, but he was not able to make himself master of Narbonne: he had, perhaps, carried the success of his arms farther, but that he was obliged to attend particularly to domestic concerns. b He granted the duchy of Aquitaine to Hunald, the son of Eudes, but upon express condition of being his vassal, without mention of the king, and Thierry dying about this time, he made no haste to declare a successor. He beat the Frisons, and killed their duke with his own hands: he dissipated more than one conspiracy, made a league with the Lombards, and undertook to act as a mediator between them and pope Gregory III. who made choice of him for his protector, sent him the keys of the tomb of St. Peter, offered to shake off his dependence on the Greek emperor, and to proclaim Charles consul of *Rome*³. These propositions pleased him extremely; but, while this great affair was in agitation, all the great persons interested therein were removed by death, the emperor Leo on the 18th of June, Charles Martel on the 22d of A. D. 741. October (O), and the pope on the 28th of *November*⁴. c

Carloman and Pepin succeed their father, and the interregnum continues.

THE singular fortune which had attended Charles Martel through his whole life, and which had accompanied him to his grave, seemed to be consigned by him to his family. In an assembly of the nobles, held a little before his death, he assigned Austrasia to his eldest son Carloman; Neustria and Burgundy to his second son Pepin, surnamed le Bref, or the Short, because he was short in stature, though very strong and well made. These were the children of his first wife⁵. His second survived him, and to her son Gripon, or Griffon, he assigned

(O) As the second race of the French kings are stiled Carlovingians, in the opinion of many writers, from this Charles Martel, we will in this note give a succinct account of his family and descendents. The most ancient writers rise no higher than his great grandfather Arnold, or Arnoul, steward of the household to the kings of Austrasia, and who had three sons by his wife Doda, before he became an ecclesiastic and bishop of Metz (3). His second son Anchisus, Anchises, or Ansigius, held the same post his father did, under Sigebert, king of Austrasia, espoused Bega the daughter of Pepin of Landen, and the sister of Grimoalde, by whom he was the father of Pepin of Heristal. This Anchises was killed as he was hunting by one Godwin, who was his enemy, about the year 674: his name being the same with that of the father of Aeneas, gave the flatterers of this house an opportunity to suggest they were descended from the Trojans. Pepin, as we have shewn in the text, was, by his second wife, the father of Charles Martel, who was born about the year 691, received the surname of Martel, as some say, upon the defeat of the Moors at Poitiers. Martel signifies a hammer (4). He received from his father the ambitious maxims of his family, which he transmitted to his sons, after having in vain tried the expedient of an interregnum, in hopes of weaning the people from their affection to the family of Clovis. The name of his first wife was Rotrude, by whom he had four sons and three daughters: Carloman, duke of Austrasia, afterwards a monk, who died at Vienne in 747, leaving several children behind him, the eldest of which was a son named Dreux; but, together with the rest, thrust into convents, and never heard of more: Pepin, who assumed the title of king of France: Bernard, who had several children, viz. Adelard, count of the palace, and afterwards abbot of Corbie, who will be mentioned hereafter; Walla, esteemed the wisest man of his time, who succeeded his brother in the same abbey; Bertier, who was also a monk; Gondrade, and Theodrade, both nuns. The fourth son of Charles Martel was Ferom, who, by his wife Ercsfende, became the father of three sons; viz. Oduin, who died without posterity; Fulrad, abbot of St. Quentin; Folquin, bishop of Terouane; Landrade, who espoused Sigran, count of Hesbui; Al-dane, who married Theodoric, count of Toulouse; and Hildetrude, who became the wife of Odilon, duke of Bavaria. By Sonnechilde, or Suanechilde, Charles Martel had Griffon, of whom enough has been said in the history; he had also a bastard son, Remy, who was bishop of Rouen (5). The character of this Charles is well expressed in the inscription upon his tomb. He chose rather to command kings than to be one; yet, in some of the old chronicles, we find the year of his reign mentioned: but this proves nothing, since that phrase had a different sense in those times (6). We have yet something more to say of this great man. He had made free with the treasures of the church to defend France, and indeed all Christendom, against the Saracens; the monks were pleased to give out that he was damned. The tale was probably whispered in secret very near his time; but the clergy were so fond of it, that we find the bishops of two provinces, in a letter addressed to Levis, king of Germany, Anno Domini 858, telling him with great solemnity, that Eucher, bishop of Orleans, after the death of Charles Martel, had his condition revealed to him, and that, at his request, Boniface, bishop of Metz, and Fulrade, bishop of St. Denis, and chaplain to king Pepin, caused his tomb to be opened, in which they found only a monstrous dragon, which presently disappeared, leaving behind a great cloud of smoke (7). It is true, that Charles Martel banished this Eucher and his family, so that he was as fit a man as any upon whom to fix this tale; but it happened unluckily for the credit of the story, that this prelate died some years before Charles Martel, and so could not possibly be the author of it, as is supposed.

a only some lands in the heart of France, with which he was so much offended, that he presently raised an insurrection, and shut up himself and his mother in the city of Laon. Carloman and Pepin followed him there with an army, invested the place, and pushed the siege with such vigour, that Griffon was obliged to surrender at discretion; upon which they sent his mother to a convent, and him to a castle in the forest of Arden^r. This troublesome business over, the two brothers concerted together the proper measures for settling the empire of the Franks, took such precautions, with regard to the tributary nations and the duke of Aquitaine, as rendered some attempts they made to throw off their dependence ineffectual, and acted on all occasions with such a perfect understanding, and so entire a confidence in each other, as filled their contemporaries with admiration, and prevented their power from suffering the smallest b diminution^z.

WHEN the state of things would permit, Carloman went into Austrasia, that he might attend more assiduously to his own concerns. Pepin perceiving that there wanted something more than his own authority to contain the nobility, in two large kingdoms, within some order, resolved of his own accord to proclaim Childeric, the son of Thierri of Chelles, king, which he accordingly did. His brother Carloman did not concur in this measure, or acknowledge Childeric; not that there was any dispute or disagreement between the two brothers, but because Carloman looked upon Austrasia as a sovereignty, in some measure become hereditary in his family; and having the good fortune to establish this opinion among the inhabitants, it was never afterwards called in question^a. It was in this quality of duke and sovereign of Austrasia, that he called the council of Estines; the ruins of which town are still to be seen near Binche in Hainault, where, by the advice and with the assent of his clergy, he regulated many abuses, and in the preface to these canons he speaks absolutely in the stile of a sovereign. But, notwithstanding this flow of good fortune, the two brothers found themselves very quickly obliged to vindicate their title, such as it was, by their arms. Sonnechilde, their mother-in-law, who was nearly related to Odilon, duke of the Bavarians, had drawn to their party their sister Hiltrude, by negotiating for her a marriage with that prince; and though they were so lucky as to thrust Sonnechilde into a convent, and her son Griffon into a prison, yet Hiltrude found means to escape, and friends who conducted her into Bavaria, where Odilon espoused her; and knowing that this would be attended with a war, formed a confederacy for his own support, which it required all the force the two brothers could raise to combat^b. Odilon very well knew that his neighbours were as little disposed to submit to Carloman as himself; and therefore he represented to Theodobald, duke of the Allemands, and Theodoric, duke of the Saxons, that if ever there was a time favourable to their desire of rendering themselves independent, it was at this juncture, by the means of a strict alliance: he likewise drew the duke of Aquitaine to concur in this scheme, and to engage to pass the Loire with a potent army, as soon as Carloman and Pepin should bend their march towards Germany^c. The brothers had some suspicion of this; but the army assembled by the confederates in Germany was, notwithstanding, so great, that they found it requisite to march in person against them, with the whole power of the Franks, and trust the repressing and punishment of the duke of Aquitaine, in case he executed the engagements he had taken, to the next campaign^d.

THE confederates having drawn together a very numerous and gallant army, took post behind the Lech, and acted entirely on the defensive. Carloman and Pepin encamped on the other side of the river, and spent some days in attempting to provoke the confederates to pass, but without effect: the three dukes knew, that if, by covering their country, the Franks were obliged to retire, they should not only carry their point, but have a fair opportunity of ruining their forces in a long retreat: but, while the Franks seemed to be employed in skirmishing and insulting the Bavarians, they with great secrecy caused the river to be sounded, and found that it was fordable at some distance, both above and below the camp of the confederates. At the close of the evening the Franks, after making the usual signals, and lighting fires in all their quarters, decamped without noise, and Carloman marching up the river with his troops, and Pepin following the course of the stream, both passed it without opposition, and both were before the camp of the confederates, almost at the same instant, and when they were least expected. Odilon, and the two dukes his confederates, made a gallant defence for near five hours; but, at length, the camp was forced on both sides with great slaughter; the duke of the Bavarians retired with the small remains of his forces, and took shelter behind the inn. The Franks ravaged and plundered the country for fifty-two days: Carloman, with a strong detachment, entered the country of the Saxons, and made their duke Theodoric prisoner. The close of the campaign, and the war, brought all these dukes to renew their homage, and to promise the most exact obedience^e. There was not time left to chastise Hunald, duke of Aquitaine, who, in discharge of the promise he had made to the confederates, passed the a Loire, destroyed all the country with fire and sword, and made himself master of Chartres, which, upon the approach of the Franks, he abandoned, after burning the best part of the city, and the magnificent cathedral, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, to ashes^f. Pepin, the next year, entered with a numerous army into his dominions, where they lived at discretion, till the duke, in pity to his subjects, and to extricate himself out of so unlucky an affair, submitted to the hard terms that were prescribed; and swore once again, in the most solemn terms, to remain a faithful vassal; on account of which, and of the cruelties committed at Chartres, he thought fit to resign his dominions to his son, and retire into a convent, there to pass the remainder of his days in acts of penitence, as a private man, for the wickedness and folly of which he had been guilty in his public character^g.

Carloman, after reducing the revolted German nations, retires, of his own accord, to a convent.

A. D. 746.

THE two next years were spent by both brothers in various expeditions against the Saxons, and other German nations, whom interest and inclination led to revolt, as soon as the army that had reduced them was withdrawn: in these excursions they were generally successful: Carloman was so fortunate as to make Theodoric, duke of the Saxons, prisoner a second time, whom he treated with lenity, and, having exacted a fresh oath of obedience, restored him to his liberty. It appears, from the whole series of his actions, that he was a prince of great courage, and of equal capacity; but withal, he was a prince of strict morals, great sweetness of temper, and sincere piety: he saw every day things that displeased him; and that greatness and power, which had so many charms for others, were necessarily attended with so many acts of severity and injustice, as absolutely disgusted him. He had formed a design of quitting the world, and had communicated it to his brother; but Pepin, in dissuading him from the immediate execution, imagined, perhaps, that this humour, like a fit of melancholy, would be dissipated by time, and a variety of events. It happened quite otherwise; Carloman was of a serious, not a splenetic disposition; time and experience served only to confirm him in his resolution^h. Some modern writers think Pepin did not take any exorbitant pains to divert his brother from a purpose that was to put him in possession of a monarchy; but of this there is no great probability, and for it there is no authority at all. He left a son Dragon, and perhaps some other children, who, it is said, were shut up in convents by their uncle; but this point is somewhat obscureⁱ: all we know of the matter, with certainty, is, that Carloman went to Rome, with an equipage suitable to his birth and dignity, made great presents d on the behalf of Pepin, as well as himself, to the pope; at length being shaved, and having taken the clerical habit, built a monastery upon mount Soracte, at the distance of some leagues from Rome: but the resort of French lords, and other men of quality thither, incommoded him so much, and interfered to such a degree with his design, that he left this convent also, and retired to mount Cassin, where, in the famous benedictine abbey, then governed by Optatus, he spent the remainder of his days in privacy and quiet, yet not without maintaining a correspondence with his brother, and despising the practice of austerities, dictated only by a childish superstition^k.

Griffon, tho' kindly treated by his brother, revolts, and engages the Germans to join him.

PEPIN was now in possession of all; but, notwithstanding what some have suggested, it does not appear from his actions that the acquisition of his dominions consoled him for the e loss of his brother. For, immediately after the retreat of Carloman, he took Griffon out of prison, lodged him in his own palace, gave him a great many counties, and a considerable revenue; and, supposing that time and his misfortunes might have cured him of his wild and headstrong disposition, he treated him with all the kindness and confidence possible. Some time after this, he held at Duren, a place between Aix la Chapelle and Cologne, a kind of council, in which he made several civil and religious regulations, particularly in regard to the necessary provisions for men destitute of necessary subsistence, for widows and for orphans, for the repairing and rebuilding churches destroyed in the wars, and for establishing tribunals for the administration of justice throughout his dominions^l. But, while he was thus employed, Griffon was very far from being idle. If his brother Carloman was disgusted with sovereignty, f this was not at all his case, and therefore he took under-hand all the measures possible to succeed him. Having drawn many of the nobility to his interest, and resolving to place himself at the head of those who had ever been the enemies of his family, he secretly quitted his brother's palace, and retired to Theodoric, duke of the Saxons, who received him with open arms, and revolted, for the third time, in his behalf. His first exploits were some incursions into Thuringia; but Pepin did not give him much time, for he advanced speedily with an army towards the country of the Saxons, notwithstanding the forces of Theodoric were more numerous^m. The great inequality of numbers made his conduct appear the effects of resentment, or of rashness. It was not long before it took another colour; the Slavonians, whom in the

- a war of Bavaria he had treated with great generosity, fell upon the Saxons with an army of one hundred thousand men. Pepin charged them at the same time, and Theodoric being a third time taken, he was not inclined to trust him any more, so that we hear nothing of him from this time. The miserable people implored mercy upon any terms; Pepin extended his compassion towards them, upon condition that they became Christians. Griffon having given shelter to the flying Saxons, chose a strong camp, and fortified it. Pepin advanced towards him; but, when they were upon the point of engaging, Griffon sent to make him some propositions, to which Pepin answered, that if he would lay down his arms and return to him, he would, notwithstanding all that was passed, receive him as his brother, and retired with his forces, that he might have leisure to reflect upon his offer^a. The true design of Griffon was only to gain time; he began to distrust the Saxons, and was desirous of quitting their country. It was not long before he did it, in a manner that revived his ambition and his hopes, but which, at the same time, did no great honour to his reputation^b.

- ODILON, duke of Bavaria, dying, left behind him an infant son Tassilon, by Hiltrude, the sister of Pepin, and the half-sister of Griffon. This princess, who had been always secretly in his interest, offered him a retreat in her dominions, which he accepted; and being quickly joined by a strong body of malecontent Franks, he seized his sister and her son, and caused himself to be proclaimed duke of Bavaria^c. He was, however, so apprehensive of Pepin's obliging him to desist from this usurpation, that he applied himself to pope Zachary, to the abbot Optatus, and to his brother Carloman, to intreat their interposition in his favour. They did accordingly interpose their good offices, but they signified little; Pepin was inexorable: he said, it was one thing to forgive injuries done to himself, and another to indulge an intruder, who had despoiled a widow and an orphan. He took, therefore, proper measures, in the first place, to prevent any trouble or disturbance in the kingdom during his absence, and then marched with a potent army into Bavaria; where, without listening to any propositions, he pushed Griffon from post to post, till at length, having dissipated his troops, he took him and the chief persons of his party prisoners. He restored his nephew Tassilon to the duchy, under the tuition of his mother, and he brought his brother Griffon along with him into France^d: he did not so much as reproach him with any thing that was passed; he only advised him not to make any further trials of his patience for the time to come: he explained to him the interests of their family; he shewed him that those who solicited him to these revolts would be the first to ruin him, when he had answered their purpose; and, that he might have no temptation to enter into fresh cabals, he gave him the town of Mans for his residence, with twelve counties for the maintenance of his household, and the title of duke. All this had no effect, he began instantly to cabal again; and knowing that the German nations were so thoroughly humbled that they durst not stir, he addressed himself to the duke of Aquitaine, and the only enemy his brother had, and therefore the only person he chose for his friend. We shall see in the next section what was the event of this new conspiracy^e.

- THE empire of the Franks was now so firmly established, the tributary nations so effectually humbled, the neighbouring states so little in a condition to disturb this strong and spreading power, that Pepin grew weary of the inferior titles of mayor of the palace, and duke and prince of the Franks, and therefore resolved to execute the design which his ancestor, of the same name, had formed. Having no farther use for the unfortunate Childeric, who had hitherto worn the empty title of monarch of the Franks, but with less pomp and much less respect than was shewn to any of his predecessors, he determined to lay him intirely aside, and put an end to the race of Merovingian princes, who, for a series of years, had been mere phantoms or idols of royalty, rather than kings^f. To resolve and to execute in this case was for him equally easy, as costing him no other trouble than what it might give his conscience: the measures he took to effect this design, and to quiet his mind after it was effected, will appear in the next section, in which we are to treat of the reign of this prince, who was the first of the second race of the kings of the Franks, having given the reader the best account in our power of Clovis and his descendents, which was the proper business of this.

On the death of Odilon, duke of Bavaria, Griffon usurps the duchy from his nephew.

The reign of Pepin le Bref, or the Short, in whom began the second race.

Pepin le Bref ascends the throne, and the remaining princes of the male line are shut up.

WHEN Pepin formed the design of seating himself on the throne of France, he had all the advantages possible, and at the same time scarce any thing to obstruct him. He was in the very flower of his age, the dignity considered to which he aspired, being in his thirty-eighth year: he had the bishops and clergy at his devotion, to whom he had been a great benefactor, and had amply repaired those injuries, which they pretended to have received from his father Charles Martel: most of the counts and dukes throughout the kingdom owed their preferments to him and his family: his gracious and affable behaviour had rendered him very acceptable to the people, who, on the other hand, were taught to contemn and despise king Childeric as a weak paralytic creature, infirm alike in mind and in body^a. There is, therefore, nothing more easy, more natural, or more probable, than the simple and short account given in the old chronicle, that, in the annual assembly of the great men, in the month of March, it was proposed to remove Childeric, and to place Pepin on the throne; which, being unanimously resolved, was with little ceremony performed^b. The common account is better digested and more plausible. We are told, that the predecessor of Pepin had always entertained a fair correspondence with the popes; that he had himself practised the same policy, with the same view; that, by permitting the bishops of Rome to exercise authority in the dominion of the Franks, the way was prepared to gain an entire submission to that authority, when, in so capital a point as this, it should be exercised in his favour. It is also affirmed, that Burcard, bishop of Wirtzburg, and Fulrade, abbot of St. Denis, were sent ambassadors to pope Zachary at Rome, to lay before him the state of affairs in France, and to intreat him to decide whether the regal dignity should remain in one so little capable to execute it, or whether it should be transferred to another, upon whom the welfare of the state had so long depended, and who was capable of adding lustre to the crown he received from his personal merit^c. It is added, that, to give the greater weight to these arguments, it was hinted to the pope how effectually he might be supported against the Lombards, and released from all dependence on the Greek emperors, if he paid a proper regard to this representation. Upon this, it is supposed, he declared it lawful to exclude one prince, and to set up another; and that this might be done in a manner the most satisfactory that could be to the people, St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz, the pope's legate, performed the ceremony of his inauguration at Saissons: some, forgetting that of Clovis, say, that this was the first solemn coronation, with unction, that was ever seen in France; and that Pepin was particularly pleased to have this ceremony compared to the anointing of David by Samuel upon the rejecting of Saul^d.

Objections to the history of his inauguration by Boniface, arch-bishop of Mentz.

BUT to the whole of this story there are some very strong objections. Such as, that the ancient chronicles are equally silent as to the concurrence of the pope, and as to this solemn coronation; that the pupil of this saint Boniface (who, by the way, was an English monk, and, till by command of the pope he assumed the name of Boniface, was called Winfrid), was an entire stranger to this transaction; and that, long after the supposed sanction and coronation, Pepin's conscience was uneasy till his scruples were cured by another pope. But, whatever uncertainty there may be as to the means, there was none at all as to the fact^e. Childeric, after having his hair cut off, was conducted to the monastery of Sithieu, in the diocese of Tero-venne, now the abbey of St. Bertin at St. Omers. There he was received as a monk by the abbot Nantbaire, and breathed his last in this place about three or four years afterwards; his consort Geslie was likewise put into a convent; and their son Ethierri, being shaved, passed the remainder of his days in the monastery of Fontenelle, or, as it is now stilled, Vandrille, in Normandy^f. Thus, in a few years, and without any sensible commotion, this great change was made.

Pepin reduces the Saxons, his brother Griffon is killed, and he humbles the Bretons and others.

THE same vigilance and activity which Pepin had found requisite in acquiring the crown, became no less necessary to keep it. The Saxons, notwithstanding all they had suffered, were again in arms; against whom Pepin marched with an army, chastised them very severely, and augmented their annual tribute. At his return from this war he had an account of the death of his brother Griffon; in relating which, however, authors are not well agreed. Pepin sent a herald to demand him from the duke of Aquitaine, and that duke absolutely refusing to deliver him up, he remained some time at his court; but conceiving, as some say, a suspicion, that, if he should be once attacked, the duke would make his own peace at his expence, or

- a else flattering himself with hopes of being better supported by Astolphus, king of the Lombards, he endeavoured to withdraw himself, and to retire into Italy; but finding the pass of Maurienne guarded by a corps of troops commanded by Theodon, count of Vienne, and Frederick, governor of Burgogne Transjurane, or the further Burgundy, he boldly attacked him with a handful of forces he had with him, in which action all the three chiefs fell^g. Others allege, that, falling in love with the duke of Aquitaine's wife, who was one of the handsomest women of that age, the duke became so jealous of him, that Griffon found it requisite, for his own safety, to retire into Italy, and was, by that prince's order, assassinated in his passage. Be that as it would, it was a great piece of good fortune to Pepin, who lost in this brother the most bitter and determined enemy he ever had, and who, as long as he lived, would never
- b have desisted from giving him trouble. The Bretons having made some incursions during Pepin's absence, he made an incursion into their country, and forced the count to purchase peace by renewing his homage^h. This raised his reputation so high, that a noble Goth, whose name was Ansimonde, and who, having seized the towns of Nîmes, Magalonne, Agde, and Béziers, had gallantly defended them against the Moors, demanded of his own accord the protection of Pepin, and became his vassal. This opened a passage for the Franks into the country which the Goths formerly held, and which was now possessed by the Infidels, and gave Pepin an opportunity of investing Narbonne; the siege of which his father had been forced to raise. He found it so strong, and so well defended, that he was forced to turn his siege into a blockade, and, after it had lasted three years, it was rendered into his hands: an acquisition
- c equally valuable in its nature, and honourable in the world's opinionⁱ.

- AN affair of greater consequence now demanded the king's attention. The popes had long thought themselves in a distressed and precarious condition, and Stephen the third looked upon his case to be desperate. On one side, Astolphus, king of the Lombards, had made himself master of the exarchate of Ravenna, and almost all that the Greek emperors held in Italy, insisted upon being acknowledged king at Rome, and threatened the city with a siege if the pope did not comply^k. On the other hand, the emperor Constantine Copronymus, treading in the footsteps of his predecessor, was zealous in the support of the Iconoclasts, or image-breakers, whom the pope treated as heretics, and from whom, therefore, he could expect but little assistance. In this critical conjuncture, he first desired to have a safe conduct given
- d him to come to Pavia to treat with Astolphus, and when he found him not to be moved by presents, prayers, or tears, he demanded leave to retire into France. In this demand he was seconded by the French ambassador, so that Astolphus, though very unwilling, was obliged to consent, and the pope accordingly proceeded in his journey^l. On his arrival Pepin paid him all possible respect, lodged him in the abbey of St. Denis, and took all the care imaginable of him during a long sickness. In return, the pontiff shewed himself ready to gratify him in whatever he could desire, and particularly absolved him for the breach of his oath to his master Childeric: he also crowned him in the church of St. Denis, together with his queen Bertrade, bestowing at the same time the regal unction upon his sons Charles and Carloman; adding to all this, the title of Romanorum Patricius, for him and each of his sons, which was
- e to be interpreted, declaring them patrons or protectors of the Roman people; an honour of which the pope sufficiently availed himself^m.

- THE king of the Lombards, who very easily saw what all this would end in, sent for Optatus, abbot of Mount Cassin, and for Carloman, to whom, having represented the mischievous consequences that would attend a war in Italy, he compelled the abbot to enjoin Carloman to go with all possible speed to his brother's court, to dissuade Pepin from coming to extremities. Carloman obeyed his abbot, went into France, and, as a certain historian says, pleaded so zealously for his client, that he equally offended the king and the pope, inasmuch that the former, at the persuasion of the latter, put his children into convents, and shaved them; which, with other ill usage, had such an effect upon the mind of that virtuous and honest prince, that he did not long survive itⁿ. His discourse, however, made such an impression upon the French lords, that they were by no means inclined to enter into the war, but insisted that ambassadors should be sent to Astolphus, to try whether this dispute might not be adjusted. He made great concessions; but the pope would not be satisfied, and at length so wrought upon the nobility, by his intreaties, that the war was resolved. Pepin conducted the pope, with an army, back into Italy, and, having forced the pass of Maurienne, besieged Astolphus in Pavia, and obliged him not only to renounce all pretensions to the sovereignty of Rome, but also to relinquish the exarchate of Ravenna, and all his conquests; for the due performance of which treaty, in all its points, he took the king's oath, and that of his principal nobility^o. Being thus master of Ravenna, he bestowed it as a free gift, if the French historians may be credited, on the pope and his successors, and at the same time sent the pontif to Rome, under the escorte of a considerable body of troops, commanded by his natural brother Jerom. How generous soever Pepin's intentions might be, or how grateful soever the pope might seem for this benefit, yet he had a secret reserved right, by which he dispensed with the notion of accepting this, in the light of a donation^p. The exarchate of Ravenna had belonged to the emperor Constantine Copronymus, whom he considered as a heretic; in that light he ceased to have any right to hold it, and, as the spoil of a heretic, it belonged to the church. This singular and extraordinary right could not be defeated either by the conquest of the king of the Lombards, or by the taking it from him by the king of the Franks; so that the bounty of Pepin, in the pope's sense, was only putting him in possession of a thing to which he had a just title, and which had been with-held from him by force. If the pope had his reserves, Astolphus had likewise his second thoughts, which were, that he had paid too high a price for raising the siege, and, therefore, as soon as the Franks were retired, he refused to comply with the treaty, or to part with a single town of his conquests; the pope, as soon as he was informed of this, dispatched abbot Fulrade to carry his complaints, and to demand fresh assistance from king Pepin^q.

ASTOLPHUS had foreseen the step the pope would take, and, therefore, to complete his scheme, invested Rome in the month of January, demanding of the inhabitants to have the pope delivered into his hands; in which case he promised to do him no hurt, threatening otherwise to demolish the city, and to put them to the sword. The people, having so recent an example of the king's preferring his interest to his engagements, rejected the proposition, and prepared to make a vigorous defence. Astolphus destroyed all their country, palaces, and ruined every thing in the neighbourhood of Rome; which served only to provoke them, and distress his own troops. These acts of severity took from the Romans all thoughts of safety but from a brave defence; which, with the help of the French officers, was so well conducted, that Astolphus was still before Rome when he heard the news that Pepin had repassed the Alps, had invested Pavia, and that, in short, he was on the point of losing his capital, and perhaps his dominions^r. He was constrained, therefore, to make peace a second time, upon terms infinitely worse than those to which he submitted before. Besides abandoning Ravenna and all his conquests, with the addition of Comacchio, he was constrained to pay a large sum of money, under the title of the expences of the war, and to submit to the revival of the old tribute, which had been relinquished by Clotaire the second. The peace being made, Pepin made a tour to Rome, where he was received with great pomp; but finding that his stay gave great uneasiness to the Greeks, and was not very acceptable to the pope, he quickly left the city, having renewed and confirmed his donation. Having obliged Astolphus to perform the treaty in every respect, he sent the keys of Ravenna and the rest of the cities, by the abbot Fulrade, who was his chancellor, to Rome; who offered them on the tomb of St. Peter, in answer, as it may be supposed, to the letter which the pope transmitted to him during the siege, and which was penned in the name of that apostle^s. In all probability things might have once more changed their face, if Astolphus had not fallen from his horse, as he was hunting, and broke his neck. This produced great confusion; for he had mounted the throne upon the abdication of his brother Rachis, who of his own accord, retired to the monastery of Mount Cassin, and lived there with duke Carloman. The throne being now vacant, most of the nobility invited him to reascend it; while, on the other hand, Didier, general of Astolphus's forces, was very desirous of exchanging his sword for a scepter^t. The thing was difficult; he had not so much as the colour of a title; but, to supply this defect, he had recourse to the pope, and began with fulfilling the late treaty to the utmost; next he made a present of the city of Bologna and its district; and lastly he promised the most profound obedience for himself and his successors. Upon this, the pope represented to Rachis, that his endeavour to resume the crown was a wicked and sacrilegious attempt; which his piety induced him to believe; so that, retiring back again to his convent, he left the kingdom to Didier, and the pope in possession of the places he had dismembered from it, with some other advantages arising from his sanction afforded to this settlement^u.

After his return the king settles the interior government of his realm, and regulates other affairs.

- a the assembly of this year, Tassilon, Pepin's nephew, and duke of Bavaria, did homage for his dominions; and the king of the Sclavonians, of his own accord, demanded the protection of Pepin, and did the like. The Greek emperor sent his ambassadors, to represent the injustice that had been done him, in giving the pope the exarchate of Ravenna and other districts in Italy, and at the same time made him very magnificent presents; amongst which was the first organ ever seen in France, and which was given by the king to the church of Compiègne. The next year died the pope; and his brother Paul, being chosen his successor, sent to intreat king Pepin to continue to him his protection; which the king very kindly promised, and very punctually kept his word^x. The following year the Saxons made a general revolt, which constrained the king to turn the forces of his dominions on that side; which gave the
- b Lombards an opportunity of disturbing the pope, and endeavouring, in conjunction with the Greek emperor, to recover all the places that had been yielded to the see of Rome; but Pepin, returning victorious, and having constrained the Saxons, not only to submit, but to add likewise to their former tribute three hundred horse, which were to be presented annually in the assembly held in the month of May, had leisure to look abroad, and to give the pope that protection, of which he stood in great need. He sent for this purpose his ambassadors to Pavia, to declare to king Didier, that, if he did not immediately put all things on the foot of the treaty made when he was last in Italy, he would return thither with an army, and regulate them in such a manner as should put it out of his power to create any farther disturbances. Didier was constrained to submit, and to promise all that was demanded; but with
- c a full intention not to keep his word, in case any opportunity offered of breaking it with impunity, which he attempted; but, for the present, without effect. A more promising occasion presented itself not long after, which he did not neglect^y.

- GAIFRE*, Vaifar, duke of Aquitaine, regarded the prosperity of Pepin with an envious eye, and, on the other hand, that monarch wanted only a fair opportunity to despoil him of his dominions. This disposition in both rendered them perpetually restless and uneasy. Vaifar spoiled some churches of their lands, the bishops of which had put themselves under the protection of France. Pepin demanded restitution by his ambassadors; and, the negotiation proceeding but slowly, he passed the Loire with an army, obliged him to promise what he demanded, and to give hostages for the performance of what he promised^z. The
- d next year, when Pepin was at a great distance, regulating affairs in his German dominions, the duke of Aquitaine sent an army to Burgundy, where they ravaged the country as far as Chalons; and, having burned the suburbs of that city, returned loaded with booty. Pepin was, by no means, of a humour to endure such an insult; he returned, therefore, with all possible expedition, passed the Loire with his army, ravaged all the country as far as Limoges; and, that it might remain in defenceless condition, razed all the castles in Auvergne^a. The next year he passed the Loire for the third time, laid siege to Bourges, and, having made himself master of it after a long defence, repaired, and placed in it a good garrison. He pushed things so far this campaign, that Remistain, uncle to duke Vaifar, believing the ruin of his nephew to be inevitable, submitted to the king, and was extremely well received.
- e The spring following, Pepin assembled a numerous army at Nevers; with which he passed the Loire, wasting all the country before him with fire and sword, under a full persuasion, that, before the end of the summer, he should drive the duke out of his dominions: and it is highly probable this would have happened, if an unforeseen accident had not, for the present, entirely changed the face of affairs^b. An accident, springing from his prosperity, which amazed and alarmed all his neighbours.

- TASSILON*, duke of Bavaria, his nephew, had remained at his court from the time he did him homage, and had even attended him in some of these expeditions; but, about the time of the rendezvous at Nevers, he feigned an indisposition, and, while his uncle was in the field, retired, with all possible speed and secrecy, into his own dominions; where he acted as an independent prince, married a daughter of the king of the Lombards, and discovered plainly, that he did not incline to be a tame spectator of the destruction of the duke of Aquitaine. Pepin, upon the first intelligence of his nephew's retreat, repassed the Loire, leaving behind him many flagrant proofs of his indignation against both dukes, and of his desire to make them feel the full weight of his resentment^c. He was, however, far from departing, even in these circumstances, from the character which he had established for prudence; he determined to chastise these princes, but he would not take any such violent measures as, in their consequences at least, might chastise his subjects and himself. He augmented the fortifications and the garrison of Bourges; he repaired several other places on the frontiers, and filled them with troops. By this disposition he covered his own country, while that of his enemy was exposed to continual incursions. He reckoned himself, therefore, secure on ^a this side, and, for the two succeeding years, held the annual assemblies in May, in the city of Worms; having always about him such an army, as obliged the duke of the Bavarians to respect the king of France, though he had visibly disregarded him as his uncle. Tassilon was a young prince of parts and of discernment; he had a mind to be independent, and he was jealous of the power of Pepin; he was sensible of his displeasure; but, as things stood, he saw it was not his interest to push farther, by committing hostilities ^d. Pepin had his reasons likewise for keeping on the defensive; he was endeavouring to detach the king of the Lombards from his alliance with the Greek emperor; and he had another negotiation on the carpet with that emperor, who had his ambassadors at his court, labouring to persuade him not to hinder his recovering Ravenna, and at the same time proposing a marriage between prince Leo and ^b the princess Geslie, daughter to Pepin. As to the first, he answered plainly, that he had conquered Ravenna from the Lombards, that he had given it to the see of Rome, and that he would maintain the pope in his possession. As to the latter, he raised difficulties from the emperor's attachment to the Iconoclasts. To which the ambassadors answered, that they admired his zeal for religion; but that, if he caused this dispute to be examined to the bottom, he would find that the emperor was also zealous for the christian faith, and did not deserve to be stiled a heretic for his endeavours to remove what had a manifest tendency to idolatry ^c.

In the mean time the duke of Aquitaine, perceiving how much he was distressed by this new manner of making war, and that Pepin was preparing to pass the Loire again with a numerous army, had recourse to a very singular and strange expedient. He dismantled most ^c of the great towns that were nearest the enemy, fortified a few of the strongest places he had; and, assembling a great army, resolved to try, what he had not yet done, his fortune in the field. Pepin having passed the Loire, began to repair and fortify the places which the duke had demolished; to prevent which Vaisar advanced directly towards him with his forces, and gave him battle ^f. He had the misfortune to be totally defeated; and this had such an effect upon his spirits, that he sent to desire peace, almost upon any terms that the victor should prescribe. Pepin paid little regard to his proposition, pursued his own scheme of restoring the dismantled towns, and receiving into his protection all who submitted. His nephew, the duke of Bavaria, who had exact intelligence of his uncle's proceedings, thought it high time to make his own peace, and not run the hazard of being treated as the duke ^d of Aquitaine was, when he should be undone. The king made no difficulty of accepting his submission; which, indeed, was all that he wanted, and was, with good reason, well pleased with obtaining all the effects of victory, without so much as running the hazard of a war ^e.

To give some content to the Greek emperor Constantine Copronymus, and that his own proceedings might appear the more impartial, Pepin ordered a general assembly of the bishops to be held at Gentilli, a royal villa about a league from Paris; where the great point of images being lawful or unlawful in churches was solemnly discussed. But what, or, indeed, whether any, resolution was taken does not appear ^b. This assembly seems to have been held about Christmas; and soon after, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, the king ^e made his sixth expedition into Aquitaine, where he reduced Thoulouse, and all the adjacent country. He kept the feast of Easter at Vienne; and, the summer being very hot, put his army into quarters of cantonment. At length, in the month of August, after having held another assembly of the nobility at Bourges, he ordered his forces to take the field, and advance towards the Garonne; where they gradually forced all the fortified posts, and at length pushed their conquests as far as the Upper Auvergne ⁱ. In the course of this campaign, Remistain, who had been so well received by the king, returned again to his nephew; and, to make an atonement for his desertion, as well as to convince his countrymen that he was in earnest in this new change, he acted against the French with cruelty as well as vigour, and instructed the Gascons how to make their incursions. As the length of this ruinous war had ^f scarce left the possibility of subsistence in a settled condition, the country swarmed with men ready to undertake any thing that might preserve them from perishing; and, at the head of these, Remistain performed some considerable exploits ^k. But Pepin, equally piqued at the depredations he made, and at his ingratitude, not only dispatched several parties to repress him and his associates, but also gave express directions, that, if possible, they should seize his person; which, at length, they did; and, having brought him into Pepin's presence, he, after reproaching him severely, ordered him to be hanged ^l. We have related this matter more particularly; because those, who charge Pepin with cruelty, insist chiefly on this instance ^m; in which, however, there might be as much of policy as of severity, for reasons which will presently appear.

^k EGINARD,

- a PEPIN, seeing all things prepared to his mind, and having no reason to doubt the success of his schemes, marched with a numerous army, the next summer, to the banks of the river Garonne, fully determined to put an end to the war, by a judicious and vigorous exertion of the superiority he had in his hands. The people and the nobility, equally terrified and amazed, sent deputies to intreat his clemency towards those, who were no longer able to resist him. The king offered to take them immediately into his protection, upon their submission, and taking an oath of obedience. They willingly accepted these conditions: upon which the mother, the sister, and the niece, of Vaisar, came in, and were presented to Pepin, who received them kindly. Eoric, who had married another sister of the duke's, surrendered likewise, and met with the like treatmentⁿ. It now appeared plainly, that Pepin had in view the entire and absolute conquest of Aquitaine, which drove the unfortunate duke to despair. He retired, with a small body of determined men, into Saintonge, there to sell their lives and liberty as dear as possible; the smallness of his forces leaving him scarce a chance for victory, and the situation of the country taking from him all hopes of escape^o. About this time the ambassadors, who had been sent to the khalif, returned; but what was the nature or the end of their negotiation does not appear^p. At Rome, a layman having seated himself in the chair of St. Peter, through the countenance of the king of the Lombards, addressed himself to Pepin for support, as believing him the more powerful patron of the two^q; but, before this application was well made, he was deposed, and Stephen the fourth advanced to the see of Rome; who likewise sent ambassadors to acquaint Pepin with his elevation, and to desire his protection^r.

The war in Aquitaine carried on with vigour, and with a view to absolute conquest. A. D. 768.

- THE king, eagerly desiring to put an end to the war, and of perfecting his great scheme of uniting Aquitaine once more to the crown of France, leaving his queen and court at Xaintes, marched to attack the duke in his fortified posts. Authors relate very differently the issue of this last dispute. Some say, that, after being defeated in battle, Vaisar was surrounded and cut to pieces as he endeavoured to make his escape^s. Others allege, that, seeing the day lost, his own people, in hopes of making their court to the victorious monarch, and weary of sharing the misfortunes of a prince, from whom they could now expect no reward, put an end to his sorrows and his life^t. However, it is universally allowed, that he perished with his arms in his hands; and that he died unhappy, but unconquered. Thus, in the space of nine years, Pepin finished his conquests, and re-annexed Aquitaine to his dominions, from which it had been detached near half a century. He had scarce time to taste the joy of this great event, being seized, at his return to Xaintes, with a fever, which increased upon his being carried to Tours, out of devotion to St. Martin; and, being conveyed from thence to St. Denis, he there expired, of a dropsy, and a complication of disorders, on the 23d of September, in the year seven hundred and sixty-eight, in the seventeenth of his reign, and in the fifty-fourth of his life^u. He was interred in the church of that monastery, with all possible honours, and his death deplored by all ranks of people as a public calamity; for till that time the French had not seen a more wise, active, or fortunate prince; one who had maintained peace and tranquility at home, and at the same time supported, and even augmented, the credit of the nation abroad. But it is necessary to enter into this matter a little more particularly, since, by laying down a few observations founded on facts, the history of this reign, and of those that are to follow, may be very much illustrated.

Duke of Aquitaine slain, and king Pepin dies of a dropsy at St. Denis.

- It appears not a little strange, more especially to modern historians, considering the vast extent of his genius, the great number of his nobility, and the nature of his title to the crown, that, in the course of seventeen years administration, Pepin should not be exposed so much as to one private conspiracy, or public insurrection, but maintain a full and absolute authority, as if he had derived his claim of sovereignty from a long train of ancestors. The resolving this difficulty, by saying he was fortunate, would scarce be esteemed satisfactory in so inquisitive an age as this. The true state of the matter is, that it flowed from his policy, and from that singular sagacity, which is discoverable through the whole course of his conduct. He observed, that princes, who affected to govern with a plenitude of power, are very rarely happy or beloved; and that those, who confide their authority to others, seldom preserve it long, whether it be well or ill employed; for, if their ministers be either weak or wicked, themselves in the end bear the blame; and, on the other hand, if they are men of great talents and abilities, they arrogate to themselves, in process of time, that power which was originally delegated to them from their masters^v. He guarded effectually against both evils. He held his parliaments, or great councils of the nobility, regularly. He proposed in them, in such a manner as was most suitable to his ends, the measures that he meant to pursue; and, as these we calculated for the public service, so he undertook the execution of them as a point of duty, and left the glory of advising and contriving them to those assemblies. By this means he interested the clergy and the nobility in all his schemes, and was, in appearance, the minister of their councils, while, in reality, he prosecuted his own; for though no prince was more ready to hear advice, or shewed a greater deference to the sentiments of public assemblies, yet, when he came into action, he performed all. He was no sooner declared king, than he marched against the Saxons. He received pope Stephen with all the reverence possible, and paid him the most profound submission; but he derived from thence prodigious advantages; he wiped from the remembrance of the people the manner in which he had acquired the sovereignty; so that, in setting up the pope, he set up his own power. The nobility of France were averse to the Italian expedition; in which he would not embark, till the pope's prayers and intreaties had obtained their assent. His predecessors had lost great armies in that country, and sooner or later drew nothing from it but disgrace. Pepin saw their mistakes, and avoided them. He had no ambition to make conquests in Italy; but it was of great importance to weaken the power of the Lombards, and to leave that country so divided, as that he might never receive any trouble from thence. He raised the power of the popes, and made them truly princes; but he detached them from the Greek emperors, and rendered them dependent on himself. In consequence of this wise management, he derived glory and security from those expeditions, that had probably been fatal to any other French prince. It was not till he had cut him off from all support, that he began the war with the duke of Aquitaine, in which, however, he made a full stop, when his nephew retired into his own dominions; by which he prevented a dangerous diversion, which that prince would otherwise have made. But, though he desisted, he never departed from his design of reducing Aquitaine, and he accomplished it, as he did every thing, by a proper mixture of deliberation and vigour; deriving, from his own penetration and perseverance, that success which later writers would attribute to fortune; but nearer his own time it was better understood; for otherwise, Prudent as Pepin, had never become a proverb in France.*

The measures

contemptible.

THERE is, perhaps, another circumstance that may set his conduct in a more striking point of view. His figure was so far from having any thing in it majestic, that it was rather the contrary. In point of stature, we are told, that he wanted six inches of five feet, whence he was surnamed the Short; but, in regard to size, he was of such a make as procured him likewise the appellation of Pepin the Gross, or the Fat. The monk of St. Gal, amongst many idle stories, has preserved one of this prince, which most of the historians have transcribed, and which indeed ought to be preserved^r. Pepin had been informed that some of his principal commanders had made themselves merry with his figure; he invited them, therefore, to a spectacle at Ferriers, which, in that age, was not uncommon. This was a combat between a lion and a bull: the king was seated on his throne, and all his great officers about him, when the beasts were let out. The lion immediately leaped upon the bull, and brought him to the ground, and was on the point of strangling him. Which of you, said Pepin, will make that beast let go his prey? His great lords gazed in silence. That task must be mine, added Pepin; and, descending from his royal seat, advanced with his sword drawn directly towards the beasts. The lion, turning his eyes towards him, began to raise himself upon the bull, when, at a single blow, the king divided the head from the body. As he returned to his throne, he said, without any emotion, “David was a little man, and yet he triumphed over Goliath; Alexander too was a little man, but his arm was stronger, and his heart more intrepid, than those of many of his captains, who were taller and handsomer than he.” This taught his officers discretion, and his people respect. We may from these remarks, with great certainty, infer, that this founder of the second race of French kings had great personal merit, and might, therefore, have deserved a more honourable inscription than that which is placed upon his tomb, Cy gist le Pere de Charlemagne; that is, Here lies the father of Charlemagne^z. It is true, this second race are stiled Carlovingians; but it is not decided, whether in honour of Charles Martel, the father of Pepin, or of Charles the great his son. Be that as it will, Pepin atchieved what the one left imperfect, and opened that path to glory, which the other pursued with so great applause.

- ^a CHARLES and Carloman succeeded their father Pepin, according to the desire that monarch expressed to the nobility that were about him, at the time of his decease, and were solemnly proclaimed sixteen days after his death, Charles at Noyon, and Carloman at Soissons^a. Charles was, at this time, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, and as remarkably tall as his father was short, being near seven feet in height, well proportioned, but rather inclining to fat, a fresh florid complexion, a majestic air, very robust in his constitution, gay and sprightly in his temper, very active, and capable of bearing much fatigue. His mind was truly heroic, generally speaking, equal and composed in his conduct, so much superior to fortune as never to be either ruffled or elated, of so comprehensive a genius, that he not only aspired to, but excelled in, all that became a great prince, an excellent officer, an able statesman, and as well versed in letters as any man of his time; zealous in religion, and exact in his devotion. His character, fair as it was, wanted not blemishes, which arose chiefly from his ambition, and a notion he received from thence, that many things might be dispensed with from reasons of state. In some instances he was certainly not master of his passions; in others he was misled by the errors of the times; but take him in the whole circle of his character, with those allowances that are commonly made for such as act in so high a sphere, and he must be acknowledged as wise and brave a monarch, as that or perhaps any other age produced^b. His younger brother Carloman resembled him very little; his virtues or his vices were not very conspicuous; but he was chiefly distinguished by a contentious, suspicious, peevish disposition, which left him in the hands of such of his courtiers as were least worthy of his confidence, and who gained it by throwing doubts and fears in his way, which kept him perpetually uneasy, and attached to those who made him so^c. Both the brothers were married, in a manner not very suitable to their birth or interests, and both were too much strangers to business, from the warm and enterprising humour of their father, who loved to execute every thing himself. It seems to be, in some measure, certain, that a division of Pepin's dominions was projected, and perhaps settled between them, but it is very uncertain in what manner; for the old writers contradict each other; and the modern historians, in order to reconcile them, suppose that there were two divisions, and that by the latter Carloman had Austrasia, which in the former had been given to Charles^d. But it seems to be more probable that the division was never executed; but that, the brothers disagreeing, the dispute was left to be decided in the next assembly of the prelates and peers. This want of union between the two kings revived the hopes of those who were enemies to, or at least jealous of, both. Didier, king of the Lombards, and Tassilon, duke of the Bavarians, began to increase their forces, and to enter into intrigues; but the ice was broke, and a war begun by a prince of whom the kings had not the least jealousy, and with whom their enemies had little intercourse^e.
- ^d HUNALDE, or Hunaud, who resigned the duchy of Aquitaine to his son Vaifar, after spending between twenty and thirty years in a monastery, quitted it, to return into his old dominions, supposing this a favourable opportunity of recovering his dignity, and restoring independency to that great principality^f. He met in this attempt with more facility than he had any reason to expect; for though his being universally hated was one great cause of his resigning, yet he was now universally received with all apparent marks of reverence and affection, most of the great towns opening their gates to him; so that this great conquest, which had been the business of Pepin's life, was in a manner lost, in a few weeks time. Charles saw that the recovery of Aquitaine was not of greater importance to the French nation, than to his own and to his brother's character; and, for this reason, he represented it in the strongest terms to Carloman, who consented to assemble his forces with the utmost expedition, and to march, in conjunction with his brother, against their common enemy: but by that time the army was assembled, he altered his sentiments, withdrew the forces under his command, and left his brother to act or to retire as he thought fit^g. Charles, notwithstanding this strange behaviour, and the unexpected diminution of the forces that were to be employed in the war, marched directly into Aquitaine, and having defeated Hunalde, had infallibly made him prisoner, but for his perfect knowledge of the country, the people abandoning him in his distress, as lightly as they had followed him upon his first coming amongst them; which obliged him to take shelter in the territories of Lupus, duke of Gascony, who had been his tributary; but who, during the war between Pepin and Vaisar, had erected his seignory into an independent principalityⁿ. Charles made the right use of his victory, in building the fortress of Fronsac on the Dordogne: while this was doing, he advanced with his forces to the frontiers of Gascony, sending a herald to duke Lupus, to demand the person of Hunalde, who was accordingly delivered up, and confined for the rest of his life. This established the character of Charles at home and abroad, brought the nobility to court his favour, and all his neighbours to treat for his friendshipⁱ.

AMONGST these was Didier; who, though naturally an enemy to the French, and willing to have taken the advantage of Pepin's death, yet perceiving that Charles had inherited his capacity, together with his dominions, he demanded his sister Gilette for the prince his son, and offered his daughter Hermengarde either to Charles or his brother. This alarmed pope Stephen IV. who wrote to Charles in the strongest terms, beseeching him not to bring a scandal on the catholic faith, by putting away his wife, for the sake of taking one out of a house which God had cursed with a leprosy; or, after refusing his sister to the first prince in the world, the son of the Greek emperor, bestow her on him, whose father became a king but by his favour^k. The queen dowager, however, had a better opinion of the match, went in person into Italy to negotiate it, and had so strong an influence on Charles, as, notwithstanding the pope's letters, to induce him to comply with it. In the course of her progress, she paid a visit first to her son Carloman, and afterwards to the pope, whom she pacified, by assuring him that she would use her interest with Didier to relinquish some places which he still withheld from the see of Rome; and, which, having performed, she conducted her new daughter-in-law into France^l. There she found things in some disorder; for, notwithstanding all the pains she had taken, Carloman had still so strong a distaste to his brother, that he was preparing to attack him, when he was suddenly removed by death^m. His queen, in the first transports of grief and fear, being probably excited to it by those who had been the principal authors of the misunderstandings between the two brothers, and who were apprehensive of feeling the weight of Charles's resentment, withdrew, with her two sons, her husband's treasures, and these counsellors, into the dominions of the king of the *Lombards*ⁿ. Charles expressed some concern at the news; but he immediately advanced with a body of troops to the frontiers of his brother's territories, and, with the consent of the prelates and peers, took possession of the kingdom that was thus abdicated; and, to express his sense of Didier's protecting the widow and her sons, he repudiated the queen whom he had so lately married^o.

THE Saxons, who commonly revolted at the beginning of every reign, attempted to throw off the yoke at the entrance of this, which obliged Charles to turn his arms on that side. As this war was the capital business of his reign, and lasted, though by intervals, for thirty-three years, it is requisite to say something succinctly of the country and the people, though this subject must be more largely treated of in another place. The territory of the Saxons, as it was considered at this time, comprehended a country of vast extent, bounded on the west by the German ocean, Bohemia on the east, on the north by the sea, and on the south by the Germanic France, extending along the Lower Rhine, and from the Iffel beyond Mentz. This was divided into three parts; the Westphalians inhabited that towards the oceans, from whence the name of Westphalia remains to a small part of their country: the Ost or Eastphalians held that part bordering on Bohemia: the middle belonged to the Angrians, who were the immediate neighbours of the French. Under each of these names, many nations, or, generally speaking, tribes, were comprehended, each commanded by its own chief or duke^p. Hence their readiness to revolt, and the difficulty of holding them to any terms; because, whenever a few mutinous dukes conspired together, they made inroads into the French territories; and when the troops of that kingdom invaded their country in return, the whole Saxon nation was involved in the revolt, from a principle of self-defence. Their religion was another cause of these frequent insurrections; for they were pagans, and bigotted pagans, their principle deity being the god of war. Charles no sooner heard that they had refused the usual tribute, than he entered the country with a numerous army; and, having beaten them in several small engagements, advanced to their capital post of Eresbourg, near Paderborn, where was the temple of their god Irminful, represented as a man completely armed, with a standard in one hand, placed on a column^q. The natural courage of the people, joined to their religious zeal, induced them to make an obstinate defence; the place too being strong by situation, and fortified to the best of their skill. Charles forced it at last, but not without considerable loss, and employed his army three whole days in demolishing

- a effectually this monument of superstition, in which great treasures were found in gold and silver. This being performed, Charles continued his march directly towards the Weser, resolved to break the force of this intractable nation so effectually, as to deprive them of the power of disturbing him again^r. But they were already so terrified with the destruction of their temple, and saw so little hopes of opposing in the field troops who had beaten them with such advantages, that they sent deputies to implore his clemency^s; and Charles, upon their submitting to the terms he prescribed, and delivering twelve hostages for the due performance of them, granted them peace; the change of affairs in Italy making that measure as expedient for him as for them, at this juncture^t. But, before his return, he gave directions for fortifying proper posts, and establishing a certain number of troops on the frontiers, to keep
- b these people in awe, which for some short time they did; but the next favourable opportunity tempted them to excite fresh troubles, though, in consequence of such continual wars, some part of their country was but thinly peopled, and the subsidies they sometimes drew from the enemies of France, made but poor amends for the losses they suffered^u.

DIDIER, king of the Lombards, having seized and frightened Stephen IV. into his grave, He makes an irruption into Italy, by two different routes, with a great army. laboured all he could to reduce his successor pope Adrian I. to a state of dependence: in order to which, he not only resumed a great part of what had been yielded by the treaty of Pavia, but also tried to surprise the person of the pope; and, failing in that, made an attempt upon the city of Rome. Adrian, in this distress, sent ambassadors by sea into France, to give a true account of the distress he was in, and to implore the protection of Charles^w. It was this that induced him to listen so readily to the Saxons; and, if he had followed his own inclinations, he had immediately poured his forces into Italy: but the nobility of France, always averse to these expeditions, shewed so much backwardness on this occasion, that he was obliged to act with great caution and circumspection. He sent therefore several embassies to Didier, in which he expressed a great desire to preserve a perfect harmony between the two nations, made very moderate demands, and, at length, offered to give him a large sum, in ready money, if he would restore the places he had taken from the pope^x. All these propositions were civilly rejected, which was what Charles expected and desired, for it gave him sufficient leisure to form magazines, to draw together a great army, and to make his subjects believe that he did not embark in this war so much through choice as by force. The motives that induced Didier to act as he did, were, the hopes of reducing the pope before he could be succoured, his ambition to become lord of all Italy, and his resentment against Charles for repudiating the queen. On the other hand, that monarch, exclusive of his zeal in the cause of the pope, had some reasons of a personal nature. Didier had given him cause to be offended with the correspondencies he had held in France from the beginning of his reign; and the peremptory manner in which he had demanded of Adrian the crowning of Carloman's two sons, had given Charles inexpressible uneasiness^y. For these causes, therefore, he held the general assembly in the month of May at Geneva; where, by a pathetic representation of the pope's distress, and the indignities himself had received, he procured the consent of the nobility to the war, and immediately marched with a potent army to enter Lombardy, by mount Cenis, while he sent a small, but choice corps of troops, under the command of duke Bernard, natural son to Charles Martel, to force the passage of mount St. Bernard, having taken all possible methods to render his expedition successful, upon which, in a great measure, he depended^z.

DIDIER, who was well informed of the general dislike the French nobles had expressed to this expedition, persuaded himself that, by occupying and fortifying the several passes into Lombardy, and opposing their entrance with the whole force of his dominions, he should defeat this invasion, and oblige the forces of Charles to retire. He was very near carrying his point, which he pursued with such skill and steadiness, that, upon viewing the dispositions he had made, the French officers almost unanimously declared that it was impossible to force them^a. Charles himself had almost taken a resolution of decamping in the night, when a sudden panic prevailing in Didier's army, they abandoned all their posts, and retired with precipitation. This was occasioned by duke Bernard's having forced a passage into the plain with a handful of men, which had been of no consequence at all, if they had remained firm. As it was, they abandoned all; for Charles pursued them with such impetuosity, that numbers fell in the retreat^b. Didier, with the best part of his troops, took shelter in Pavia; the rest, under the command of his only son Adalgise, threw themselves into Verona. With the king was the old unfortunate duke Hunalde, who, having made his escape out of prison, had taken refuge in his dominions; and with the prince, were the sons and the widow of Carloman, which very probably induced Charles to form the siege of both places at once, in hopes of destroying all his enemies together^c. Success justifies every measure; the French were so charmed with their good fortune, that, notwithstanding their hatred of the climate of Italy, and the fatigue of sieges, they persisted in these for many months, though the places were well defended, had numerous garrisons, and magazines perfectly well supplied. Verona fell the first; for Adalgise, seeing no hopes of succour, resolved to take care of himself, and with this view, making his escape in the night, he found means to retire to Constantinople^d. By the surrender of this place, his sister-in-law and nephews fell into the hands of Charles, but what became of them is a secret that history has not disclosed. Upon this Milan, and most of the great towns of Lombardy, submitted. The march of Ancona demanded the protection of the pope; and Didier, who but a few months before had so large a kingdom, found his dominions now restrained within the walls of Pavia, where, as he had nothing to hope, he continued to make an obstinate defence. Charles, after taking the necessary measures for continuing the siege, or at least blockade of the place, made a tour to Rome^e.

Pavia surrenders, Didier submits, and Charles becomes master of the country of the Lombards.

As to the motive of this journey authors differ; some ascribe it to pure curiosity, others to devotion, but the more intelligent believe there was some secret scheme concealed. The pope was certainly not very well pleased, for the king brought with him a strong corps of troops; and though their first conference was in the suburbs, yet Charles having demanded entrance into the city, it could not be refused. He shewed himself upon this occasion a wise and great prince: he promised the pope, under the sanction of an oath, to do nothing to his prejudice; he performed that promise punctually, which confirmed the pontif in his interests. He visited the churches with such a shew of devotion, as gained him the hearts of the people; and at the request of the clergy, he confirmed and enlarged his father's donation, depositing one copy of the instrument on the great altar, and another upon the tomb of St. Peter^f. In fine, as he entered Rome in triumph, he left more than a conqueror, having captivated all ranks by his generous behaviour, and established his reputation with them in such a manner, as fixed his sovereignty in their hearts. At his return to Pavia, he found the siege little, if at all, more advanced than when he left it, yet the place surrendered very soon after: this was owing to an enemy within; for the plague made such devastation, that the people lost all patience, and daily pressed the king to implore mercy of Charles for himself and them^g. The old duke of Aquitaine opposing the surrender, they beat his brains out, which induced Didier to submit. Thus the kingdom of the Lombards was extinguished, after having subsisted somewhat more than two hundred years. We know not well what became of the unfortunate king, except that he was carried into France, where some say he was beheaded, others, that, being transferred to Liege, he became a monk, and some assert that he died of sickness soon after his arrival^h. By the surrender of Pavia, Charles became master of two-thirds of Italy, where he scarce altered any thing, except their taxes, which he diminished considerably. He caressed and employed their nobility; and, except in some places in Tuscany, and in the city of Pavia, he left no French garrisons. He caused himself to be crowned, by the archbishop of Milan, king of Lombardy, with the famous iron crown preserved at Modece, not far from that city: having recommended to the people to make a right use of the benefits he had bestowed, and assured them of his intention to govern mildly, and according to their own laws, he repassed the mountains with his armyⁱ.

He repasses the mountains speedily, and arriving unexpectedly in Germany, quells the Saxons.
A. D. 774.

THE true reason of his quitting Italy so soon, was the news he had of some fresh stirrs among the Saxons, who, hearing of the siege of Pavia, and believing that the Lombards, with whom they had some intercourse, could not be ruined in a single campaign, began to flatter themselves with hopes of recovering Eresbourg, and repairing, by expeditions into the French territories, the losses they had sustained in the last war^k. They were not slow in taking their resolution, or in executing it when taken: they surprised Eresbourg, and the garrison left in it; but instead of keeping it, they demolished the fort that Charles had erected: they ravaged a large tract of country, and carried away a great booty. They were scarce returned into their own country, when Charles arrived at Ingelheim on the Rhine, with his army^l. He entered Saxony by three different passages at the same time, made a great slaughter, and brought back his forces loaded with plunder. He held the great assembly in May at Duren, in the county of Juliers, where a resolution was taken to push the Saxons to the utmost. Accordingly he passed the Rhine, besieged and took Sigebourg, recovered Eresbourg, passed the Wefer, and defeated the whole force of the Saxons on the other side with great slaughter^m. But the greatest part of a considerable corps, whom he had left to guard the passage of the river, were cut off by their own inattention, and by their having a contempt for a barbarous enemy, tho' equal to them in courage, and superior in cunning. This perhaps might be one motive, tho' the turn of affairs in Italy was another, that determined Charles to treat once more with these people, to a accept of their submission, and of the hostages they offered from every one of their tribes; but what he chiefly depended upon, was the new fortress at Eresbourg: for upon a strict examination, he found the Saxons had made a right choice, and that it was capable of being made the strongest place in their country, which induced him to order that it should be fortified with all possible careⁿ. The peace concluded, and the hostages delivered, he advised the Saxon deputies to keep this treaty better than they had done the last, if they expected either favour or mercy from him, and received on their part the strongest assurances that words could give^o.

After the departure of Charles from Italy, things quickly fell into disorder. He left indeed no room to complain; he had made many of the Lombard lords great, but most of them had a mind to be greater. The archbishop of Ravenna put a new construction upon the king's donation; he said, that, as the pope enjoyed the temporalities of the duchy of Rome, he thought the title, if not the revenue of the exarchate, should be annexed to the archbishop of Ravenna. Adalgise encouraged these misunderstandings from Constantinople; the Greek emperor, who had still a considerable stake in Italy, being as desirous of setting up the kingdom of the Lombards again, as his predecessors had been to pull it down. Charles sent his ministers into Italy, to let several of the great lords, particularly Hildebrand, duke of Spoletto, the duke of Beneventum, and the duke of Cluise, know the reasons he had to suspect them of infidelity and ingratitude, and to learn from themselves what he was to expect. As the emperor Constantine Copronymus was just dead, they doubted of Adalgise's power to support them, and therefore they gave all possible assurances to Charles of duty and submission^p. It was otherwise with Rotgaude, duke of Frioul, who intended to deceive both parties: he had for himself already raised forces, assumed the airs of a sovereign, and found several of the lesser nobility simple enough to rely upon his promises. While things were in this state, Charles passed the mountains with a small corps of choice troops, routed the duke of Frioul, took him prisoner, caused him to be beheaded^q, put French governors and garrisons into all the places that had revolted, composed the differences that had arose between the pope and the archbishop of Ravenna; and having, in the space of four months, once more settled his new dominions, returned into Germany, where his presence was again necessary^r.

The Saxons, while Charles was in Italy, made another revolt, destroyed the new works that were raising at Eresbourg, and made an attempt to recover Sigebourg, which was a place of force. The garrison being very numerous, after they had suffered the Saxons to fatigue themselves for some time, in an affair they did not well understand, made a sally, so well conducted, as obliged them to raise the siege, and, not satisfied with this, pursued them as far as the sources of the Lippe. Things stood thus when Charles, with his forces from Italy, arrived in the French camp^s. The Saxons suspected the first rumour of this for a stratagem; but as soon as they knew it to be a truth, they disbanded, and sent deputies to demand pardon, and to make an offer of becoming Christians. The king, after much intreaty, accepted of this proposition, and took new hostages; but, at the same time, fixed upon other precautions, that they might deter them from breaking their faith. The fortress of Eresbourg he caused to be rebuilt under his eye, and, at the same time, ordered a new fort to be erected upon the Lippe; into both these he put strong garrisons, and went afterwards to pass the winter at Heristal, the patrimony of his family^t. In the spring he marched into the heart of Saxony, with a very numerous army, in order to oblige the most considerable of their chiefs to be present, as his subjects, at the assembly in May, which was held at Paderborn, in Westphalia. There the Saxons renewed their homage, and the promise they had made of being instructed in the Christian faith; to which they now added their consent to be made slaves, or to be expelled their country, if they ever took up arms again^u. Witiking, the most capable and the most enterprising of their chiefs, to avoid being present in this assembly, fled to Denmark. Here it was that Ibinala, lord of Saragossa, presented himself to demand the protection of Charles, not barely on his own behalf, but also for many other Moorish lords, who were desirous of becoming his vassals. The French nobility, in general, were astonished at this; but Charles, who was desirous of extending the bounds of his dominions on that side, also readily accepted the proposition. The influence he had in the assembly was so great, that, upon mature deliberation, it was approved, and the king immediately issued the necessary orders for assembling an army in Aquitaine^v.

The king passed his Easter at Casseneuil, a palace of his in the Aginois; and having divided his army into two corps, he ordered one to march on the side of Narbonne to enter into Roussillon, while himself, with the other, took the rout of Gascony, in order to penetrate lords makes an expedition into Spain. that way into Navarre. Pampeluna being taken, he passed the Ebro with his forces, and his whole army being joined, invested Saragossa, which, after a short siege, surrendered, and received Ibinala in quality of governor: the emirs of Huesca and Jacca came voluntarily and did homage, as did also the governors of Barcelona and Gironne^x. Charles, having taken the best methods he could devise for securing his new conquest, disposed every thing for his return, satisfied with having extended his frontier from the Pyrenees to the Ebro. It was in repassing the mountains before-mentioned, that the rear of his army was attacked by the Gascons, who making a great impression on troops unacquainted with their manner of fighting, many of the principal officers, who had hastened thither to engage the troops to remain firm, were slain^y. This is that famous defeat in the valley of Roncevaux, of which so many and so strange accounts are given in romances; and here fell the famous Roland, of whom history only records, that he commanded on the frontier of Bretagne. Charles, exact in all works of piety, ordered a chapel to be erected near the place, under which there is a large, strong, and very beautiful vault, with thirty tombs of white stone, but without any inscriptions^z. He prosecuted his march after this disaster into Aquitaine, which he divided into several districts, appointing a count in each, who had the chief power in civil as well as military affairs; and, having cantoned a sufficient number of troops on the frontiers for their security, he returned into the heart of his own dominions. The French are very inquisitive why he penetrated no farther into Spain? The answer is not difficult: he meant to preserve what he had acquired; and, in order to this, it was requisite to preserve his army; which service, and a Spanish summer, would infallibly have ruined^a. His aim, therefore, was to raise in his new conquests a body of troops, capable of enduring the climate, and who, by their being acquainted with the manner of making war, might be more serviceable against the Moors. It was with this view that he distributed great quantities of land, indifferently, to Gauls, Goths, and Gascons, as well as French, to be held by military tenures: and was also very beneficial to the prelates and abbots, in order to attach them here, as he had done elsewhere, to his person and government^b.

New disturbances in Saxony, which are quelled, and they are obliged to give fresh hostages.

He was scarce out of the frontiers of Aquitaine, when he was informed that Witiking, being returned from Denmark, had engaged the Saxons in a general insurrection. His forces were so fatigued, that he was obliged to put the best part of them into winter quarters; however, having sent his officers into Austrasia to assemble what troops they could, and being informed that the enemy had committed the most barbarous cruelties on the Rhine, he, with a small corps, marched with all possible expedition to join the Austrasians. He, in conjunction with them, pursued the Saxons with such vigour, that he came up with them in the country of Hesse, defeated them, and ordered his troops to give no quarter^c. He held the next assembly at Heristal, where a great number of prelates, dukes, and counts, being present, he made some of those laws, or statutes, which are to be found amongst his capitulars, which gave them equal authority with the salique laws^d. As soon as the season would permit, he passed the Rhine, and advanced towards the Wefer, where he received once more the submission of the Saxons; and having held a diet, at which most of their dukes were present, he then directed his march to the Elbe, that he might have an opportunity of being present likewise in a diet of the Sclavonians, where he regulated several points of great moment. At both these diets he insisted upon having securities for the persons of those whom he sent to preach the gospel amongst them; and having obtained this, he sent bishops, abbots, and priests, to convert these barbarous nations, recommending it to them chiefly to insist upon the excellency of the Christian morals, to possess these people with a sense of virtue and decency, and to use their utmost endeavours to reduce them to a state of civility^e. As the country was, in a great measure, uncultivated, and had scarce any considerable towns, it was impossible for him to take the same precautions he had done elsewhere; and therefore, exclusive of his zeal for religion, this was a measure dictated to him by the maxims of true policy^f.

A. D. 779.

New troubles breaking out, he returns into Italy, and makes another visit to the pope.

By this time all things were again disordered in Italy, where pope Adrian had a quarrel with the Greek emperor's governor of the kingdom of Naples, where several of the great lords of Lombardy held a correspondence with Adalgise, and where the people in general, because less oppressed than they had formerly been, were grown wanton, and were ready to join in favour of any innovation^g. Charles had intelligence from all parties, and determined therefore to make a new tour into that country with an army. He carried with him his queen, and his two younger sons Carloman and Lewis; his eldest son Pepin, by his first queen, and Charles the eldest by the consort he then had, were left in France. His journey, after he passed the mountains, was a continued triumph; all disorders ceased at his approach, and all the

- a dispute that remained was, who should be most forward in paying their duty. Charles took all in good part, and dissembled the informations he had received. He treated the people with great kindness and favour; the nobility with an obliging familiarity, and a flowing bounty; the clergy with much affection and profound respect. He passed the winter at Pavia in great splendor, and went to keep his Easter at Rome. There his son Carloman was baptized by the pope, who changed his name to Pepin, and immediately after gave the regal unction to him, and to his brother Lewis; the former being declared king of Lombardy, and the latter of Aquitaine^h. This ceremony was performed on Easter day, immediately after high mass, with the loud acclamations of the people, who love such pompous spectacles, though they comprehend nothing of the motives. Those who thought themselves wiser, held it
b strange that the father, being but in the thirty-ninth year of his age, should already divide his dominionsⁱ. But Charles had framed a system, according to which this seemed to be necessary: in his return, therefore, he left his son Pepin at Pavia, with a council on whom he could depend, in hopes that the Lombards, having now a king of their own, a splendid court, and an easy government, would at length learn to be faithful. He concluded about this time, a treaty with the empress Irene, by which he promised his eldest daughter to the young emperor Constantine VI. He settled also the dispute between the pope and the governor of Naples, conferred fresh favours on the dukes of Spoletto and Beneventum, tho' they little deserved them, and left the tranquility of Italy, in all appearance, firmly established^k.

- As soon as he arrived in France, he conducted his son Lewis to Orleans: there having c formed a household for him, and appointed one Arnold, a lord of great wisdom and integrity, to be his governor, he sent him armed, and on horseback, though a perfect child, with a numerous escorte, into Aquitaine, that he might learn the language and the manners of the people; and that, by being accustomed to see, they might learn to love and respect their sovereign^l. He persuaded himself that this division would prevent all disputes in his family, as the antient empire of the Franks was preserved intire; as the two new kingdoms were separated from them, by the natural bounds of the Alps and the Loire; and as it would be the interest of his two elder sons to have their brethren for neighbours, rather than strangers^m. To the satisfaction he enjoyed from this pleasing idea, was joined another favourable event, which could not but be very acceptable. Tassilon, duke of Bavaria, had hitherto maintained a d kind of equivocal conduct, never acting openly against Charles, and yet declining to resort to the assemblies where his presence was expected, or to renew his homage. The king had signified his displeasure to the pope, and desired him to let the duke know, that if he did not prevent it by an immediate change in his behaviour, he must expect to see the whole forces of his cousin thunder on his dominions. Tassilon, excited thereto by his wife, the daughter of the deceased king of the Lombards, hated the French nation implacably, and Tassilon personally had been, for many years, heaping up treasure, augmenting his troops, and fortifying his frontiers, with an intention not to let slip the first favourable opportunity of resenting the death of his father-in-law. But the message delivered him by two bishops sent from the pope, and the summons that immediately followed from Charles, softened him so much, that he sent e to demand a safe conduct, and promised to repair to courtⁿ. This being readily granted, he was constrained to keep his word; and having sworn fidelity to Charles and his sons, and given such hostages as were required, he returned, more incensed than ever, tho' treated with great respect, and loaded with presents^o; while the king, pleased with the prospect of peace, which he scarce ever enjoyed, determined to hold the next assembly in May, at Cologne, that, by being at no great distance from the Saxons, he might hinder them from creating any fresh disturbances.

- THE season of the year no sooner rendered it practicable, than he marched with his army to the sources of the Lippe; having encamped as advantageously as possible, he there summoned a dyet of the Saxons, and therein gave audience to ambassadors from the king of the Danes, or f Normans, as they were then stiled, and from the monarch of the Huns or Abares; who, in the most respectful manner, intreated his friendship; which Charles readily promised, provided his subjects received no injuries from theirs^p. He was no sooner returned into France, than Witiking came back into his own country; where he took great pains to persuade the Saxons, that embracing the Christian faith would pave the way for absolute subjection, if not slavery, and in a little time raised a new rebellion; to cover which from the French, he caused it to be given out, that the Sclavonians had made an irruption into their country, and that they were taking up arms to repel those invaders^q. Charles, upon the first notice of these stirrs, sent Adalgise, his chamberlain, Geilon, his constable, and Worade, count of the palace, to assemble the militia in Austria, with orders to pass the Rhine, to join the Saxons, and carry a the war into the enemy's country; but, being quickly informed of the truth, he sent count Theuderic, or Tbierri, with an army, to support the forces already assembled^r. The four generals advanced to the Weser; and, having information that the Saxons were encamped at the foot of Mount Sontal, on the other side the river, it was agreed, that the first army should pass, and, marching round the mountain, fall upon the enemy, tho' much superior to them in number, while count Tbierri remained on the other side, till, upon a signal given, he should likewise pass, and fall upon the enemy's back^s. But the three generals, jealous of the reputation of Tbierri, who was the emperor's relation, attacked the Saxons, without making the signal; and, by this wise contrivance, were totally defeated. The constable, and those who escaped, fled to count Tbierri, who entrenched his forces on the banks of the river, b and sent notice to the king of what had happened^t. Charles, with his usual expedition, assembled a numerous army, disengaged count Tbierri, and marched into the heart of Saxony, where his very name dissipated the rebellion, and the principal dukes of the nation came to meet him trembling, laying all the fault upon Witikind, and beseeching him to grant them pardon. This the king offered, provided they would deliver him up; but they answered, he was again fled to Denmark. That may be, answered Charles, but he did not take with him all his associates. Upon this, on a signal given, his army invested the Saxons; and having seized four thousand five hundred, who had been in that battle, and caused them to be conducted to a little river that run into the Weser, there cut off their heads^u. An execution, of which scarce any example appears in European history. c

A. D. 782.

The resentment of this excites a general insurrection, which occasions a long and bloody war.

THIS struck a general consternation at first; but Witikind and Albion, who had been likewise embarked in the former affair, returning, a general revolt ensued. This employed the king three whole years, notwithstanding he defeated them totally in three general engagements. One winter he spent at the fort of Eresbourg, made several expeditions into the heart of their country, and spilt rivers of blood; his two elder sons being also in the field^w. At length, tired with this carnage, and vexed with a conspiracy that had been discovered in Thuringia, and whispers of other dark designs against him, he sent for some of the Saxon prisoners of rank, and told them, that he was amazed at the folly and madness of their countrymen, whom he had formerly regarded as his subjects, and to whom, notwithstanding what was passed, he was still far from having an aversion. He requested them to go into the northern parts of d Saxony, to find out Witikind and Albion, and desire them to come to him, that he might learn upon what terms the rest of their nation might be spared^x. They went accordingly; and the two chiefs, surprised at the proposition, unwilling to put themselves into the king's hands, but still more unwilling to be the authors of the total ruin of their country, demanded hostages for their security. The king returned into France, that they might have time to recover their consternation, sent one of the lords of his court with hostages on the other side the Elbe; upon which Witikind and Albion came and presented themselves to the king. He received them with great respect, commended their courage, conduct, and constancy; applauded their love of liberty, and assured them of his protection and favour. In a short time, they were both converted to Christianity; and, after being baptized, returned into their own country, where e they kept the people in quiet, and assisted the progress of the gospel with great zeal and fidelity for several years^y. The king, freed from this trouble, obliged the Bretons to submit, quashed some stirrs in Aquitaine without bloodshed, and awed the duke of Bavaria, who had been all along intriguing with the Saxons, to silence and submission^z.

As soon as he had thus established domestic tranquility, he made a tour into Italy, passed his Christmas at Florence, which he ordered to be rebuilt, and went to keep his Easter at Rome^a. The people received him with loud acclamations of joy, which, perhaps, might be very sincere; but the pope, and all the principal persons at Rome, felt a sensible uneasiness at the sight of their master. Charles knew very well what intrigues there were subsisting, and was well satisfied, that those who flew highest in compliment, were deepest in the design of f his destruction. He was aware that the empress Irene, who sent to renew the engagements subsisting between them, had entered into contrary engagements for the support of Adalgise, the son of Didier; he knew, that Aregise, duke of Beneventum, who had married the sister of that prince, had entered into this treaty; he was sensible that Tassilon, duke of Bavaria, who had married another sister, was embarked in the same design; and he was not at all ignorant, that pope Adrian, and the Romans, for whom he had done so much, were no strangers to these intrigues, but secretly wished well to them^b. He had appeared in Italy as a great captain before; he distinguished himself now as a great politician. He desired the senate of Rome

a might be assembled; he laid before them the treasons of the duke of Beneventum, and the proofs; he desired their advice how he should act. They, who were accomplices in the conspiracy, to preserve an appearance of innocence, declared, that no treatment could be too severe. The king entered his dominions with an army; the duke fled; but, by his deputies, intreated Charles's clemency. Some prelates, by secret instructions from the pope, joined in the request^c. The king granted it; upon condition he sent him his two sons: the princes were sent. The king gave the eldest leave to return to his father, and kept Grimoalde, who was the youngest, whom he educated with the same care, and treated with the same tenderness, as if he had been his own^d. Tassilon, fearing he had been discovered, moved the pope, by ambassadors, to intercede on his behalf; he did so. Charles asked the ambassadors, in his b presence, if they had full powers from their master to engage for his future conduct? They acknowledged they had none^e. As this exposed the pope, he told them, that, if their master failed in his obedience, he would excommunicate him, and release his subjects from their oaths. Charles accepted this, without considering that the power, which he thus acknowledged, might be turned against himself, or his posterity^f. In his return, he stopped for some time at Pavia, to give instructions to his son and his ministers, and afterwards passed the mountains into his own dominions; where all was tolerably quiet.

THE next assembly was held at Worms; where he laid before the nobility the behaviour of his cousin, the duke of Bavaria, and declared, that, since clemency had so little effect, he was
c determined to chastise him. His measures had been taken before-hand; he advanced in person, with a well appointed army, towards the Lech; but at the same time the Austrians and Saxons appeared, with a greater number of forces, on the Danube, and the forces of Pepin, king of the Lombards, were on the point of entering Bavaria, through the valley of Trent^g. Tassilon saw his destruction inevitable; instead, therefore, of attempting a defence, he came privately into the king's camp, and threw himself at his feet. Charles beheld him with pity; he recapitulated all his treasons; he demanded his eldest son as a hostage; and, having once more taken his oath of fidelity, dismissed him, with an assurance, that all that was past should be forgot^h. He instantly resumed his intrigues, negotiated with the Huns to make an irruption into Germany, while himself, with all his forces, invaded France, and Adalgise, with a Greek army, and the lords of his faction in Lombardy, fell upon Pepin. His d own subjects, whom he trusted, foreseeing the ruin of their country, discovered all to the king. The duke, who did not at all suspect them, went to the next assembly at Ingelheim, that Charles might conceive no umbrage; and no sooner arrived than he was arrested. On the testimony of those he trusted, he and his two sons were condemned to lose their heads. The king commuted this into passing the remainder of their days in a convent. His duchess, the cause of all his misfortunes, is supposed to have shared the same fate, and Bavaria was annexed to the crownⁱ. In all probability succeeding times would have doubted the truth of this conspiracy; but the events that followed put it beyond question. The Huns made a prodigious irruption; and, after being twice defeated with great slaughter, invaded Bavaria, to revenge the duke and themselves. But the Bavarians, secure of support, gave them such a e reception, that very few of them returned^j. Adalgise, with a Greek army, appeared likewise in Italy, notwithstanding Aregise, duke of Beneventum, and his eldest son, were both ready, and Charles, contrary to the sentiments of all his nobility, bestowed his territories on Grimoalde. The mother of that prince depended upon her influence over him; Charles, on the obligations he had conferred upon him. Grimoalde did justice to the king's sentiments; he commanded the van of the French army: the Greeks were totally defeated, their general killed, and Adalgise, being lucky enough to make his escape, laid aside all hopes of reviving the kingdom of the Lombards^k. This was one of the most fortunate years of the king's life. Towards the close of it he went to Aix la Chapelle; where, in a general assembly, he made many excellent laws for the government of his extensive territories, and caused many canons to be f made for regulating the discipline of the church^l. At his last being at Rome, the pope had made him a present of a code, containing the canons of the Oriental and African churches; out of this code he took such as he most approved, and, having properly adapted them to the use of the clergy in his own dominions, procured them the sanction of that assembly^m. He also introduced what was commonly called the Gregorian song, or manner of chanting, which was the mode in Italy, instead of that method of singing which had prevailed till then in France; and this not so much by the exertion of his authority, as by the force of his example; for he suffered his own choir to contend with that of the pope's at Rome, and, upon his preferring the latter, it gained the approbation of his clergy ^a.

The constant and assiduous application of this monarch to all affairs of government.

THE leisure, which the king now enjoyed, enabled him to carry many things into execution, which hitherto had only floated in his mind. We have observed, that he was a universal genius; it is but fit that we should give some proofs of it. The plans of government he laid down in every country immediately followed his conquests, and it was by this that he secured them. He took care to be well informed of the errors and mistakes in the preceding government, and he took no less care to remove these effectually ^b. He shewed particular attention to whatever regarded religion, and was very respectful, as well as very beneficent, to the clergy. He reviewed the laws, and made such alterations in them as he thought absolutely necessary, without going farther. He knew, that the people revered old customs, and the constitutions they had lived under from their youth; he took, therefore, all the care possible to preserve them; but he would have the law every-where animated, and suffered none to be exempt from its reach. He was particularly tender of the common people, and, where-ever he came, studied their ease and advantage. This induced him to repair public roads; to construct bridges where they were wanted; to render rivers navigable, and to encourage agriculture and commerce ^c. His being in continual motion enabled him to see his orders were complied with; and, as he made the public service the sole road to favour, his counts and dukes vied with each other in making improvements. In the summer, he was commonly in the field; where his habit and his table were little superior to those of private men. He was naturally very temperate, patient of fatigue, and always took his full share in every kind of hardship. In the winter, and in the spring, he held his great courts and general assemblies; there he affected a display of royal magnificence, proposed himself such laws as were for the public benefit, and indulged the same liberty to others ^d. But in the camp, and in the court, he had his set hours of study, which he seldom missed. He spoke and wrote Latin well; he composed and wrote verses in that language; he understood Greek; he had a tincture of most sciences; but his favourite study was astronomy ^e.

HE invited Alcuinus, or Albinus, over from Britain, and made him his companion and favourite: by his advice he established public foundations for the encouragement and support of literature. He had a kind of private academy in his court; every member of which took the name of his favourite author; one stiled himself Aristotle, another Augustin, a third Horace; Albinus assumed that of Flaccus, and the king himself took the name of David ^d. He condescended to examine all the young noblemen about their progress in learning; rewarded such as were diligent, and made others so by promises; for he dealt not at all in reproofs and punishments. In all the great abbeys and cathedrals he caused schools to be set up for teaching writing, arithmetic, and the elements of polite learning; and, to shew of how much importance he thought these things, he composed a grammar himself. In a word, he believed ignorance and idleness the greatest vices; and, to explode them, he took care to shew he held nothing beneath his own notice. Inquisitive and judicious, he was continually improving his stock of science; and yet had so little of jealousy or of envy; that, to foil him in a dispute was the surest way to his favour. His father Pepin, who felt the want of it, had given him, for those times, a good education; his frequent journeys into Italy, and his conversation with learned men of all nations, had given him a correct taste; and the signal advantages derived to him from his application to letters, induced him to look upon the restoration of learning as the great glory of his reign ^e. To have said nothing of this would have been injurious to his character; to insist longer upon this subject would exceed the bounds prescribed by our plan.

The war with the Abares, the conspiracy of prince Pepin, and punishment of him and his associates.

As his dominions augmented, he found himself embarrassed with new enemies. The Abodrites, or inhabitants of the country now called Mechlenburgh, were either his subjects or his tributaries; they were extremely harrassed by some of the tribes of the Slavonians, called, by some authors, Witse, seated on the shore of the Baltick ^f. They sent their complaints to Charles; who marched immediately to their relief, passed the Rhine at Cologne, and, taking with him the whole force of the Saxons, he constructed two bridges on the Elbe, which he took care to fortify: having left a corps of good troops to guard them, he gave the Saxons licence to enter the enemy's country, and take what they could find. This terrified the Barbarians to such a degree, that they submitted to any conditions he prescribed, and gave hostages for the performance of them; so that his dominions were now bounded by the Baltick ^e. The Huns gave him much more trouble; they harrassed Bavaria in such a manner, that he found it necessary to penetrate into their own country, which at length he did, with a numerous army, composed of most of the nations that were subject to his government ^f. The

- a Huns had a singular method of fortifying their country, with entrenchments of a vast extent, defended by the whole tribe whose territories they covered: these were attacked and defended with equal resolution, and, where-ever they were forced, a prodigious slaughter ensued. He pushed this expedition as far as Raab upon the Danube; and by marching his troops on both sides of that river, which the Bavarians had covered with boats, they were plentifully supplied with provisions; but, a distemper breaking out among the cavalry, he was constrained to return to Ratisbon, where he passed the winter; in which he met with more chagrin than he had hitherto done in the course of his life². One night, after he had retired to rest, he heard a disturbance in the outward apartment; and rising hastily to know what was the cause of it, he found a priest, whose name was Ardulfe, by nation a Lombard, of an unpromising figure, b and in a very mean dress, who was very clamorous to speak with the king. Charles called him immediately into the room; where he told him, that, dropping asleep in the corner of the church to which he belonged, he was waked by a number of voices, and found that his eldest son, prince Pepin, was there taking the last measures with his associates, for executing a design against his father's life; that this assembly discovered him as they were breaking up, and most of them were for securing themselves, by putting him to death; but the prince, having sworn him at the altar not to divulge what he had heard, let him go. The king caused Pepin, and the rest of the conspirators, to be arrested immediately; and, being convicted on full proof, they were condemned to suffer death; but the king chose rather that his son should live as a penitent, than die as a parricide; he sent him, therefore, to spend the rest of c his days in a convent. He soon after rewarded the priest for this service, by making him abbot of *St. Denis*³. His sons, Pepin, king of Lombardy, and Lewis, king of Aquitaine, hearing of this conspiracy, hastened to Ratisbon, where they found things tolerably quiet; but a train of fresh misfortunes followed^b.

- It was expected that the Abares, after what they had suffered from the last expedition, would have sent their deputies to demand peace; instead of that they returned to their habitations, restored their old works, threw up new retrenchments, and declared their definitive resolution, to cover with their dead bodies, rather than desert, the country in which they were born. Charles saw, with concern, the necessity he was under of acting against this determined nation^c. He ordered count Thierry to march, with a considerable body of forces, composed d chiefly of Frisons, to join the Saxons, who had behaved well the last campaign; but the first news he had was, that this whole nation was revolted, and count Thierry's army defeated, and the best part of them cut to pieces^d. Immediately after, he received intelligence, that the Moors had over-run most of his conquests in Spain; and, not satisfied with this, had made incursions into Languedoc, as far as Narbonne^e. His accounts from Italy were far from being pleasing; inasmuch that, from a state of absolute peace and tranquility, he found his dominions, on a sudden, almost attacked on every side. His conduct on this occasion was great almost beyond example; he sent some able officers, with instructions to his sons Pepin and Lewis; he recruited and augmented his own army till it became very numerous; but he undertook nothing against the barbarous nations, that he might see what turn affairs would e take^f.

- As he hated idleness, and knew that a great army, inactive, would soon grow seditious, he employed them in the execution of a design which he had long before formed, and which will ever do honour to his abilities: this was opening a communication between the ocean and the Euxine sea, by uniting the Danube and the Rhine. He foresaw the vast advantages that would result from thence to numberless nations, in succeeding times, and had likewise in view the facilitating the present object of his politics; which was the absolute reduction of the Abares, whose spirit and courage he admired, and therefore wished to see them converted to Christianity, and civilized^g. His scheme was to draw a canal from the river of Rednitz, the source of which is not far from Weissembourg, to the river of Altmul. The first of these rivers falls f into the Mein, near Bamberg, and the Mein into the Rhine, at Mentz, and the river Altmul joins the Danube between Ingoldstadt and Ratisbon. The canal he projected was to have been three hundred feet in breadth, and was to extend from Weissembourg to the river of Altmul, which is little more than six miles; but the soil, partly rocky and partly marshy, and the rainy season, with the want of those machines which art has since invented, rendered his endeavours abortive, by ruining all his works as fast as they were made; but the glory of forming this design, and the honour of having attempted it, were out of the power of accidents; and posterity must do justice to his memory, in acknowledging that he was one of those few heroes who had the advantage of mankind at heart, and who laboured to distinguish his conquests by monuments of his munificence and true public spirit^h. In the mean time, what the king expected came to pass; the Moors, being totally defeated in Spain by Alonso the chaste, king of Leon, were obliged to abandon all their conquests; so that Lewis, king of Aquitaine, and his ministers, found no great difficulty in restoring things on that side. In Italy the malecontents fell out among themselves; and pope Adrian was firm to the French interest, being convinced, by experience, that he could depend upon no other support: the clouds on that side likewise dispelled, which gave Charles an opportunity of renewing his former extensive projects; but that he might execute them with more ease, and at the same time efface the memory of past disasters, he resolved to hold a council at Frankfort; which he did with the consent of the pope, and presided therein with all the majesty of the antient emperors¹. But the transactions therein belong not to our present subject, for two reasons; first, as they regard ecclesiastical affairs, and next, as they belong properly to the history of Germany: we shall only observe, that the monk Tassilon resigned here, in the most solemn manner, all his rights to Bavaria; and Charles's fourth queen, Fastrade, died little regretted, on account of her vices and vindictive temper, either by her husband or his subjects.

The Saxons again reduced, and a third part obliged to quit their country.

A. D. 794.

ALL things being now disposed for chastising the Saxons, the king marched in person against them with his army, at the same time that his son Charles passed the Rhine at Cologne, with the best part of the forces that were left in France. The Saxons, on the other hand, assembled the whole force of all their cantons, determined to put all upon the fortune of a day. But the presence of this monarch had such an effect, that their army began to disband; so that their chiefs were forced to have recourse again to submissions, and to desire peace upon what terms he pleased². Charles prescribed only two conditions; the first was, that they should again admit the Christian clergy, and give hostages for their safety; the other, that they should deliver up one third-part of their army, to be sent where-ever he pleased. Hard as this last article was, they obeyed, and Charles distributed these Saxon troops on the maritime coasts of Holland and Flanders, where they did admirable service³. The next year, the king marched into the country of the Saxons, with a numerous army, in order to hold an assembly upon the Elbe; to which resorted, among other princes, the king of the Abodrites, at whose request he had chastised the Sclavonians, and who, in times of greatest danger, had invariably adhered to him; for which he was hated by the Saxons, who assassinated him upon the road. This provoked Charles to the last degree, who, in the heat of his resentment, abandoned the tribe who were guilty of this action to the discretion of his army; who slaughtered many thousands, and took every thing that was worth taking⁴. It appears from hence, that all submission in that fierce nation was the pure effect of fear, and subsisted no longer than that continued.

After an obstinate war, the Abares are reduced, and the Moors humbled.

THE death of pope Adrian gave the king real concern, which he expressed particularly in an epithet in Latin verse; in which there is less of elegance than passion⁵. Leo the third was chosen the same day that his predecessor died; he sent immediately his legates to Charles, with rich presents, the keys of St. Peter's tomb, and the standard of Rome; desiring that he would send some person of confidence to receive the oaths of the Roman people, in quality of patrician, or protector of the holy see. The king immediately dispatched his secretary Engilbert, abbot of St. Riquier; and his instructions, written with great piety and dignity, are yet extant. The war with the Abares, or Huns, was by this time in a manner finished: Henry, duke of Frioul, defeated them in a general engagement, and made himself master of their capital, called Ringa, though obstinately defended, with prodigious slaughter of the inhabitants, and found therein immense riches, consisting in the spoil and plunder of various nations, which they had been amassing for many years⁶. Pepin, king of Italy, completed this conquest, and in another battle killed the Khan, which put an end to the war; and, as some writers say, to the people, who were in a manner extirpated; only one canton, of which Thudin was the chief, submitted, were baptized, and received into the king's protection. This did not hinder the northern Saxons from taking up arms again, and murdering one of the lords of Charles's court, who was returning from an embassy; which was attended with the usual consequences, rapine, slaughter, and, at length, a forced submission⁷. The king now spent his winter at Aix la Chapelle, with his fifth queen, and there received many embassies, that did him great honour, and some that must have given him great satisfaction. Amongst the former we may reckon that from Irene, empress of Constantinople, to apologize for her own conduct in putting out the eyes of and deposing her own son, and to propose a marriage between herself and the king. These ambassadors were entertained very honourably, though Charles very well knew she was at that time embarked in several intrigues that were prejudicial to his interests⁸. On the other hand, we may comprehend, among the latter, the submission of several Moorish lords, and application for protection on the behalf of others, whom he referred

a. His son Lewis, king of Aquitaine; who, by his direction, sent an army to their assistance, and, with the help of the natives, recovered the islands of Majorca and Minorca; which, by this means, were annexed to his dominions^r. But if these events gave him joy, there was another that gave him pain. Pascal and Campule, nephews of the late pope Adrian, attacked pope Leo in the streets of Rome, on the feast of St. Mark, and dragged him into the church, with an intent to put out his eyes, and cut out his tongue, and from thence remove him into a monastery, where they intended to have kept him prisoner; but, being happily delivered by his friends, the duke of Spoletto, then general of the French forces, came and took him into his protection, and soon after, with a good escorte, he set out to lay his own case before the king. Charles, at the time of his arrival, was at Paderborn; from whence he set out to meet him, and shewed him, upon this occasion, all possible marks of respect. He sent him back some time after with numerous guards and attendance, and appointed commissaries to enquire into this affair at Rome; at the same time he promised him, that he would come in person to render him justice, and to settle the affairs of Italy, which were again in great disorder^s. A. D. 799.

At this time the Normans, that is, the inhabitants of the northern nations (for some tribes of the Saxons, as well as the inhabitants of Denmark, and perhaps some other nations, were included under that name), began to render themselves famous by their piracies. This obliged the king to be very attentive to the safety of the sea-coasts, for which he provided very effectually; establishing fortresses at the mouths of most of the great rivers, a regular militia, destined for that purpose only, along the shore, and squadrons, properly stationed, to cruize in quest of these invaders: that he might see how well his intentions were executed, he went in person, and examined them with the strictest attention^t. In the month of March he finished his tour; and, having passed the Seine at Rouen, went to perform his devotions at the tomb of St. Martin; where the counts of Bretagne, who had been in rebellion, and were but lately reduced, came to pay their respects, and to make their presents. He made a longer stay than he intended at Tours, by reason of the sickness and death of his last queen Lutgarde^u. He returned from thence, by Orleans and Paris, to Aix la Chapelle, and in the month of August held a general assembly at Mentz; where he declared, so far as was fit, the motives which induced him to make a journey into Italy^v. He set out soon after, though we have no distinct account of his route, and came, with an army, to Ravenna: from whence he dispatched the king of Italy to reduce Grimoalde, duke of Beneventum; which he performed, or, at least, we learn of no considerable resistance made by that duke^x. The measures taken to secure all the frontiers of his dominions.

CHARLES in the mean time proceeded to Rome, with a small corps of troops, was met at some distance by pope Leo, and made his entry with him into that city on the twenty-fourth of November^y. After some days spent in proper enquiries, the cause was solemnly heard; and none appearing to prove the crimes that had been alleged against the pope, he rose up of his own accord, and declared in the most solemn manner, upon oath, that he was not guilty of them, by act, order, or connivance^z. The trial of the assassins was next brought on; and, being convicted in the presence of the king, they were condemned to death; but the pope interposed, and desired that he would spare their lives: he went farther, and intreated that they might not suffer in their persons, but that they might be exiled, so as to give him no farther apprehensions^a. This was in itself a very extraordinary scene; but there followed, on Christmas day, one much more extraordinary. The king going to assist at mass, while he was upon his knees before the altar, the pope came and placed a rich crown upon his head; upon which the people cried aloud, "Long live Charles the august, crowned by the hand of God; Long life and victory to the great and pacific emperor of the Romans." During these acclamations, the pope conducted him to a throne, which had been prepared for him; and, as soon as he was seated, paid him those respects which his predecessors were wont to pay to the antient emperors. He then declared, that, instead of the title of patrician, he should stile him for the future emperor and Augustus, and at the same time presented the imperial mantle; with which being invested, he returned, amidst the acclamations of the people, to his palace^b. His secretary Eginard affirms, that he was so far from shewing either joy or satisfaction upon this occasion, that he declared he was not in the least apprised of the pope's intention; and that, if he had, he would, notwithstanding the solemnity of the feast, have forborn going to church. The reason he assigned was, that this ceremony added nothing to his power, and would only confer on himself and his posterity a pompous title, that might be attended with many inconveniencies^c. Whether this, all circumstances considered, deserves credit, we pretend not to decide, the fact rests upon its author; but this is certain, that Is crowned by pope Leo III. emperor of the west, at Rome, with universal applause. Charlemagne was ever after very tenacious of that title, and insisted upon being owned in this quality by the emperors of the east, whom he treated thenceforward on the foot of equality. in his return he took Pavia in his way ; where he made some amendments and additions to the laws of the Lombards.

The Persian monarch, by his ambassadors, makes a cession to Charles of the holy place.

THE war against the Moors, who had lately thrown aside the respect they had sworn to maintain towards his father, obliged Lewis, king of Aquitaine, to take up arms against them ; and though it was at the expence of a long and bloody war, yet, in the issue of it, he compelled them to submit, and brought things into very near the same state in which Charles had left them ^a. Pepin, king of Italy, met with more speedy success. The town of Rieti, which was near the territory held by the Greeks, revolted at their instigation. It was strong, and had some good posts in its neighbourhood ; but Pepin quickly took these, and reduced that : upon which, having ordered the people to withdraw, he burnt it to ashes ^b. The governors of Barcelona and Rieti, who had been the authors of these disturbances, were sent prisoners by the two young kings to the emperor their father. Charlemagne had the additional satisfaction of seeing ambassadors from the Persian monarch at his court, whom he brought with him out of Italy, and carried them through France into Germany. Amongst other entertainments, he diverted them with the fighting of wild buffaloes, which, however, put them in great danger of their lives, and the emperor, who relieved them, in much greater ; insomuch that he had certainly lost his life, if a nobleman, whose name was Issembart, who had lost his favour, and had all his estates taken from him, and was present in disguise, had not killed one of those furious creatures, at the very instant he was on the point of bearing down the emperor and his horse ; for which service he not only restored to him his honours, but loaded him also with many additional favours ^c. By these ambassadors, their master made a cession of the holy places at Jerusalem to Charlemagne, which furnished the romance writers with an opportunity of pretending the emperor went thither in person, and conquered them from the Infidels, not discerning that the matter of fact, plainly and simply related, was infinitely more honourable to Charlemagne than their ridiculous fiction ^d. These ambassadors were men of sense ; and having been treated with some contempt in the places through which they passed in France, complained to the emperor that he was least respected in the heart of his dominions ; upon which he removed the governors, and fined the bishops who had afforded occasion for this complaint ^e.

Charlemagne compels the emperor Nicephorus to acknowledge him, and conclude a peace.
A. D. 802.

THE restless behaviour of Grimoalde, duke of Beneventum, and his continual intrigues with the Greeks, induced Charlemagne to entertain serious thoughts of depriving him of his duchy, and the Greeks of their territories, or, in other words, to render himself the sole master of Italy ^f. He could not conduct this design of his with so much secrecy, as to prevent its coming to the notice of the empress Irene, the most artful woman of her time, who flattered herself that she had more than once over-reached him in negotiation ^g. To prevent him therefore, and to secure herself, she sent a nobleman of great consideration, to make him a proposal of marriage. This, Charlemagne, who had then been a widower two years, and had a great passion for the sex, very readily accepted, and sent two ambassadors of his own to conclude the terms. In this, therefore, Irene, with all her skill, was mistaken ; for Charlemagne was not to be outwitted, since, whenever he undertook any thing of importance, he provided at the same time for the measures which were fit for him to pursue, in case he did or did not succeed, which was the great secret of his administration, and prevented its being ever disappointed ^h. In this very affair he took such precautions, that, in all probability, Irene, whatever her first design might be in the treaty, must have espoused him, if by a conspiracy, undertaken and executed in a night, she had not been deposed by Nicephorus, who banished her to the island of Mitylene. Yet this did not baffle the schemes of Charlemagne, whose preparations for war were so formidable, that Nicephorus found himself under the necessity of giving him the title of Augustus, and of settling the boundaries between the two empires, by a treaty to his satisfaction, though the peace did not last long ⁱ.

Obliges also the king of the Normans to desist from hostilities, and to conclude a treaty.

WHILE Charlemagne was thus employed, Godfrey, king of the Danes or Normans, projected a very dangerous invasion on his dominions, both by land and sea : previous to which, by his intrigues, the Saxons, for the eighth time, betook themselves to arms ; but the emperor entered their country so unexpectedly, and with so great a force, that, after sustaining great loss, they were obliged to submit ^j. He punished them by transporting many thousands into Switzerland, and a much greater number into Picardy and the Low Countries ; at the same time he removed the Abrodites out of their own country into Saxony, which intirely broke the spirits of the Saxons, or rather weakened their force to such a degree, that they were never

- a afterwards able to rebel °. At the same time the guards he posted along the coasts behaved with such vigilance and intrepidity, that the Normans, finding it impossible to make any impression, thought it most expedient, for their own interest, to conclude a peace, which Godfrey once thought of negotiating in person, and to facilitate which, Charlemagne advanced with a corps of troops to the Elbe. Godfrey came thither also with a very numerous body of horse; but fearing, or pretending to fear, that his person might be seized, they treated by deputies, by whom a kind of convention was concluded, whereby the emperor's subjects were restrained from making incursions into the territories of the Normans, who, on the other hand, engaged that his fleets should respect the territories of Charlemagne ^p. An agreement founded in the interests of both parties, and which subsisted so long as they considered these in the same light.

A. D. 805.

- b THE emperor beginning to feel himself, notwithstanding the vigour of his constitution, by his continual fatigues, and by his excesses in respect to women, much decayed, held an assembly at Thionville, where he made an authentic disposition of his dominions, by which he gave Aquitaine and Gascony, together with the Spanish marches, to his son Lewis; his Italian dominions he confirmed to Pepin, together with the best part of Bavaria, and the countries at present inhabited by the Grisons; the countries in those days stiled Neustria, Aufirasia, and Thuringia, were left to Charles, who, as the eldest, was also the most powerful of the three. In this instrument all things are very clearly expressed, and all possible provisions made, to prevent disputes between the three young princes, during their lives, or with regard to their successions, in case of their decease. This disposition having been publicly read in the assembly, was subscribed by the emperor, and by the principal nobility that were present; after which it was sent by his secretary to Rome, in order to render it more authentic by the subscription of the pope ^q. It is very remarkable that in this instrument there is not only no notice taken of the imperial dignity, but also, there is an express reservation of the sovereign authority to the emperor during his life, as well from the three kings, as from all their respective subjects. The very same year, the two kings of Aquitaine and Italy, who had been present in the assembly, returning into their dominions, obtained several advantages against the Infidels, whom Pepin drove out of Corfica, and Lewis defeated in Catalonia ^r. Charles also made an expedition into Bobemia, where he defeated a tribe of the Sclavonians, that had rebelled and killed their duke. In the winter arrived at Aix la Chapelle, from that great prince whom the French stile monarch of Persia, and who makes so great figure in oriental authors under the name of the Khalif Aaron al Raschid, several ambassadors, who were kindly received, and most magnificently entertained: amongst their presents was a clock, the first ever seen in France ^s.

- c THE next year Lewis, king of Aquitaine, found himself involved in a war with the Moors in Catalonia, which he managed with indifferent success, and was, at the same time, embarrassed with several squadrons of Norman pirates upon his coasts; but, having received early intelligence of these from his father, he took such precautions for the security of his coasts, that they were able to give his subjects but little trouble ^t. As we have already used this word often, and shall be obliged to repeat it frequently, it is requisite to observe, that we comply in this with the French historians, within the compass of this period, who stile all the northern nations, without distinction, Normans; nor is it of any consequence to history, or at least to this part of our history, to inquire minutely into this matter, since the usage of these times makes it necessary to use the term; the sense of which, once settled, can lead us into no mistake. There happened, about this period, some new broils in Italy, which historians attribute to the Venetians, who, by the last treaty, were left to live under their own laws and their own dukes, but, at the same time, were to render just homage to both empires; which, as they found it difficult to do, and were desirous of independency, they conceived it their interest to embarrass them in new disputes. Pope Leo, who foresaw the consequences of their intrigues, judged it requisite to make a journey into France, to give the emperor a right idea of the state of things in Italy. In consequence of his informations, Charlemagne sent instructions to his son Pepin, to keep his naval force in constant order, as the most effectual means to preserve the peace of his dominions; and it was by following this advice exactly, that he repelled both the Moors and the Greeks, as often as they gave him any disturbance ^u. In like manner Charlemagne covered the rest of his extensive territories, having ports at the mouths of all considerable rivers ^w, guardships on the coasts, fortifications along the shore, and a militia properly disposed for the defence of these fortifications.

By his wife and firm conduct the Norman and other pirates are kept from making any impressions.

It quickly appeared that the emperor had judged rightly of the precautions necessary against the Normans. Their king Godfrey, though, as we shall see in its proper place, the Norman ^x war breaks out with Godfrey, king of nations give him another name, had the courage not only to break again with the French, but to project and to undertake a war of continuance. He began with making an irruption into the country of the Abodrites, than whom no German nation had ever more steadily adhered to Charlemagne, and not only drove Traficon, one of their dukes, out of his dominions, but also caused another, whose name was Godelaibe, whom by some means or other he got into his hands, to be hanged up, merely for opposing his passage: after which he reduced a great tract of country, and had certainly pushed his conquests much farther, if the emperor had not ordered his eldest son Charles to advance, with a great army, towards the Elbe^a. This had the effect that was expected; for the Norman, who, in the course of the campaign, had bought his victories dear, retired into his own dominions, where he shewed both his spirit and skill, by providing at the same time, with equal vigilance, for the defence of his own dominions, and for a fresh irruption into those of the emperor in the spring; while prince Charles, having erected a fortress upon the Elbe, at or near the place where Hamburg is now situated, returned and put his troops into winter quarters^y. Lewis, king of Aquitaine, made another expedition in person against the Moors, from whom he recovered several places; Pepin, king of Italy, with the assistance of his father's squadrons, repressed both the Moors and the Greeks, and gained some advantages over the Venetians, by their general's being averse to making war by sea, in person. This year, by the interposition of the emperor and the pope, Ædulf, king of Northumberland, who had been dethroned and driven out of his kingdom by his subjects, was restored^z; the emperor, through his whole reign, holding a fair correspondence with the Saxon kings in Britain.

In the spring there was a negotiation for peace, between the emperor and the king of the Normans, which was broke off by the latter; and upon Charlemagne's threatening, for so it was in effect, to come and settle these disputes on his frontiers, Godfrey gave him to understand, that possibly he might save him that trouble, by coming with an army to the gates of Aix la Chapelle^a. He was indeed the most formidable enemy that, in the course of his long reign, the emperor had to deal with; who notwithstanding prevented his making the irruption he intended, by sending count Egbert, with a numerous army, on the other side the Elbe, while duke Traficon, at the head of his own subjects, the Saxons, and other vassals of the empire, recovered the country he had conquered the preceding year, and gave him full employment at home. The Greeks made a descent not far from Ravenna, with an intent to besiege the city of Comachio, but were beaten, and obliged to retire to their ships. The Moors also made a descent upon Corfica, and ravaged a great part of the island^b. In Spain, the king of Aquitaine attempted the recovery of Tortosa, which had been surprized in the winter, without effect, and one of his generals was also obliged to raise the siege of Huesca^c. In the mean time Charlemagne held a council at Aix la Chapelle, with all the state of a Christian emperor, in which he shewed great zeal for the doctrine and discipline of the church. He spent also no small portion of his time in revising the several codes of laws, by which his subjects, in different parts of his empire, were governed, and made such alterations in them as he thought necessary; for he persisted in his maxim of governing every nation by their own laws, without making any changes, but those that were absolutely requisite for their own benefit^d. He likewise heard the reports that were made to him by the governors of provinces, and such as administered justice. He heard also the complaints of all such as held themselves aggrieved, whether laity or clergy, and had set times for receiving and answering petitions. It is very wonderful that, with all these great affairs upon his hands, he should find leisure to collect, as he did, all the old poems and historical songs, relating to the exploits of his predecessors, which he did with a view to a complete history of the monarchy; and it is a great misfortune to posterity, that these collections are dissipated and gone^e. It is the surest mark of an universal genius that it finds time for all things. Charlemagne's dominions were more extended than those of any Christian monarch, and yet they were less extensive than his capacity.

THINGS at the opening of the year had but an unpleasant aspect. The officer who commanded in the marches of Spain dying, the Moorish governor of Saragossa and Huesca easily over-ran them, more especially as he pretended to hold them as a vassal of the empire. The Gascons likewise began to murmur, and to pay little or no obedience to king Lewis: the party of the Greeks also became the strongest in Italy; and this obliging Pepin to withdraw some of his forces out of the islands, the Moors took the advantage, and in a short space of time made themselves masters of the best part of Corfica^f. To heighten this gloomy prospect, the whole north was in motion, to put it out of the emperor's power to send either of his sons the succours which the situation of their affairs required. Charlemagne, however, without being

- a disconcerted, applied himself with vigour to dispose all things on every side for the support of his government; and, while he was thus employed, the cloud gradually dispelled. Lewis, king of Aquitaine, entered the rough country of the Gascons with a well appointed army, from which, as they were not able to resist, they fled, but with a full resolution to attack his rear, upon his return out of Spain. Lewis took no pains to pursue; but, having taken a single man, caused him to be hanged up, and declared his resolution to treat all in the same manner who did not submit^e. He seized their old men, together with the women and children, as hostages, for the safety of his troops in their return. Having recovered the frontiers from the Moors, he repassed the mountains, without any loss, upon which the Gascons thought it their interest to submit. Pepin had the like success against his enemies, insomuch that Nicephorus
- b judged it expedient to send ambassadors to Charlemagne, with whom they concluded a peace. But it was otherwise with respect to Godfrey, king of the Normans, against whom the emperor provided, as he had done formerly, by causing a numerous army to pass the Elbe, and advancing several other corps towards the frontiers^h.

- THAT king, who was not inferior to Charlemagne in martial abilities, having left a considerable army to support the Sclavonians, with proper instructions how to act, embarked his best troops on board a fleet of two hundred sail, and, before the emperor had any intelligence of his design, attacked the islands on the coast of Friezland, reduced them, and then made a descent, with all his troops, upon the continent. The French and the Frisons, that is, the marine, militia, and the natives, assembled as great a force as they could to oppose his passage; but Godfrey having attacked and defeated them, struck the adjacent provinces with a general consternationⁱ. Charlemagne assembled all the troops he could, which were not very considerable upon the Rhine, in order to make head against this bold invader; but, when he expected a decisive battle, he had intelligence that the enemy had abandoned their conquests, and were embarking on board their fleet. This strange turn was occasioned by the assassination of Godfrey, by one of his guards. His son was of a different temper; his first care was to acquaint Charlemagne, that he was sincerely disposed to peace; he assured him, in return, that he had the same inclination; upon which a cessation of arms ensued, the conferences being deferred to the spring^k. The satisfaction he received from hence was very much qualified by the death of his beloved daughter, the princess Rotrude, and by that of Pepin, king of Italy, who,
- d with great courage and abilities, had a profound respect, and a most tender affection for his father. He left behind him a son, Bernard, and five daughters. The emperor expressed more grief than some thought consistent with his dignity; but Charles was none of those heroes who are unaffected by the softer passions, or of those politicians who thought it requisite to dissemble them. He wept for his son, and, at the same time, he declared Bernard, though an infant, and a natural son, king of Italy^l. In this it seems he had the consent and concurrence of Lewis, king of Aquitaine, upon which he very much depended.

- THE spring opened with the negotiations with the new king of the Normans, and a congress was held in Jutland, at which twelve ministers from each of the monarchs assisted, who concluded a solid peace. This did not hinder the emperor from sending two numerous armies, one on the other side the Elbe, the other into Pannonia, to settle a dispute between the Huns and the Sclavonians: at the same time, a third marched into Bretagne, where they put an end to some stirrs that had happened, when the emperor's affairs were thought to be in a bad posture. In the mean time Charles went in person to see all things restored on the sea coast; and having passed as far as Bologne, caused the port to be fortified, made it a capital station for one of his squadrons, and erected a noble pharos, to prevent any accident by vessels entering in the night^m. At his return to Aix la Chapelle, he met with a new mortification, in the death of his eldest son Charles. His grandson, Bernard, going into Italy, under the direction of count Wallon, found all things in great confusion, the Moors, both of Africa and Spain, being ready to make a descent on Sardinia and Corfica, and Grimoalde, duke of Beneventum, in arms. In
- f Sardinia, where the Moors actually landed, they met with such a reception, as left them no inclination to try their fortune in *Corfica*ⁿ. Count Wallon marched into the dominions of Grimoalde, and gave him so severe a check, that he was glad to submit, and to pay an annual tribute of twenty-five thousand pieces of gold, as the price of his folly. The emperor Nicephorus being killed, and his son deposed, Michael, his son-in-law, who mounted the throne, renewed the peace with Charlemagne, and sent his ambassadors to Aix la Chapelle to assure him of his cordial friendship: as a proof of it, they studied in their harangues to give him all the titles annexed to the imperial dignity, so that now his dominions were on every side at peace, which the Moors, after their late defeat, were glad to renew^o.

He associates
his only surviving son Lewis, king of Aquitaine,
in the empire.

As the emperor was now towards seventy, had been for some years infirm, and was particu- a larly subject to the gout, of which he had a very severe fit in the winter, he bent his thoughts intirely to the preservation of those advantages to his subjects after his demise, which it had been the study and the endeavour of his whole life to procure. He judged it the shortest method for this purpose, to associate his only son Lewis in the empire. With this view he sent for him to court, where a general assembly was held of the prelates and nobility throughout his dominions, with whom he consulted upon this occasion, and who chearfully and unanimously gave their consent^p. On the day fixed for the ceremony, Charlemagne, invested with all the ensigns of the imperial dignity, and attended by the great officers of his household, went with his son, in state, to the church or chapel which he had built, and from which the city of Aix derives the distinction of la Chapelle. There they both b presented themselves before the high altar, where, after having spent some time in prayer, the emperor told his son, that being by birth called to that high dignity, it should be the business of his life to endeavour to discharge it worthily. In order to this, he recommended to him a serious zeal for religion; charged him to look upon the prelates as his fathers, and upon the people as his children; exhorted him to be kind to his relations, gentle in his administration, but, at the same time, steady and firm in the execution of justice: he added, that he should be ever ready to reward merit, should prefer his nobility gradually, use great deliberation in the choice of ministers; but, when once chosen, never remove them from caprice, or support them when clearly convicted of crimes. He then asked him, if he was willing to govern in this manner? Lewis answered, that he esteemed c it his greatest felicity to obey his commands, and that his memory should never let slip his counsel. The emperor ordered him then to take a rich crown, which was set for that purpose on the high altar, and set it on his own head; and after divine service was performed, they returned to the palace^q. In a few days Lewis returned into Aquitaine, where his presence was requisite; and Charlemagne caused, the same year, councils to be held at Arles, Rheims, Mentz, Tours, and at Chalons on the Soame, being very desirous that all things should be reduced into the best order possible while he was yet alive (D). He likewise renewed the peace with the Normans, who had lately a new king. The Moors had broken the peace lately concluded at their own request, and having no other war upon his hands, Charles d employed the naval force of his empire to make them sensible of their perfidy, in which he was very successful, though at first they did some mischief, by invading the continent, and the coast of Italy. There happened a new revolution in the Greek empire, which, however, did not alter the harmony which had been lately re-established, the new emperor being as desirous of preserving it as his predecessor had been, and for that purpose dispatched ambassadors to Charlemagne, who did not arrive till after his decease^r.

Charlemagne.

ABOUT the middle of the month of January, at his coming out of the bath, the emperor felt himself feverish: he was always averse to physic, believing exercise the best means of preserving, and abstinence the surest way of recovering, health. His maxim failed him on this occasion, for in three or four days his disease became a pleurisy, and from this time he applied himself only to prepare for his great change; on the 27th he fell into an agony, and on the

(D) The magnificence of Charlemagne appeared in the dyets, or general assemblies, where he was attended by his vassals, prelates, governors of provinces, and all who held great employments under him. We are not to suppose that these were always present; but when this duty was omitted it was by the emperor's permission, and those that were excused sent their agents or deputies, qualified to give the emperor such informations as he required. At these seasons of festivity he appeared in all his imperial ornaments, and received presents from all the members of the assembly, which, in succeeding times, were stiled free gifts. In these assemblies those laws were made which were intituled Capitulars, of which we have a complete collection extant, and appear to have been all made by the advice, and with the assent, of the nobility and prelates assisting.
Some of the vassals or princes of barbarous nations, and some of the great lords in Italy, held their estates by hereditary right; but the dukes and counts among the French were officers, removeable at his pleasure, and he was equally cautious in displacing them, and in giving their honours to their sons. For the young nobility, they were generally bred up at his court, and under his eye, so that he was better acquainted with their inclinations and capacities than their parents, and he preferred them accordingly, pursuant to his own maxim, that lands were to be inherited, but that honours and employments were the reward of merit. At these seasons the time was spent in business and diversions of every kind, in which the emperor was very indulgent. At other times he was modest in his dress, frugal at his table, and a declared enemy to luxury, as appears from his sumptuary laws, which were very strict, and from the following odd instance, sharper than any law. He observed the nobility about him dressed one winter in very fine silk robes, lined with fur of great price. He carried them with him to hunt one rainy morning, through woods, and other places; and, when they came in, permitted nobody to change their habits, saying, they would dry better by the fire, which shri-velled all the torn furs, and spoiled them entirely. The next morning he directed they should appear in the cloaths they wore the day before. When the court was pretty full, "What a tattered company have I about me," said he; "while my sheep skin cloak, which I turn this way or that as the weather fits, is not at all the worse for yesterday's wear. For shame, learn to dress like men, and let the world judge of your ranks from your merit, not from your habit: leave silks and finery to women, or to those days of pomp and ceremony, when robes are worn for shew, and not for use."

- a 28th, feeling his strength quite exhausted, he said with a low voice, Into thy hands, Lord, I commend my spirit, and so immediately expired, in the seventy-first year of his age, the forty-seventh of his reign, the forty-third from his conquest of Italy, and the fourteenth from his being crowned emperor^a. He made a new will, as a private man, by which he distributed his treasures amongst his children, and to several churches throughout all parts of his dominions. He gave no directions as to the place of his burial, and therefore those about him caused his corpse to be interred in the church of Aix la Chapelle, and erected a tomb, covered by a triumphal arch; with a short and modest epitaph^b. He was most sincerely regretted by his subjects of all ranks, but more especially by those who were nearest his person, with whom he lived in great familiarity, being one of the few princes who could enter into the companionable pleasures of private life; without prejudice to his dignity. His application to public affairs was very great and very constant: he was very easy of access, and scarce thought any thing too mean for his notice; but he was far from being suspicious, credulous, or cruel. By the mildness of his government he acquired the affection of his subjects, but kept his vassals within the bounds of their duty, by never suffering them to transgress it with impunity. He rewarded all services speedily and suitably; and, in order to this, he rarely bestowed more than one office upon the same man. He had his failings; and, amongst these, the greatest was indulgence to the failings of others; for he would not punish in his neighbour the liberties he took himself^c. In a word, he was extremely amiable in his private life, as well as very illustrious in his public character; and this we may say with the greater assurance, since we have very ample memoirs of his life, written by his secretary; as well as some other pieces by cotemporary writers.

S E C T. IV.

The reigns of Lewis the Gentle, Charles the Bald, Lewis the Stammerer, emperors and kings of France; Lewis and Carloman, kings; and Charles the Gross, emperor and king, or regent of France.

- d AT the time of his father's death, Lewis, king of Aquitaine, held an assembly of the states of his dominions, which he speedily dismissed, in order to comply with the desires of the nobility, who thought his presence requisite at Aix la Chapelle (A). His territories were of a vast extent, and demanded all the attention that could be given, even by a

Conduct of Lewis at his entrance on the administration of the western empire.

^a ADON Chron.^b EGINARD, vita Caroli mag.^c ADON. Chron.

(A) Lewis, the youngest son of Charlemagne, who attained the age of manhood, was crowned king, and sent into Aquitaine, when a child of between three and four years of age. He was educated with great care and strictness: he understood the Greek well, and wrote and spoke the Latin tongue correctly and eloquently. He was no less adroit in his exercises; so that there was not a better horseman, a better archer, or one who handled a lance with a better air than he in his whole dominions. He was tall and strong, though not either so tall or robust as his father: his countenance was high-coloured, and his aspect always serious. He fell into some licenses in his youth, and had one natural son, Arnold, to whom he gave the county of Sens; but he reformed early and sincerely, became very religious, and not only exact but austere in his morals. His father sent for him frequently to court, instructed him in the art of government, carried him to the wars, and laboured to inspire him with sentiments suitable to his condition, in which he did not altogether succeed. His administration, however, in Aquitaine, after he came to years of discretion, was such as gained him very high reputation. The regularity of his manners procured him the surname of Pious. His attention to his domain, and the frugal management of his revenues, enabled him to live with all the splendor of a prince; and, at the same time, would have kept his coffers full, if his charity and liberality had not found other uses for his money. He gave with his own hands, and with so good a grace, that from thence he was stiled the Debonnaire. He found his country full of disorders, and in the worst condition possible; the nobility headstrong, haughty, and oppressive; the clergy proud, ignorant, and lewd; the common people lazy, indigent, and prone to all sorts of vices. He brought about a general and wonderful reformation, and that by his own example and authority. He applied himself to government, as a profession to which he was called by Providence: he administered justice steadily and strictly: he punished but reluctantly, and without severity: he rewarded liberally, and avowed satisfaction. His father sent commissaries to inspect his behaviour; and their report was such, that the emperor could not help bursting out into this exclamation; "Let us give thanks to God, for having given us a son wiser than ourselves!" There was scarce a grievance known in his whole dominions. His only fault was his being over religious; which inclined him to follow the example of his uncle Carloman, and induced him to think of retiring into a convent. This was very disagreeable to Charles, who remonstrated to him, with some degree of heat, that Providence had called him to another kind of life: that it was his duty to respect that call, and that he ought to think of serving God as a prince, and not as a monk. He afterwards came to discern that his father was in the right; and it had been happy for him if he had discerned it sooner, and understood it better. We have shewn in the text, in what manner he was associated by his father in the empire; we shall only add, that, at the time he succeeded him, he was thirty-six years of age, and had espoused Ermengarde, the daughter of Enguend, count of Hesbai, in the diocese of Liege, who had more of his esteem than of his affection, by whom he was the father of those sons, who, through the course of his life and reign, gave him so much disquiet.

prince of the most extensive genius: Italy indeed had been bestowed upon his nephew Bernard,^a the son of Pepin, upon whom Lewis had no other claim than that of homage; but besides the ancient kingdoms of Austrasia, Neustria, and Burgundy, Lewis held in Spain what are now stiled the countries of Navarre, Arragon, and Catalonia. In Germany, beyond the Rhine, he held all the country of Saxony, the Upper and Lower Pannonia, Dacia on the north side the Danube, Istria, Croatia, Dalmatia, and a good part of the country now stiled Poland^a. In his passage to Aix la Chapelle he was met by Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, who had great credit with his father; he gave him a distinct idea of the state of the court, and inspired him with a jealousy of count Wallon, or Walla, the grandson of Charles Martel, and esteemed one of the wisest men of that age: he likewise insinuated the apprehensions that a great part of the court was under, but more especially his sisters, from the gravity of his disposition,^b and the severity of his morals, which induced him to send orders for arresting some of those princesses favourites; and one of them making some resistance, was killed, which occasioned his treating the rest with more rigour than he intended. However, he succeeded peaceably to the empire, and Walla was the first who did him homage^b. He executed his father's will with great punctuality, except with regard to some of his sisters, who being in his opinion too slenderly provided for, he supplied them with what he judged requisite for their maintenance. He dismissed them, however, from the court, and sent them to the abbeys which Charlemagne had assigned them. He retained his three natural brothers, and took care of their education, causing them to eat at his own table. He held an assembly, in which he confirmed all his father's grants; and being informed that some Spanish families,^c who had retired into his dominions to escape the tyranny of the Moors, were oppressed by his subjects, and reduced to a kind of vassalage, which differed but little from slavery, he redressed that grievance, and set them intirely at liberty^c. On receiving the homage of the duke of Beneventum, he lessened his tribute to seven thousand pieces of gold: he restored the Saxons and the Frisons to their rights of inheritance, of which they had been deprived by his father for their frequent rebellions, for which he was generally blamed; yet the event shewed he was in the right, for they remained inviolably attached to him^d. He received the ambassadors of the Greek emperor, and other princes, favourably, and renewed the several treaties of peace that had been concluded with them. He had, at his accession, three sons, Lothaire, Pepin, and Lewis: he sent the eldest into Bavaria, the second into Aquitaine,^d and appointed ministers to manage their affairs^e. His father's example seems to have been to him a law, perhaps without a due retrospect to his motives.

A. D. 814.

A conspiracy, formed by Bernard, king of Italy, against the emperor, defeated.

AMONG those who addressed themselves to Lewis at his accession, was a Danish or Norman prince, whose name was Heriolt, to whom he promised his protection; and an attempt was made this year to restore him, which however did not succeed. The emperor held an assembly at Paderborn, where his nephew Bernard, king of Italy, and other princes, assisted; and it was soon after this, that he received the news of another conspiracy against the life of pope Leo, which having been discovered in time, and those who were concerned in it secured, the pope caused them to be executed, with which the emperor being displeased, directed Bernard, king of Italy, to go to Rome, and by his presence put an end to these disorders^f. This was done effectually by the death of the pope, who was succeeded by Eugenius V. This pontif did not wait for the emperor's confirmation, which he took amiss, and the pope, to sooth him, made a journey into France, where he was received with all possible honour; and having crowned the emperor and empress at Rheims, returned into Italy, where he did not long survive^g. The emperor caused a council to be held, for establishing ecclesiastical discipline at Aix la Chapelle; and there he likewise gave audience to some Moorish ambassadors, and to those of the Greek emperor. He likewise received ambassadors from the kings of the Normans, who solicited him warmly to abandon Heriolt; but to break his word, and to desert a prince in distress, was not the character of this monarch: he heard the advantageous proposals they made, but, after hearing them, he sent them back without an answer^h.

Disorders in Italy, where the popes are disposed to shake off all dependency.

ANOTHER great assembly was held at Aix la Chapelle, in which the emperor declared his intention to associate one of his sons in that dignity, after the example of his father, though the case was very different, and the reasons which determined the one were not at all applicable to the other. After a fast of three days, to implore the direction of heaven in the emperor's choice, he declared Lothaire, his eldest son, his coadjutor; at the same time he created Pepin king of Aquitaine, and Lewis king of Bavaria; and, after the ceremonies of their coronations were over, sent them into their respective dominionsⁱ. This news scarce reached Italy before Bernard took up arms, and having a strong party in France, he flattered himself

- a himself with the hopes of deposing the emperor. Lewis upon this occasion acted with greater vigour than either his friends or his enemies expected: he assembled a puissant army, and began his march directly, with a full intention to pass the Alps, and put an end to this defection. But by that time he arrived at Chalons on the Soame, the face of affairs changed strangely. Some of the great lords in Italy refused to join Bernard; those who had joined him abandoned him; and his army, seeing this, deserted, which affected him to such a degree, that he passed the Alps in person, and came to implore the clemency of his uncle ^k. Lewis received him coldly; told him, that, on the death of his father, he was the first who proposed to the emperor declaring him king of Italy; that, since his accession, he had confided in him, and, contrary to the opinion of his ministers, had heaped upon him many
- b favours: that, however, he would not be judge in his own cause, but would refer all to the determination of the next assembly at Aix la Chapelle, where Bernard, and his associates, who were the chief ministers of the deceased emperor, and Theodulfe, bishop of Orleans, were condemned to suffer death^l. The emperor caused the laics to have their eyes put out, and the bishop to be deposed; Bernard died a few days after of grief, or of pain. The emperor caused his three brothers, at the same time, to be shaved, and put into monasteries; and thus this affair ended. But, before the end of the year, the Abodrites, who had hitherto been always faithful, revolted: the cause was this, Traficon, their duke, being assassinated by the king of the Normans, Charlemagne had appointed Sclaomir to succeed him; but on the accession of Lewis, Cendrigne, the son of Traficon, represented his father's services
- c to the emperor, who made him joint duke; upon which Sclaomir called in the Normans^m.

A. D. 817.

- In consequence of the intrigues that had been set on foot in the beginning of this reign, Lewis, by the Mormon, count of Bretagne, not only threw off his vassalage, but assumed the title of king. Lewis, by the persuasion of his ministers, moved directly with his forces on that side, and called a general assembly at Vannes; in which having regulated certain affairs, he attacked the Bretons with such vigour, pursued them so closely, and wasted their country in such manner, that the people in a sedition murdered their new king, and submitted again to Lewis, who thereupon declared Nomenon, a great lord of that country, who had never entered into the revolt, count or judge of *Bretagne*ⁿ. The emperor, in his return to Germany, took Angiers in his way, where he had left his empress Hermengard sick, and who deceased there soon after. He proceeded from thence
- d to Heristal, where he gave audience to the ambassadors of several nations. Amongst these were deputies from Sigon, duke of Beneventum, who, by the rich presents they brought, appeased the emperor on behalf of their master, who had raised himself to that dignity by the assassination of Grimoalde; but he would not listen to the complaints made by Liuduit, duke of the Huns, against the count of Frioul^o. While he was thus employed, Lupus, count of the Gascons, revolted, but he was quickly defeated by Pepin, king of Aquitaine, taken and sent prisoner to Aix la Chapelle, which was likewise the fate of Sclaomir: both these rebels were sentenced to death, but the emperor contented himself with sending them into banishment^p. His courtiers and ministers, to divert him from that inclination he had to a life of privacy and retreat, prevailed upon him to marry Judith, the daughter of duke Guelfe,
- e descended, by the father's side, from one of the noblest houses in Bavaria, and by the mother from the ancient dukes of Saxony, beautiful in her person, and a princess otherways accomplished; but who, notwithstanding these rare qualities, proved the author, or at least the occasion, of the misfortunes that beset him and his subjects^q. So liable are matches made from prudence as well as passion, to miscarry.

- The revolt of Liuduit, produced a war of some continuance: he was the chief of the Liuduit, duke Abares or Huns, who inhabited that part of Hungary which lies about Buda; but he drew into this defection the Slavonians, who were seated on the rivers Save and Drave, from whence he is, by some writers, stiled duke of the Slavonians^r. The emperor immediately ordered a body of troops out of Italy to reduce him, but that was not so easily effected; he made a gallant and soldier-like defence; and, when fatigues and the rudeness of the season had obliged the emperor's forces to retreat, he entered the adjacent provinces, ravaged them, and repaired, by the plunder taken by his troops; the losses sustained by the war. Attacked by these armies at once, he secured himself by the same conduct, and by maintaining a secret correspondence with some of the auxiliary troops, of which those armies were composed: he likewise, by his intrigues, engaged the Normans to renew their piracies, and had also some intelligence in Italy^s. But, at length, the emperor's generals changed their method of making war, and instead of ruining the open country, pursued him from place to place, till at length he was forced to quit his own territories, to take shelter in the country of the Sorabes. There he murdered the duke who had given him refuge ; but not able to maintain himself long in that country, he retired to the town of a Dalmatian lord, with whom he had long held a secret correspondence. But his friend, perceiving his affairs desperate, and being afraid he might treat him as he had done his former protector, thought it most for his interest and safety to put him out of the way ; and thus ended this war^t.

penance.

WE have before observed, that the emperor held a council for restoring and enforcing the discipline of the church ; and we have more than once remarked, that he was not only zealously but sincerely pious himself ; yet it was from this right action, and from these laudable inclinations, that, for want of penetration and steadiness, the emperor suffered deeply. He had a profound respect for bishops ; but his reformation had disobliged most of that order throughout his dominions. He thought it improper for prelates to be loitering about a court, and was therefore for confining them to their benefices. To this, in the council, they could not but assent, and when they had assented they were forced to obey, but they resented this strictness in the emperor as if it had been an injury. They found means to represent the virtues and self-denial of Adelard, abbot of Corbie, the elder brother of Walla, who was now also become a monk, in so strong a light, that, notwithstanding he was the principal author of Bernard's conspiracy against his crown and life, the emperor not only recalled him, and restored him, but soon after employed him as his minister. Adelard, in a short space, gained the confidence of Lewis to such a degree, that, upon the marriage of his son Lothaire, he interceded and procured the pardon of all his associates ; and the emperor, of his own accord, added the restitution of their fortunes and honours. One would have imagined the monk might have stopped here, but he did not. He knew that his master was sincerely grieved for the death of his nephew ; and from thence he took occasion to persuade him, that it would be highly meritorious to make an open confession of his crime, and to do public penance for it, setting the example of the emperor Theodosius, who submitted in like manner to St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan ; and though their actions were very different, yet such an influence had he over the mind of Lewis, that he took it for a case in point^u. In consequence of these strange notions, the emperor actually submitted ; and in the face of the public, at the assembly of Attigni, acknowledged his faults, begged pardon for the scandal he had given, and desired the bishops to enjoin him penance. He even carried it so far, as to thrust into the catalogue of his faults his discarding the old ministry, and disgracing Walla, whom not long after he sent, with his son Lothaire into Italy ; so that two brothers were the prime ministers, and directed the councils of the two emperors, till the death of Adelard, whom his brother succeeded as abbot of Corbie^w.

sovereign.

THE emperor's disposition was now so well known, that the pope thought he might avail himself of it. Paschal I. was then seated in the papal chair ; he had caused himself to be crowned, without waiting for Lewis's confirmation, which he had excused, by throwing the blame upon the clergy and people ; and he had obtained, or at least this is asserted, an extension of the charters of Pepin and Charlemagne, which have made a great noise in the world, but are suspected in several clauses by most, and believed to be all a forgery by many. This pontif thought he might take any liberties under so good a prince, and, in this persuasion, did many things that occasioned loud complaints. Lewis hearing these murmurs, directed his son Lothaire to go to Rome, to inquire into the causes of these disorders, and to rectify what was amiss. Lothaire, in obedience to his father's commands, went thither, and, after proper inquiry, made a decree in virtue of his imperial dignity, by which many grievances were removed, and all disorders appeased^x. The pope shewed him great respect, crowned him with his own hands, and testified great satisfaction in his presence. In a short time, however, after his departure, two noble Romans, Theodorus and Leo, who had distinguished themselves by their adherence to the young emperor, were seized, their eyes put out, and at length they were beheaded in the patriarchal palace of Lateran. This alarmed the emperor exceedingly, who sent an abbot and a nobleman, his commissaries, to Rome, in order to make a strict inquisition into this affair. The pope made a strange apology ; he insisted that the execution was done without his privity ; but at the same declared those great men had suffered justly. He went farther, and, in imitation of his predecessor pope Leo, purged himself by oath, and procured thirty-four bishops to swear with him ; which, with the excuses made by his ambassadors, induced the emperor, through an excess of good nature, says the French historian^y, to rest satisfied. However, he was speedily called to answer at another tribunal, which was not to be imposed upon ; and, on his demise, Eugenius II. was elected, but with so much disorder, that Lothaire made another journey to Rome, where, with sovereign authority, he examined into and corrected many errors in the administration, occasioned by the avarice, pride, and private resentments of the popes : having by a new decree, consisting of nine articles, restored the public tranquillity, he took an oath of the Romans, not to proceed to the

- a coronation of any future pope, till confirmed by the emperor, and left also an imperial judge at Rome, to prevent things from running again into confusion, promising that, in case he was threatened or corrupted, to send commissaries to hear appeals in the last resort ^z.

WHILE his sons were thus employed in Italy, the emperor administered affairs at home, with equal facility and dignity. The Wilses, a tribe of the numerous nation of the Sclovo-nians, to prevent a civil war, desired Lewis to hear and determine the cause between two brothers, who both claimed to be their king. The elder had been deposed, but had still a party; the younger had the good graces of the people in general. Both appeared before the emperor, and said what they could in support of their respective titles: Lewis decreed in favour of the latter, but assigned a revenue, and an honourable establishment, to the former, with which he was satisfied ^a. He restored Heriolt to his share of the kingdom of Denmark, caused him to be baptized, and sent Ebbo, archbishop of Rheims, into Denmark, to convert his subjects: these his endeavours might have been very successful, if it had not been for the imprudence of this prince, on whom he chiefly relied for support. The emperor also chastised the Bretons, and entered their country with three armies, commanded by himself, and his sons Pepin and Lewis, kings of Aquitaine and Bavaria ^b. On the side of Spain, indeed, his forces had received a check from the Gascons, which gave him some uneasiness; but this was soon removed by the joy he felt on the birth of his son Charles. It was preceded by an earthquake, which was interpreted as an omen of the misfortune that had happened in Spain, but was afterwards applied to this event, with equal reason indeed, as having no reference to either. But it was the failing of this monarch to be strangely affected by whatever happened out of the ordinary course of things; eclipses, inundations, famines, were all prodigies alike to him; and the memoirs of his reign were composed by one who, because he held that post in the court of this emperor, is known to posterity by no other title than that of the astronomer ^c.

At the assembly held in the spring at Aix la Chapelle, Viomarque, who had been at the head of the rebellion in Bretagne, came with the principal lords of that country to pay their respects to the emperor, and to give him the strongest assurances of their submission and fidelity. Lewis, with his usual good-nature, received them with great affability and kindness, and dismissed them, more especially Viomarque, with rich presents. They were no sooner returned into their own country, than the rebellion broke out afresh, and Viomarque particularly made an inroad into France, in which his troops committed the greatest excesses; but count Lambert, who commanded on the frontier, took his opportunity in the winter, by a quick march, and with a choice body of troops, and having invested him in his house, after an obstinate resistance, cut him and his adherents in pieces ^d. Things did not go so well in Catalonia, where, through some mismanagement, the Moors made a great impression; and soon after happened that in Navarre, which, as we have shewn in its proper place, gave rise to that kingdom. Things had gone still worse, if Bernard, lately advanced to the honour of count of Barcelona, had not been more able, or at least more fortunate, in repelling the enemy; but the force he commanded was so small, that preserving this city was all in his power ^e. In the north new disturbances broke out; in consequence of which, Heriolt was again driven out of his kingdom. The Saracens made themselves masters of the island of Sicily; upon which the people of Naples, perceiving it in vain to expect any succours from Constantinople, would have put themselves under the protection of Lewis, if the circumstances of his affairs had permitted him to have given them relief. But things were so ill-managed by Lothaire and Pepin on the side of Spain, that it was intirely impracticable: yet count Boniface, who commanded in Corfica, assembled a good fleet, and with a considerable body of troops on board made a descent in Africa, where he defeated the Moors several times. This distracted the enemy, and raised the reputation of the French arms, which in that conjuncture was of the utmost consequence ^f.

By this series of disasters, the enemies of the emperor's government obtained an opportunity of first disturbing, and next subverting it. The empress Judith had gained a great ascendancy over her husband, which she employed in persuading him to place her son on a level with his brethren. In this the difficulty was great, as the emperor had already settled the succession to all his dominions. Aquitaine and Bavaria were small kingdoms, out of which, therefore, nothing could be taken; so that, whatever his share was to be, must be detached from that of Lothaire ^g. The empress employed her address so effectually, that she engaged Lothaire to consent, and even to promise, with an oath, that in case the emperor died while Charles was under age, he would undertake the care of him and his affairs, as his guardian and protector. But the protector having removed many from their employments, on account of the late disasters, they breathed every-where a spirit of discontent, and, by degrees, the complaints on every side became so general, and so loud, that the emperor appointed commissioners to enquire into the errors of his own government; their title in Latin was, Missi Dominici, and Walla was at the head of them: he had a great reputation for prudence and sanctity, and he made a very ample report in a general assembly, in which he not only treated the ministers, but the emperor himself, with great freedom. Upon this several fresh changes ensued, and four great councils were held for the reformation of the clergy^a. But the empress, through all these mists of religion and public spirit, saw clearly that the emperor's, or at least her, ruin was intended: of this she made Lewis so sensible, that he sent Walla back to his convent, and, after much deliberation, sent for Bernard count of Barcelona, whose sister, before he became a monk, Walla had espoused, and intrusted him with the chief management of affairs. He was indeed the fittest man he could have employed: he had great sagacity, much firmness, and having once embarked in any design, pursued it without looking back. It happened unluckily, that the post bestowed upon him in the court was that of lord chamberlain, by which having frequent admission to the empress, and being a very handsome, and withal a very gallant man, this gave a new topic to the malecontents; who, seeing all their plots in danger of being unravelled, boldly gave out, that he was too familiar with that princess, and, as such reports easily gain credit, this was speedily and generally believed¹.

The emperor and his son Charles fall into the hands of Lewis and Pepin, and are very ill treated.

COUNT Bernard, not in the least moved with these rumours, or intimidated with the intrigues of the ecclesiastics, planned a new kingdom for Charles, which would have rendered him a powerful sovereign. It was to consist of so much of Germany as lies within the Danube, the Maine, the Neckar, and the Rhine; to which were added Rhetia, or the country of the Grisons, and that part of the kingdom of Burgundy which comprehended the district of Geneva and the Swiss cantons². The malecontents acted in conjunction with the emperor's three sons, though, as yet, they did not affect to appear. Count Bernard was no stranger to this; and, under colour of reducing the Bretons, who were again revolted, assembled an army, which the emperor was to command in person, and in which Lewis, king of Bavaria, likewise served, and Pepin, king of Aquitaine, was directed to join the army on the frontiers of Bretagne, with his forces. But, when they came to march, part of the forces refused to obey orders; notwithstanding which, Lewis, by the advice of the count, advanced with the rest. Pepin, with a great army, marched out of Aquitaine, and the malecontents having offered him their service, he made no scruple of declaring against his father; upon which, Lewis quitted the emperor's camp, and joined him³. In this situation the emperor sent his consort, for safety, to the abbey of Poitiers, and Bernard, apprehending he should be the victim, demanded leave to retire to his government of Catalonia, which he obtained. Pepin, by the advice of the malecontents, sent a detachment to the abbey of Poitiers to seize the empress; having her in his power, he loaded her with reproaches, and told her, that, if she meant to preserve herself, she must go and persuade his father to two things; that she should take the veil as a nun in the monastery from which she came, and that he, resigning his dignity, should become a monk. Judith promised all that he could desire; but, in her interview with the emperor, is supposed to have advised him not to renounce his dignity. However, he permitted, that she should go and take the veil, as she did; and, for himself, demanded a conference with the peers and prelates. His army having abandoned him, he fell, with his son Charles, into the hands of the rebels, who treated him very coarsely; causing a small assembly to be held at Compiègne, in which they expected he should have resigned the crown. He appeared therein confused and disconsolate, made a kind of apology for his conduct, protested the rectitude of his intentions, and promised to act with more circumspection for the future. He stood while he was speaking, though there was a throne in the hall; but when he had finished his discourse, the bishops and great lords, who were present, obliged him to sit thereon⁴.

Both of them reconciled to the emperor, who dissipates the conspirators.

THIS disconcerted the schemes of Pepin and the abbot of Corbie. Lothaire arrived soon after with an army from Italy, and, as it was upon him the malecontents principally depended, Pepin and Lewis found themselves so little considered, that they thought it their best way to retire each into his dominions. Lothaire used his father with much exterior respect, but did not allow him the smallest share of power; and though he did not talk of deposing him, yet he put certain monks about him, who were instructed to persuade him to quit the world⁵. They were so far from succeeding in their commission, that, the emperor discoursing with them very graciously, they entered thoroughly into his interest; and one of

- a them, whose name was Gombaud, undertook to negotiate a reconciliation with Lewis and Pepin, in which he succeeded^o. At the great assembly held at Nimeguen, the emperor, finding himself surrounded by several German princes, attended by their guards, began to resume his courage. He sent for Hilduin, abbot of St. Denis, who had been very active during the whole affair, and asked him, what he meant by bringing so many men armed in his train, ordered him to dismiss them immediately, and to retire to Paderborn. He treated Walla, abbot of Corbie, in the same manner^p. At length he sent for his son Lothaire, to whom he represented, in so strong a light, the folly, as well as wickedness, of this behaviour, that he burst out into tears, and intreated his pardon. At that instant the two parties were on the point of coming to blows; but, the two emperors appearing together, all things were pacified, and the diet, which met to depose the emperor, confirmed his authority. The first use he made of it was to arrest the chiefs of the defection, whom he brought to a trial at the winter assembly held at Aix la Chapelle; where they were sentenced to suffer death, but he was content to send them into exile^q.

THE emperor was resolved to recall his consort to court; but, as she had taken the veil, it was thought requisite to have the advice of the bishops, and the consent of the pope. Gregory the fourth, then in possession of the see of Rome, declared, that, as she had taken the veil by force, her vows were not binding. Soon after her return, count Bernard was recalled; but first it was judged expedient, that the empress should purge herself, by oath, with respect to the heavy crimes laid to her charge^r. The return of count Bernard created fresh murmurs; the monk Gombaud thought, that being made prime minister was the least that could be done for one who had restored the emperor; the kings Pepin and Lewis were for governing likewise; and the empress judged every attempt of this kind an intrusion upon her province. The exiles were recalled, or, at least, as many as were content to acknowledge their errors, and subscribe to the provision made for the emperor's youngest son^s. Lothaire was deposed from being emperor, but was allowed to keep the title of king of Italy, provided he did nothing of consequence without receiving his father's instruction. Before the end of the year, count Bernard, perceiving that the empress was conducted by other councils, reconciled himself to Pepin, king of Aquitaine, and, by his intrigues, the three brothers were more closely united than ever in a league against their father^t.

- d THE king of Aquitaine, having made his escape from court, made all the haste possible into his own dominions, and where he no sooner arrived than he took up arms. The emperor, being acquainted with this, assembled an army, and declared, that he would hold his great court at Orleans; but his forces were scarce in motion before he had intelligence of the revolt of his son Lewis, which constrained him to return, and to appoint the assembly at Mentz^u. The king of Bavaria made no doubt but the Saxons and Allemands would have joined him, more especially when he knew they had taken up arms; but they marched directly to the emperor's army, which was of the last consequence to his affairs; for it gave him such superiority, and raised his courage so much, that he compelled Lewis to come and throw himself at his feet; from whom he exacted an oath, that he would never swerve from his duty any more. Upon his return from this expedition, Lothaire met his father at Frankfort, assuring him of his fidelity, and that he had no correspondence with the rebels; though, in reality, he was to be at the head of the revolt^v. Lewis marched next against the king of Aquitaine, held an assembly at Orleans, and obliged him to surrender himself, and then sent him, under an escorte, prisoner to Treves. On the road he found means to make his escape, returned into his own dominions, and raised a new rebellion; which so provoked the emperor, that he declared the kingdom of Aquitaine forfeited, and in that light gave it to his son Charles, who was then about nine years of age^x.

THIS revived the murmurs of the people, and created a general discontent amongst the nobility. Lothaire, who was returned into Italy, where he had a numerous army, applied himself to pope Gregory the fourth; representing to him, that, having been crowned emperor by one of his predecessors, and the act, by which himself and his brother were declared kings, being in the papal archives, he ought in justice to espouse their cause. Gregory, won by these solicitations, though he had been confirmed in the papal see by the emperor Lewis, yet consented to come with Lothaire, and his army, into France; where the very name of the pope brought many bishops, and other ecclesiastics, to join them, and amongst the rest Walla, abbot of Corbie^y. On the other hand some of the bishops, and particularly Dreux, bishop of Mentz, the emperor's natural brother, though he had not been kindly used, adhered firmly to that monarch, and wrote in very strong terms to the pontif; in which they went so far, as to reproach him with entering France without the emperor's leave, and being in a camp where sons had displayed their banners against their father. The pope replied in very high terms to them; but had afterwards an interview with the emperor, in which he endeavoured to excuse himself^z. In the mean time Lothaire and his friends corrupted the emperor's army, so that he fell into their hands, with his empress, and his son Charles; and, in an assembly held hastily on the spot, Lewis was deposed, the throne declared vacant, and Lothaire placed thereon^a. As for the empress they sent her to Tortona, and put her into a nunnery, the young prince Charles being sent to a castle in the forest of Arden. The pope being returned to Rome, and Lewis and Pepin, who had joined their brother, being retired into their respective kingdoms, Lothaire, in another assembly, composed chiefly of ecclesiastics, caused a long charge to be exhibited against his father, degraded him with many ceremonies, caused his sword to be taken from him at the altar, and put him into a habit of penitence, after the model of king Wamba's usage in Spain. He likewise caused false news to be told him, that the empress, having taken the veil, died soon after; and that his son Charles, being shaved, was put into a monastery, in hopes that this would have deter-

 A. D. 883. mined him to become a monk^b. All these contrivances had effects the very reverse of those that were expected from them. The emperor behaved with great humility, but at the same time with much firmness: he acknowledged the chastisement to be just from the hand of God, but he conceived that the notions he had formerly entertained of becoming a monk, and abandoning the rank to which Providence had called him, and brought these misfortunes upon him. On the other hand, the people in general, and the monks in particular, began to alter their sentiments, and to cry out, that the usage of so good a prince, by an unnatural son, was not to be endured^c.

Lothaire after a long struggle, is compelled, in the most humble manner, to demand pardon of his father. WHILE things took this turn in the heart of his dominions, Dreux, bishop of Mentz, went to the court of his nephew, Lewis, king of Bavaria, and represented to him, in the most pathetic terms, the weakness, as well as wickedness, of his conduct towards his father, since he had very little reason to hope the same tenderness from his brother Lothaire that the emperor had shewn him. At the same time count Bernard, though the emperor had deprived him of his dignities for the share he had in Pepin's rebellion, repaired to the court of that prince, and demonstrated to him so clearly, that it was his interest to restore his father, notwithstanding it was in his quarrel he had been deposed, that he began his march with a numerous army for that purpose^d. Lewis of Bavaria was first in the field, and had no sooner declared on his father's behalf, than the Saxons, with their usual alacrity, assembled their whole force to join him^e. Several of the nobility in France took up arms on his side, inso- much that Lothaire, perceiving himself in danger of being surrounded, sent his father and his brother Charles to the abbey of St. Denis, and, with the few forces he still retained about him, retired into Burgundy; where, being joined by some of his adherents, he did a great deal of mischief; but was at length reduced to the necessity of throwing himself at his father's feet, and, with the utmost humility, demanding pardon, in the sight of the whole army^f.

Those who were deepest in this treason convicted and punished, but not rigorously. IMMEDIATELY after this happy event, the empress Judith was recalled; and though the emperor had been absolved by such bishops as were about the court at St. Denis, and afterwards presented by them with his sword and crown, yet such was either the scruples of this prince, or the superstition of his subjects, that a more formal act of restitution was thought necessary. Accordingly, in an assembly held at Tbionville, all that had been done in the assembly held at Compeigne was declared void, the emperor was again absolved, seven archbishops laying their hands upon his head, and Ebbo, archbishop of Rheims, who had the boldness to degrade him, which was done with much brutality, though raised by the emperor from the dregs of the people, read publicly his recantation, and afterwards resigned his dignity, from which he would have been otherwise deposed^g. The disorders which these civil wars had occasioned were such, as, in a manner, banished all appearance of government or of justice; but the emperor quickly appointed commissaries to redress these grievances, and to restore the vigour of the laws; which they, in a good measure, performed. He might now certainly have spent the remainder of his days in perfect tranquillity, if it had not been for the intrigues of the empress, who, having a restless desire to see her son settled in a kingdom, recurred to her first project, and entered again into a negotiation with Lothaire. He did not entertain this

- a at first so warmly as she expected, though he sent some ministers of his own to treat in his father's court, at the head of whom was Walla, who was kindly received and caressed by the empress, though he had been the principal author of the troubles that, from the very beginning, had disturbed her husband's reign^h. But while this treaty went on slowly, Lothaire was taking every possible method to strengthen himself in Italy, that in case the emperor, who was become very infirm, should die, he might be able, at all events, to put himself into possession of his dominions. The manner in which he executed this design disoblged many of the nobility, and bore so hard upon the pope, that he joined his complaints to theirs at the court of the emperor; who was at length so much provoked, that he resolved to go in person with an army of choice troops into Italy, and sent his orders to Lothaire, to provide the magazines necessary for his march to *Rome*ⁱ. What the consequence of this journey might have been cannot be easily conjectured; but the depredations committed on the coast of France by the Norman pirates, obliged the emperor to lay it aside, that he might more effectually provide for the security of his dominions; which, whatever chagrin it might give to the empress Judith and her partizans, was not at all disagreeable to the wiser and better part of the emperor's ministers, who were very far from approving of this expedition^k. A. D. 836.

- At length, after mature deliberation, the empress determined to engage Lewis to add to the dominions, formerly intended for her son, the kingdom of Neustria, and some other districts. This resolution was at that time kept very secret; notwithstanding which, the three brothers had intelligence of it, and deliberated jointly whether they should renew the war, or dissemble their resentment. The passages from Italy were so well guarded, the dominions of the kingdoms of Bavaria and Aquitaine were at such a distance from each other, and the nobility of France and Germany so little disposed to begin any new troubles, that they were constrained to be quiet. The emperor, therefore, having summoned an assembly at Chiersi on the Oise, introduced his son Charles, then about fourteen, and with great solemnity declared him king of Neustria, Lewis, king of Bavaria, being there in person, and the deputies of the king of Aquitaine subscribing with the rest^l. Things did not remain in this state long; the death of Pepin opened to a new division. He left behind him two sons, Pepin and Charles, and two princesses, who were married. Judith prevailed on the emperor to revenge the injuries he had received from his son upon his grand-children, who were absolutely innocent, by depriving his eldest son Pepin of the kingdom of Aquitaine. In order to this an assembly was convened at Worms, to which Lothaire was invited; and, though not without some inquietude, thither he came. His father received him kindly, but the empress covered him with caresses.

- The great point was to engage him to acquiesce in a new scheme, by which Charles was to have, as the spoil of his brother Pepin, the kingdom of Aquitaine, and to divide the rest of the French dominions with Lothaire, and, according to the old project, was to be the tutor and protector of his nephew. As he was not in a condition to dispute, he assented, or rather submitted, to what was expected from him; and, by this partition, the Meuse, the country of Switzerland, the Rhône, and the ocean, became the boundaries of Charles's kingdom; except on the side of Spain, where he had all that the emperor possessed^m. But Lewis, king of Bavaria, though he suffered nothing by this partition, was so much provoked at it, that he assembled the whole force of his dominions, in hopes of extending them as far as the Rhine. But upon the first commotion the emperor advanced with a small army to Mentz, and, upon his approach, the Saxons began immediately to arm; which put the dominions of the king of Bavaria in such apparent danger, that, having caused his forces to separate, he sent to intreat his father's pardon. This insurrection was scarce extinguished before the bishop of Poitiers came to inform him, that some of the lords, and the greatest part of the people in Aquitaine, were extremely discontented, and looked upon the treatment that the young prince Pepin had received as a flagrant act of injustice. Upon which the emperor appointed an assembly at Chalons on the Soane, to which the lords of Aquitaine were ordered to repair. Thither he carried the empress and her son Charles, and, to the utmost of his power, laboured to give general satisfaction; assigning the motives that induced him to dispose of the kingdom of Aquitaine to his son, of whose education he promised to take the utmost care; and assuring them, at the same time, that he would provide for his grand-childrenⁿ. The majority of the nobility and prelates acquiesced; but those who had embraced the party of the young prince, were not to be moved either to acknowledge Charles, or to deliver up Pepin to his grandfather. Having done, therefore, all that could be done in this assembly, he went to Poitiers, where he kept his Christmas, fully resolved to march, with the troops he had about him, into Aquitaine in the spring^o.

the emperor in an island of the Rhine, partly of disease and partly grief.

A. D. 840.

WHILE he remained there, the season being wet and cold, he became much indisposed; and in this situation, and at the entrance of Lent, which it was his custom to observe very strictly, he received the unwelcome news, that his son, the king of Bavaria, was again in arms, that the Saxons and Thuringians had joined him, and that he had already made himself master of the best part of Germany. This obliged the emperor to turn his arms on that side, at a juncture when, through the whole course of his life, he had spent his time in fasting, prayer, and retirement, and when he was also in an ill state of health. He left part of his troops to guard his wife and son, and with the rest proceeded, with the utmost expedition, to Aix la Chapelle; and making but a very short stay there, he passed the Rhine, with an intent to give his son battle^p. But Lewis, finding his troops not to be depended upon, withdrew into his own dominions, and abandoned all his conquests. This undoubtedly had given the emperor great joy; but there happened unfortunately at this time a great eclipse, in which the stars became visible. This affected the weak superstitious old man to such a degree, that it rendered his malady, which was otherwise not very dangerous, mortal^q. He caused himself to be carried into an island in the Rhine, the air of which he fancied to be very salubrious; there, tormenting himself with anxious thoughts, receiving the communion, and scarce any thing else, daily, he lingered for six weeks. When he found there were no hopes of recovery, he divided his treasures and rich moveables amongst his family, the great churches in his dominions, and the poor. He left a crown, a scepter, and a very rich sword to Lothaire; by which it was also supposed that he left him the empire; but it was upon condition that he performed the promise he had made with respect to the empress and her son^r. His brother, the bishop of Mentz, perceiving that he left nothing to his son Lewis, put him in mind that, as a Christian, it was his duty to forgive him: to which the dying emperor, with some eagerness, answered, "I pardon him with all my heart; but tell him from me, that he ought to think seriously of obtaining pardon from God also, for bringing my grey hairs with sorrow to the ground^s." He died the twentieth of June 840, in the seventy-second year of his age, and in the twenty-seventh of his reign: his corpse was interred in the church of St. Arnold, at Mentz, near that of his mother queen Hildegard^t (B).

Lothaire succeeds as emperor and king of Italy, Lewis as king of Germany, and Charles the Bald as king of France.

As soon as the news of the emperor Lewis's death reached Italy, Lothaire looked upon himself as his successor in the utmost extent of the word, and resolved to make himself master, if he could, of all his dominions. He was a prince of great subtlety and address; could wear any appearance, that the state of his affairs required; haughty in his manner, affecting great steadiness, which he really had not; and though he laid his plans with much prudence, was nevertheless liable to be disconcerted if he met with any unexpected difficulties in their execution. He judged his own situation to be far superior to that of his brethren, as Lewis of Bavaria had by no means a great character, and Charles, who was scarce seventeen, and under the tuition of his mother, could scarce be said to have any character at all^u. As soon as he had passed the mountains, he seized Worms, and, with a numerous army, marched to Franc-

(B) We have observed in the text, that the emperor Lewis followed his father's example sometimes without considering his motives; in the main, however, it was of great use to him, and served in some measure to preserve the constitution (1). He courted the favour of bishops a little too much, of which, however, he had but a small share; because he shewed himself desirous of confining their cares to the proper duties of their function. He suffered his ministers likewise to have too great an ascendancy over him, which was probably owing to the manner in which he had been brought up, but more especially to his natural modesty and mildness of temper; for his misfortunes were not so much owing to the narrowness of his genius, as to the softness and diffidence of his temper (2). He did not consider that men, who had better understandings, might have worse intentions, than himself; and it fared with him as with many other princes, the uprightness of his own nature made him sometimes an instrument of injustice, as directed by the arts of others. He was governed in her life-time by his first wife Ermengarde, who induced him to associate Lothaire in the empire, and to make Pepin

and Lewis kings of Aquitaine and Germany: the former of those princes had, by his wife Ingeltrude, Pepin, who died a prisoner in the castle of Senlis, Charles, archbishop of Mentz, and Bertha, who married Gerald, count of Berry (3). Of the posterity of Lewis the German we treat elsewhere. By this empress he had also five daughters; Alpaide, who married Begon, count of Paris; Gesle, who espoused Everard, duke of Frioul, by whom she became the mother of Berenger, king of Italy; Hildegard, the wife of count Thierry; Adelaide, who, some writers say, was first espoused to count Conrade, and afterwards to Robert le Fort, count of Paris; and Rotrude, who died unmarried (4). His second empress Judith was, in the sentiments of a great historian, a very artful coquet, who, by her intrigues, produced most of her husband's misfortunes, in which she had her share (5). By her he had only one son, Charles, who succeeded him, first in the realm of France, and afterwards in the imperial dignity, and who, in his life-time, his father, on the decease of his son Pepin, created king of Aquitaine.

- a fort, intending to strip Lewis of Bavaria, before he had so much as a suspicion of his intention. Here he found his first mistake. Lewis, who had always fled before his father, appeared at the head of a corps of veteran troops, and offered battle to his brother. This disposed Lothaire to a negotiation; upon which followed a truce for three months^w. He did this, in order to see whether he might not succeed more easily in falling upon Charles, to whom he sent agents, with assurances, that he meant to adhere strictly to his promises, but desired at the same time that he would forbear pressing their nephew Pepin, whose pretensions ought to be examined in an assembly. His views in this were, on the one hand, to acquire the reputation of a just and equitable prince with the vulgar, and, on the other, to raise a formidable enemy on the back of Charles, while he attacked him in front^x. To facilitate this scheme, his agents were
- b likewise charged to make use of persuasions, money, and promises, in order to divert the nobility from his brother's interest; he had also his emissaries about Pepin, who dissuaded him from going to the assembly at Bourges, to which he was invited by Charles and the empress dowager, with a promise of safety and satisfaction. As soon, therefore, as Lothaire had concluded a truce with Lewis, he marched directly, though slowly, towards Paris, giving soft answers to the ambassadors from Charles, who were sent to put him in mind of his promises and oaths, as well as of his father's dying expressions^y. The affairs of Charles were at this time in a very critical situation; many of the lords in Neustria were little affected to him, and most had nothing but their own interest at heart; he was far from being beloved in Aquitaine, where the party of Pepin was daily increasing; and, to add to all these misfortunes, the Normans
- c threatened an invasion upon the coasts^z.

- THERE was, however, a small party for him in Neustria, composed of the ablest and bravest Lothaire and of the nobility; who, considering the youth of Charles, and knowing the disposition of Pepin the Lothaire perfectly, determined to prefer the former to the latter; and, having signified their sentiments to him, Charles came and joined them. All this time Lothaire was advancing, sending his emissaries on every side to seek out his old friends, and to draw over, by any means, either such as were neutral or affected to his brother's interest. He found many of both sorts; more especially Pepin, the son of Bernard, king of Italy, Ebbo, the famous archbishop of Rheims, who had presided in the assembly which deposed his father, with others who had been in his party in his father's time, who had suffered for him then, and hoped to
- d be rewarded now. Of the latter sort also there were great numbers^a. Charles was not idle on his side; but he had scarce assembled a small army, before he had news, that his competitor Pepin, with a considerable force, besieged Bourges. He did not hesitate a moment in marching to the relief of that place, where his mother was in danger of losing her liberty; and, having beaten Pepin and raised the siege, he returned again into Neustria, but with a small force. Lothaire had by this time gained all the country between the Meuse and the Seine; but the nobility about Charles, very happily for him, were so far from resenting his leaving them to go to the relief of his mother, that they esteemed him for it, assured him he might rely upon their fidelity, and advised him to offer his brother battle^b. He followed their advice; but fighting was not the thing that Lothaire affected most; he had a superior
- e army, and, taking advantage of this, he offered hard terms to his brother; which, in his present circumstances, Charles thought fit to accept, upon condition that all things should be finally settled in an assembly to be held in the month of May, at Attigni; that Lothaire should make no attempts to his prejudice in the mean time; that the truce with the king of Bavaria should be prolonged; and that, in case any of the articles were violated, the treaty should be void. Lothaire consented to all this, and broke most of the articles as soon as he had made them. He disposed a great part of his troops along the river Seine; and, having augmented the remainder into a considerable army, endeavoured to surprise Lewis, king of Bavaria; but that prince, who had never confided in him, was in arms, and in a condition to defend his own territories, provided his own subjects remained faithful^c. In the mean time Charles,
- f with a small corps of troops, passed the Seine, in spite of all the care that Lothaire's officers could take, and marched to Attigni. This relieved Lewis, by drawing Lothaire back into France, where he might have fought Charles with a superior army; but whilst he endeavoured, though without effect, to corrupt and debauch his forces, Lewis of Bavaria beat the troops he left upon the Rhine, passed that river, and marched, with great rapidity, to the relief of his brother Charles. Upon the junction of their forces, Lothaire retired till he was likewise joined by Pepin, who claimed the crown of Aquitaine; then, rejecting all the propositions that were made him by his brothers, he resolved to leave all to the decision of a battle. This was fought in the neighbourhood of Fontenoy, on the 25th of June, and was one of the most memorable, as well as the most bloody, that the French history records ^d. At length Lothaire ^a and Pepin were totally defeated; and it is said there fell on the spot, on both sides, not fewer than one hundred thousand men ^e.

After a ruinous war, the brothers make peace, and agree to make a new division.

Lewis and Charles, like young men, lost in a great measure the fruits of their victory, the former returning, with the utmost diligence, into his own territories, and the latter following Pepin into Aquitaine. As for Lothaire, he retired to Aix la Chapelle, and by the help of those artificial expedients, of which he was a great master, set on foot a new army, with which he once more entered Neustria; causing it to be given out by his emissaries, that Charles was killed in the battle, and the monarch of Bavaria so wounded, that he could not live. Charles, perceiving his mistake, returned into Neustria, but with so small a force, that he was constrained to entrench himself on the other side of the Seine. Lothaire marched to attack him with a numerous army, and found the water so low, that he might have done it without difficulty. His irresolution hindered him, till the river, swelling on a sudden, rendered it impracticable. The prelates and nobility of Charles's party cried this up for a miracle, by which, in a short time, his army was so much augmented, that he was enabled, without fear of disturbance from Lothaire, to continue his march for Strasburgh ^f, where he joined the army of Bavaria, which his brother Lewis commanded in person, and there, in the presence of the prelates, nobility, and troops, they swore perpetual concord and amity, and pushed things so far as to declare, that, if either of them broke this treaty, his subjects were absolved from their allegiance, and at liberty to adhere to the other; which was attended with very pernicious consequences in succeeding times. For the present, their union was in itself wonderful, and produced wonders; they eat together at the same table; they slept under the same roof; their councils, and even their pleasures, were in common: and this harmony diffusing itself through their forces, they pushed the war with such vigour, that Lothaire, his troops deserting daily, retired on the other side of the Rhône, abandoning all Austrasia and part of Burgundy ^g. The two princes were very desirous of keeping what they had acquired, but at the same time had a mind to claim it by some better title than that of conquest: in order to this they applied themselves to the bishops; who, after making a kind of enquiry into the conduct of Lothaire, both in his father's life-time and since, and reckoning up all the acts of treason, cruelty, perfidy, and tyranny, of which he had been guilty; and having demanded of the two kings, whether they meant to govern like him, or according to the laws of God and the land, they answered, that they intended to govern according to law ^h. Upon which he was declared to have forfeited all title to his dominions, and they were flattered with having a title given them by the declaration of Providence in their favour ⁱ. But, notwithstanding this, Lothaire solicited his brothers to establish peace upon settled and solid terms, and proposed several projects for that purpose, which they rejected. At length they accepted this; that the kingdoms of Italy, Aquitaine, and Bavaria, except all the dominions of the deceased emperor, should be divided into three equal portions, of which Lothaire was to take his choice, and his brethren were to have the other two ^k. In consequence of this agreement, forty commissioners were named by each of the three kings, a whole year was spun out in their conferences; but at length it was settled, that Charles, besides Aquitaine, should have all the country between the Loire and the Meuse; that the rest of Germany should be annexed to Lewis's kingdom, who from thence was stiled Lewis the German; and that the titles of emperor and Augustus, being left to Lothaire, he should not only retain all Italy and the city of Rome, but should likewise possess the whole tract of country lying within the rivers of Rhône, Rhine, Saone, Meuse, and Scheld. The whole of what he held on this side the mountains, was, from him, stiled Lotharingia, Royaume Lotharienne, that is, the kingdom of Lothaire, from whence, by corruption, rose the name of Lorrain, though that is now given to a duchy, which contains only a small part of that kingdom ^l; which, in point of extent and situation, was very considerable.

A. D. 845.

Each of the kings exposed to great inconvenience from the common weakness war had brought on all.

THE empress Judith died a little before this partition was made. Indeed it was high time for these kings to put an end to quarrels, alike injurious to them all, and which, if they had lasted longer, might have been fatal. The Saracens surprised Beneventum, and made themselves masters of most part of that fine duchy, while Lothaire was engaged on this side the Alps; and pope Gregory being dead, Sergius the second was elected, and took possession of the see of Rome, without taking any notice of the emperor ^m; who thereupon sent his son Lewis, with an army, to obtain satisfaction; which he did, and the pope crowned him king of the Lombards. Charles was not less perplexed; Pepin defeated and cut to pieces a great a corps of troops, the Normans landed at the mouth of the Garonne, and ruined all the country; the duke of Bretagne revoltedⁿ. The emperor and the kings of France and Germany were now so well united, that they sent deputies to Pepin, to the Normans, and to the Bretons, to let them know, that, if they attacked any one of the three, they would certainly attack them with joint forces. But this had little or no effect, their neighbours being well apprised, that there was not any sincere affection amongst them; and that this pretended amity was purely the effects of weakness^o. To so low a state was the French empire fallen, since the demise of Charlemagne.

duke of Languedoc, who had once made such a figure in the court of his father, to be arrested; and, after a year's confinement, to be put to death, which had a very bad effect; for his son William seized immediately several places of consequence. He, to revenge his father's death, joined Pepin with all the force he could raise. The Normans made another descent, and pillaged Toulouse; the duke of Bretagne was inclined, not only to throw off all dependence, but to assume the title of king. In this perplexity he was alarmed with the news of a fresh fleet and army of Normans, who entered the mouth of the Seine, where they made themselves masters of Rouen; and, not satisfied with the pillage of that place, marched directly to Paris, which they likewise pillaged; and were at the point of attacking the king, with a small army, in an intrenched camp at St. Denis^p. But Charles, by the advice chiefly of the prelates, A. D. 845, entered into a negotiation with them, and, by giving them seven hundred weight of silver, engaged them to retire, and to promise, with reiterated oaths, never to return. To pacify the troubles of Aquitaine, he yielded the best part of that country to his nephew Pepin, who rendered him homage, and took an oath of fealty^q. Charles now found himself at leisure to enter Bretagne, which he did with the best army he was able to assemble, but had the misfortune to be twice beaten. This great change in affairs was chiefly owing to an alteration in the king himself. While a youth he was very tractable, and took the advice of his principal nobility: now he thought himself of age to govern, and soon gave specimens not much to the advantage either of his own reputation, or of the happiness of his subjects. He amassed wealth, by oppressing his people; from paying a superstitious obedience, he came wholly to neglect the bishops. Selfish, despotic, and wrong-headed, he soon incurred the contempt and hatred of his subjects; shewing, by the flagrant errors in his conduct, that the good qualities, by which he had been formerly distinguished, were only artificial and affected^r. The prince of the Bretons seeing also that, neglecting all other enemies, Charles was on the point of entering his country with another numerous army, he judged it most expedient for his own safety, and for fear of being over-powered by the Normans, to return to his former situation; and, upon his offer of submission, peace was very quickly made. Thus, for the present, domestic tranquility was restored in France, where it was exceedingly wanted, the great towns being decayed, the people miserably consumed, and all the naval establishments dwindled to nothing^s.

THE Saracens gave Lothaire as much disturbance as the Normans had done Charles; had pillaged the church of St. Peter, which was then without the walls of Rome; had beaten the troops sent to oppose them, and threatened still greater mischiefs. The Sclavonians had revolted against Lewis, king of Germany. The Moorish pirates were become almost as troublesome to Charles as the Normans; and, in the midst of these disasters, Charles and Lothaire were still upon bad terms. Lewis, king of Germany, prevailed upon them both to consent to a new interview at Mersen, near Maastricht; where (having shewn them that, through their quarrels, the French kingdom had lost much of its lustre; that the great lords in their dominions were every day growing more independent; and that nothing but a strict union amongst themselves could prevent the ruin of them all) they settled, while together, a kind of constitution, by which things were to be regulated for the future, more especially in regard to the succession, which even Charlemagne had left very loose; and the rule now established was, that the children of the reigning prince, whether of age or not of age, should succeed to their father's dominions, and owe nothing but the respect, arising from the ties of blood, to the other princes of the house of Charlemagne^t. The Moors having received a great defeat in Spain, were content to make peace with France; and this negotiation was very luckily concluded with them, when the Normans, making a fresh descent with a great force, besieged Bordeaux. Charles marched immediately to its relief; and having taken and sunk some of their ships, compelled these barbarous invaders to raise the siege: but he no sooner quitted the country, than they returned, and, through the treachery of the Jews, having surprized the city, pillaged and burnt it^u. This proved an affair of great consequence to Charles; for Bordeaux belonging at this time to Pepin, and the nobility conceiving that it was lost through some negligence of his, revolted, and submitted themselves again to Charles, and he was accordingly crowned and anointed king of Aquitaine, at Orleans. Lewis, king of Germany, had enough to do to bridle his rebels; and Lothaire was not less distressed by the Saracens; notwithstanding which, he solicited his brother Lewis to enter into a league with him against Charles, which he prudently and peremptorily refused^x.

The Bretons revolt, and from the situation of affairs, oblige Charles to grant their demands.

RELIGIOUS disturbances were quickly added to the rest of the disorders that distracted France; and while the king was employed in holding councils for redressing these, the sea coasts of his dominions were ravaged by Moorish, Greek, and Norman, pirates. Pepin started out of those obscure places, where, since the last revolution, he had concealed himself, and, in a short space of time, recovered a great part of Aquitaine. Lothaire and Lewis were not at all more at their ease, insomuch that it looked as if the barbarous nations had conspired to destroy the French, as they formerly did the Roman empire^y. Charles marched into Aquitaine, and met with great success, taking prisoner Charles, the brother of Pepin, whom he obliged to enter into holy orders. He had done still more, if Nominoi, duke of Bretagne, had not revolted, and by the assistance of count Lambert, who had formerly made a great figure in the court of the emperor Lewis, rendered himself master of Rennes, after which he recurred to his old scheme, and assumed the title of king. He held it during his life, and transmitted it to his son Herispee, against whom Charles led all the forces of his dominions, scarce doubting of success, since count Lambert was also dead; but he was mistaken, for the new king of Bretagne gave him an entire defeat, in which a great number of troops, and not a few of the nobility, perished^z. Charles retiring to Angiers, in order to recruit his forces, Herispee having demanded a safe conduct, went thither likewise, and concluded a treaty upon very advantageous terms, since the regal honours were conceded to him, together with his conquests, and nothing reserved to Charles, but the honour of receiving homage from a king. He had some amends made him for this, by the seizing of Pepin the younger, by a prince of the Gascons, who delivered him into his hands; upon which he caused him to be immediately shaved, and sent him prisoner to the convent of St. Medard de Soissons. The country which his father left him in Spain was almost intirely lost, either by the revolt of those who were intrusted with the government of cities and fortresses, or conquered by the Moors; so that the king had enemies on every side, and great discontent even in his own court^a.

As the inconstancy and mutinous disposition of the people of Aquitaine had, from the very beginning of his reign, given him a great deal of trouble, he resolved to lay hold of this opportunity to chastise them; and, in doing this, he carried things so far, that the greater part of his subjects determined to throw off their allegiance, with which view they sent deputies, who were likewise to serve for hostages, to Lewis, king of Germany, beseeching him either to come in person and accept the kingdom, or to send them one of his sons; and the German, forgetting the treaties, confirmed by the most solemn oaths, that subsisted between them, sent them his son Lewis, escorted by a small body of troops^b. At this juncture, both the brothers solicited the emperor to join with them against each other; and he, instigated by the same motives of ambition, made alliances with both, but took care to assist neither. In the mean time an incident happened, which was not unfavourable to Charles. Pepin made his escape out of the monastery, and returned into Aquitaine, where most of the discontented party joined him; and quitted the king they had sent for out of Germany; of which Charles taking advantage, attacked Lewis, who was at the same time attacked by Pepin, who thereupon prudently compromised matters with his uncle, and with his leave returned into Germany^c. Lothaire, whose whole ambition, perfidy, and other vices, had been so prejudicial to the interests of his family, finding his end draw near, took the habit of a monk, that, according to the superstition of those times, he might, by this second baptism as they phrased it, atone for all his crimes, and, though he lived a tyrant, die a saint^d. In this disguise of a monk, which he did not wear quite a week, he expired, on the 29th of September, leaving behind him three sons, Lewis, Lothaire, and Charles. Lewis, who had been associated by his father in the government, had the kingdom of Italy, and the title of emperor; Lothaire, the best part of the dominions his father held in France, and was stiled king of Lorraine; the rest, consisting of Provence, Dauphine, and part of the kingdom of Burgundy, fell to Charles, who thenceforward was called the king of Provence^e. One would have imagined there were kings enough in this family; but Charles, whom for the future we must stile Charles the Bald, though probably that surname was not given him in his life-time, declared his son of the same name, a though a child, king of Aquitaine; and the people were so pleased with it for the present, that, the Normans landing in their country, they took arms with alacrity, and attacked them with such vigour and valour, that scarce three hundred of them found their way back to their ships^f.

THIS fit of loyalty did not last long; they became more discontented than ever, renounced their allegiance to Charles, recalled Pepin, whose affairs were so desperate that he had joined with the Normans, and, in conjunction, pillaged the countries over which he pretended to reign. In a little time they deserted him, and had recourse once more to Lewis the German. Charles the Bald had it not in his power to punish or even restrain them. The nobility of France were become so turbulent, and the bishops so unruly, that he knew not how to act, or in whom to confide. In these circumstances he demanded the advice of his uncle, by the mother's side, who told him very freely what the malecontents said in vindication of their own conduct; which was, that, at the expence of their blood and fortune, they had raised him to a throne, and that he now behaved to them ungratefully, and like a tyrant. Upon this Charles addressed his circular letters to the nobility and prelates, reciting what his uncle had told them, and requiring such as thought themselves really aggrieved through negligence, misinformation, or otherwise, to appear and demonstrate their complaints in an open, free, and general assembly, to be held at Verberic, promising ample retribution and justice, as well as oblivion, for every thing past; but declaring, that all acts of disobedience should be regarded for the future as rebellion^g. In full confidence that this would give satisfaction, he marched with all his forces to besiege a strong post, which the Danes had taken, in the very heart of his dominions; and, while he was thus employed, the malecontents in France, after the example of those in Aquitaine, invited Lewis of Germany to come and take possession of the kingdom, which he accordingly did, with a formidable army, while Charles, abandoned by the greatest part of his subjects, was obliged to raise the siege, and retire into a distant part of his dominions^h. Lewis, upon this, assembled the prelates of his party, who declared Charles the Bald fallen from the regal dignity for mal-administration; and Ganelon, archbishop of Sens, in virtue of this decree, solemnly crowned Lewis, to whom the nobility and bishops did homage, as king of France, notwithstanding the prelates, who still adhered to Charles, had declared all to be excommunicated who should attempt any such thing. The princes of the blood also acquiesced in this matter; insomuch that Pepin of Aquitaine, who had been lately reconciled to Charles, and the king of Lorraine, who had entered into a close alliance with him; and in consequence of these engagements served in his army, quitted him, and went to acknowledge Lewis; though this was not more the effects of levity than of forceⁱ.

AMONGST those who were the most forward in this enterprise, though they did not enter into it at the beginning, were Conrad and Wolf, the sons of count Conrad, brother to the empress Judith, and consequently cousin-german to Charles the Bald, who, by their extraordinary zeal and assiduity, quickly acquired the confidence of their new master. These lords represented to Lewis, that, being called to the throne by the nobility, having the bishops at his devotion, and no army in the field to oppose him, it would be proper for him to gratify such as had been most instrumental in this change, and also to send back the troops he had brought with him, that he might fix the affections of his new subjects, by appearing to rely intirely upon their attachment; and hinted to him at the same time, that, when this was done, his competitor Charles might be prevailed upon, in consideration of some small territory, to renounce his pretensions^k. Lewis followed their advice, and then sent them, with full powers, to treat with their cousin Charles, with whom they had been all this while acting in concert. They acquainted him that Lewis having sent back his own army, and distributed his treasures amongst those who had assisted him, the only thing that Charles had to do, was to march with the forces that were still about him towards his brother Lewis; and that, having both the hopes and fears on his side, there was little reason to doubt of his success^l. Charles executed their scheme immediately, and was restored with as much ease as he had been dethroned; Lewis, at his approach, finding himself obliged to retire into his own dominions, and the king of Lorraine, who had deserted him, went to compliment Charles at his return^m.

THESE intestine disturbances had terrible effects on the general system of affairs. The Normans not only ruined the coasts, pillaging sometimes one great town, sometimes another, but had actually seated themselves on the Seine and on the Somme. Solomon, who had killed duke Herispee, possessed Bretagne, with the title of king; and taking advantage of these troubles, had not only settled his government so as not to be easily shaken, but had also made considerable acquisitions. In the midst of this desolation and disorder, Charles the Bald was bent upon revenging the injury he had received from his brother Lewis. Their nephew, the king of Lorraine, interposed; procured an interview, at which himself was present, and with much difficulty composed their quarrel. In a little time after, he began to entertain suspicions of a his uncle Charles; and, to secure himself effectually on that side, sacrificed the fertile province of Alsace to the emperor his brother, with whom he made a strict alliance. His motive to this was equally scandalous and unjustⁿ. He had married Tbeutberge, the sister of count Hubert, against whom, without any cause, he had taken an inveterate hatred: he was therefore desirous of depriving her of the share she had in his bed and throne, in order to admit to both a mistress of his, whose name was Walrade, and of whom he was passionately fond. In order to this, he charged his queen with the horrid crime of incest with her brother Hubert, for which he put her to the trial of boiling water, according to the barbarous custom of those times; and being declared innocent, he revived the same accusation, pretending to have fresh proofs. These consisted in the queen's voluntary confession of her guilt, supported b by the testimony of Gontbaire, archbishop of Cologne, who was her confessor; but the truth of the matter was, that he threatened the queen into this confession, by putting her in fear of her life, and brought the archbishop to act the scandalous part he did, by promising to marry his niece as soon as the queen was divorced^o. In the management of this affair several of the A. D. 860. prelates in his dominions concurred: but, while it was depending, both the queen and duke Hubert Bald; and it was this that engaged Lothaire to purchase the friendship of his brother at so dear a rate^p. The insolence of the Bretons at length enraged Charles so much, that, having procured from his brother Lewis, for a sum of money, a body of Saxon horse, he made an irruption into Bretagne; and, having engaged the army of Solomon two days successively, was at c length forced to retreat, with the loss of the best part of his army: he found means, however, to draw over, or rather to retrieve, Robert le Fort, that is, the Stout, or the Strong, who commanded Solomon's army, esteemed one of the greatest captains of that age, upon whom he bestowed the duchy of France, comprehending the country between the Seine and Loire; by which we are to understand he made him governor of this province, with the title of duke^q. We shall hereafter see what the consequences were of this act of royal policy and bounty.

THE wrong turn his affairs had taken in Bretagne, disabled Charles from attacking the Normans with his own troops; but what he wanted in force he supplied by address. He was informed that Wailand, a famous Norman pirate, was returned from England, and had taken d his winter quarters on the banks of the Soane; but not having it in his power to expel him, he thought it best to dissemble it, as he likewise did his pillaging the country of Terouenne. This famous free-booter had formerly offered him his service, to dislodge his countrymen upon the Seine, for three thousand pounds of silver, which proposition the king rejected, not having the money to give^r. He thought proper to renew the negotiation at this juncture; notwithstanding Wailand raised his price, and demanded peremptorily five thousand pounds of silver, which the king, with great difficulty, raised and gave him. In consequence of this subsidy, he, with a fleet of two hundred and sixty sail, came up the Seine, and attacked the Normans in the island of Oiselle, who, after a long and obstinate resistance, were compelled to capitulate; and having paid six thousand pounds of gold and silver, by way of ransom, had leave to go e and join those who had reduced them^s. This produced a new mischief, for they still shewed no inclination to depart; and the king, insensible of the miseries to which his subjects were exposed, employed all his thoughts on the base project he had formed of despoiling his nephew, the king of Provence, a weak and infirm prince, of his dominions, in which, however, he failed; and then thought, by denying it, to deceive the world, in which he had as little success. At his return, he attempted and executed a scheme he had formed against the Normans, whom he reduced to such distress, that they were forced to capitulate, and give him hostages to depart the kingdom^t.

The restless humour and ill conduct of their children, exceeding vexatious to the French monarch.

THEY executed this treaty but indifferently, since a great part of them entered into the service of the king of Bretagne. Upon this Charles, by the advice of count Robert, recalled f Wailand, and for six thousand pounds in gold engaged him and his followers to enter into his service. Count Robert had likewise the good fortune to defeat the Normans, in the service of the king of Bretagne, sinking twelve of their ships, and putting all who were on board them to the sword. These successes might have put it in the king's power to have restored his authority, and his affairs; but now the troubles in his family began. His daughter Judith had espoused Ethelwolf, king of the West Saxons; and, after his decease, to the scandal of all the Christian world, she became the wife of his eldest son Ethelbald; and he being also dead, she returned to the court of her father, still a young woman, and full of amorous inclinations^u. This put her upon running away with Baldwin, forrester of Flanders, with a the privity of her eldest brother Lewis. This drew the displeasure of the king both upon her and the prince, who thereupon fled into Bretagne, where he married without his father's consent, in which he was imitated by his brother Charles, king of Aquitaine. In these misfortunes he was not alone; his brother Lewis the German, being rather more perplexed by A. D. 863. his son Carloman, who revolted and submitted several times^w, but not without creating great prejudices to the realm of Germany, and the French empire^x.

THE affair of the king of Lorraine broke out again with fresh violence: he caused one assembly of bishops to be held at Aix la Chapelle, in which the archbishops of Cologne and Treves presided; and, having procured their consent, he wrote to the pope to approve his marriage with Walrade, which he took care to solemnize before he received an answer^y. The pope, Nicholas I. sent two legates to hold a council at Metz, in which this affair was to be finally determined; and, in their passage through France, they delivered Charles the Bald a letter from the pope, intreating him to pardon Baldwin and his daughter, which he did; and the marriage being celebrated, he bestowed upon his son-in-law the county of Flanders^z. These legates had other letters also to deliver, which they suppressed, being corrupted by the king of Lorraine. In consequence of this, they confirmed all that had been done in the assembly at Aix la Chapelle, and, in hopes of deceiving the pope, the archbishops of Cologne and Treves were sent to make a report to him of the whole business^a. He was previously informed by Charles the Bald, and was so much provoked, that, by a council held at Rome, the council of Metz was declared a wicked assembly, and both the archbishops deposed^b. These prelates fled to the emperor, and gave him such an account of the matter, that he went to Rome with a body of troops, entered it in a hostile manner, and kept the pope shut up in the church of St. Peter forty-eight hours, without meat or drink. At length he was so far pacified as to admit of an interview, in which, being informed of the truth, he ordered the two prelates to quit his dominions immediately^c. About this time died Charles, king of Provence; and, after some disturbance, the emperor and the king of Lorraine divided his dominions between them. Charles the Bald, being now somewhat at ease, obliged the king of Bretagne to do him homage; after which he marched with a great army into Aquitaine, and compelled his son Charles to submission. The Normans in the mean time, with Pepin at their head, penetrated as far as Clermont, in Auvergne, from whence, though with some difficulty, they made their retreat to the coast; in which, however, Pepin was taken, and carried to his uncle. As he was in the habit of a Norman, and there were some suspicions of his having apostatized, the nobility and prelates of Aquitaine made no scruple of condemning him to death. His uncle, however, sent him to the castle of Senlis, where he spent the remainder of his days under a gentle confinement^d. His successor Charles, king of Aquitaine, being in his father's court, involved himself in some foolish quarrel, in which receiving a cut over the head, he languished for some time, and then died, leaving behind a very indifferent reputation, and no issue by the widow he married^e.

THE Normans, notwithstanding their repeated treaties, and the vast sums of money which they had received, continued to make descents perpetually in the territories of France, sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, which gave the king inexpressible trouble. Some times he repelled force by force; at others he was constrained to procure their departure, by paying them large sums of money, which differed little from tribute; by which the kingdom was at length so exhausted, that, having engaged to pay them four thousand pounds in silver, he was compelled to have recourse to a capitation in order to levy it. What was still a heavier misfortune both to him and to the nation, was the death of Robert le Fort, who, with two other generals, fell in an engagement with the Danes^f. The king had married his second wife, by whom he had several children, but they died young. He was very desirous to have her publicly crowned, from a superstitious opinion; that the children he might have by her afterwards would survive. This ceremony was accordingly performed; and the king being apprehensive that it might increase the discontent of his eldest son, Lewis, whose continual intrigues with the king of Bretagne had given him excessive trouble, he resolved, once for all, to try if it was not possible to content both. With this view he declared Lewis king of Aquitaine, in the room of his brother, with which both the prince and the people were equally pleased; and he consented that the county of Contentein should be incorporated, and for ever annexed to Bretagne^g. It had been happy for him and his subjects, if all his designs had been as just in their nature, and as fortunate in their issue, as these; for both the kings remained perfectly satisfied with these concessions, and engaged, whenever the circumstances of his affairs should require it, to second him against his enemies, A. each of them with a certain corps of troops, which was a point of great consequence to his government, and contributed not a little to the repose of France^a.

The king of Lorraine makes a journey to Rome; dies in his return; dispute about his succession.

THE case of the king of Lorraine was by this time become of the last importance. Lothaire flattered himself, that pope Adrian would treat him with more tenderness than his predecessor had done, notwithstanding the discoveries that had been made by the archbishops of Cologne and Treves, who being abandoned by the king, after all they had done, went to Rome, and laid open all that scene of corruption and perjury in which they had been partakersⁱ. It seems indeed to have been the pope's intention; who, having commanded him to put away his mistress, to take an oath to have nothing more to do with her, and to engage twelve of his principal nobility to support this oath by their own, encouraged him to come to Rome, in order to receive absolution^k. This did not, by any means, please his uncle; who, in case the sentence of excommunication had been pronounced, would infallibly have dispossessed him of his dominions: and, in order to settle the method of division among themselves, the two kings of Germany and France had an interview at Metz, where the matter was entirely settled between them. This coming to the ears of Lothaire, heightened his uneasiness exceedingly. He applied himself, therefore, with great assiduity, to obtain the good-will of his uncle, Lewis the German, upon whose word he could better rely than upon that of Charles: and after several interviews, and laying before him the difficulties he was under, he carried his point, inasmuch that he promised, not only to make no attempts upon his dominions in his absence, but likewise to protect his son Hugh, whom he had by Waldrade; and even restored to him the county of Alsace, which he had yielded some years before, and agreed that it should be erected into a duchy in favour of that young prince^l. In confidence that his uncle would perform his promise, Lothaire proceeded in his voyage to Italy, where his brother the emperor declined seeing him; but he sent his consort to meet him, who accompanied him to his interview with the pope^m. Adrian gave him hopes, celebrated mass in his presence; and, when they came to communicate, purged him, and the lords who were with him, as to the oath they had formerly taken. Lothaire, and the greatest part of his attendants, communicated; though some, upon hearing the pope's exhortation, drew backⁿ. Adrian intended to have had the whole affair examined over again by the bishops of Lorraine and Germany, and, upon their report to a council which was to have been held at Rome, to have decided which was the king's lawful spouse; for, in the second cause before the pope's legates, Lothaire had affirmed, that he had married Waldrade before he espoused Theutberg^o. But there was no occasion for these proceedings, since, in his return to his dominions, Lothaire died of a fever at Placentia, on the 7th of August. It was generally believed that he was himself perjured, and that the lords who communicated with him knew it. They all died in a very short space, and he did not survive them a full month. By the demise of this prince, without lawful issue, the succession to his dominions lay open; but Charles of France, who had an army ready to march, and withal a very strong party in Lorraine entered and took possession immediately: and having been solemnly crowned at Metz, looked upon this realm as his own, notwithstanding the pope interfered in favour of the emperor, who, as the brother of the deceased, seemed to have the best right, and notwithstanding the king of Germany insisted on his claim. But, when the latter had prepared to assert it by arms, Charles consented to a division; which took place in the succeeding year^p, by which the flames of war were kept from breaking out.

The treaty of partition between the kings of France and Germany, as to the kingdom of Lorraine.

It was judged necessary, in order to this, that the two kings should have an interview; and with this view Charles went to Herstal, and Lewis came to Mersen, and from thence each advanced to a royal palace, at an equal distance from both places, and, after a month's time spent in conferences, the business was amicably settled^q. Lewis obtained, by this partition, the cities of Cologne, Utrecht, Strasbourg, Basil, Treves, Metz, and their dependencies, with all the countries between the rivers Ourt and Meuse, together with Aix la Chapelle, and most of the districts between the Rhine and Meuse. On the other hand, Charles acquired Lyons, Besancon, Vienne, Tongres, Toul, Verdun, Cambray, Viviers, and Uzes, together with Hainbault, Zealand, and Holland^r. The pope still interposed very warmly, and left no method untried to have procured at least something for the emperor, if it had been in his power; but it was to no purpose, at least with regard to Charles, who, when he found the pontif grew very angry, and treated him but very coarsely in his letters, laid them aside, without giving the pope any answer^s. His son Carloman, whom he had put into orders, but whom, notwithstanding, he had suffered to command his forces more than once, having no inclination to that course of life to which he had been destined by his father, left the court^t, and putting a himself at the head of a body of desperate thieves, committed horrid devastations in the country between the Meuse and the Seine, which gave the king great disquiet, and the more, because all the promises of pardon he could make were vain, and without effect^u.

POPE Adrian being misinformed, or not having sagacity enough to make a right judgment of affairs, interposed in this business also^w. For the king, taking advantage of Carloman's being in orders, resolved to prosecute him by church censures, but first procured the bishops in his dominions to excommunicate those who had seduced his son into rebellion, or who supported and assisted him therein; and Hincmar, bishop of Laon, having refused to sign the excommunication, was also proceeded against in the same way, and at length Carloman himself, who thereupon applied to the pope; and he writing in a very rough stile to Charles, gave him an opportunity of shewing him in a very contemptible light to posterity. The circumstances of the French monarch were very much changed^x. In the beginning of his reign he courted equally the nobility and the bishops; afterwards, being abandoned by the former, he cajoled the latter, and it was chiefly by the help of their authority that he had emerged from his troubles: but now his power and his experience being greater, he answered the pope with great spirit and good sense, reproached him for the indecent language he had used, and made him so sensible of the rashness of his conduct, that he found it necessary to pen a recantation, which, no doubt, he flattered himself would be kept a secret; and with which posterity being acquainted, is from thence enabled to form a right judgment of the piety and policy of the court of Rome^y. He went farther: from affecting to dictate to Charles, he became his creature; and, in hopes of raising his own family, promised all the assistance possible in promoting his design of assuming the imperial dignity, and taking possession of the kingdom of Italy, in case of his nephew's demise^z. The empress, in the mean time, was negotiating on the same subject with Lewis, king of Germany, and engaged him to make a cession, by treaty, of that part of the kingdom of Lorraine which he possessed, in consideration of the emperor's devolving that title and his dominions, by will, either upon him or on one of his sons. Adrian, in consequence of this treaty, solemnly crowned the emperor as king of Lorraine; but it is not clear that he ever had the possession: and the pope, notwithstanding this ceremony, remained firm in the interests of Charles the Bald to the time of his demise, which happened not long after^a.

The pope is obliged to bend to Charles and promise him his assistance in obtaining the empire.

d THE realms of Germany and France were equally disturbed by the ambition and selfishness of the sons of Lewis and Charles, and by the incursions of the Normans. Lewis had but three sons, and two of them were in rebellion. Carloman was in arms against Charles, and against the peace and property of his subjects, spoiling, killing, and burning, wherever he came^b. The different characters of these kings appeared from the manner they took to deliver themselves from these misfortunes. Lewis prevailed upon his sons to return to court, upon his bare promise that they should not be punished; and, having shewn them how little it was their interest to act in the manner they had done, and what good effects would follow from their returning to their duty, and living in harmony with each other, he reclaimed them as he had done his eldest son formerly, and found them ever after both faithful and obedient^c.

e In like manner he compromised matters with the Normans, and turned their incursions upon his enemies^d. Charles, on the other hand, after much forbearance and indulgence, abandoned Carloman to the justice due to his subjects; so that being taken and condemned to death, he ordered his eyes to be put out, and then sent him to a prison, from whence escaping, he fled to his uncle the king of Germany, who gave him protection and subsistence, and nothing more, till, in a short time, death delivered him from all his troubles^e. In respect to the Normans, Charles had so obliged Solomon, whom he stiled duke, though the pope and other princes treated him as king of Bretagne, by sending him a very rich crown, that he very readily concurred in the proposal made him of attacking those dangerous invaders. This enabled the king to besiege them in Angiers, which made a long and obstinate defence; and which certainly had not been taken at last, but by the address of the duke of Bretagne, who having reduced them to extremity, Charles admitted them to a capitulation, and, for a large sum of money, suffered them to preserve their ships, which the duke would otherwise have destroyed^f. In the succeeding year, this powerful prince, who had governed his country with much reputation, and seemed in all respects (but the manner in which he acquired it, that is, by the murder of his sovereign and relation) to deserve the regal dignity, to which he aspired, became himself the victim of a conspiracy formed by his own subjects, in conjunction with some French lords^g. This threw the country of Bretagne into dreadful dissensions, which it took some time to appease; and while these troubles continued, the emperor Lewis II. died, in the month of August, without having issue male, which occasioned a great struggle^h.

Charles the Bald enters Italy with an army, and receiving Carlo-man, marches directly to Rome.

LEWIS, king of Germany, claimed the title of emperor, as the elder brother of Charles; for, in respect to the deceased, they were uncles alike. He relied upon the intrigues of the empress, the good-will of the Greek emperor Basil, and had some hopes of the pope *John VIII*¹. Charles the Bald took his measures somewhat better, for he relied chiefly on himself. As soon as he had the news of his nephew's death, he sent his only son Lewis into Lorraine, to assemble an army on the frontiers of that kingdom; and at the same time he began to march with the forces, that he had long held ready for that purpose, into *Italy*². King Lewis sent his son Charles thither, with a small body, of troops; and, upon the news of his brother's expedition, dispatched his son Carloman after him, with a considerable reinforcement. Carloman beat the French troops that guarded the passages, entered Italy, and, though his army was much inferior to his uncle's, would have hazarded a battle. It was a maxim with Charles the Bald not to fight if it might be avoided: he therefore dispatched some ministers, in the first place, to sound the pope, and then proposed to his nephew, that both armies should retire till the dispute could be amicably settled between him and his father³. Carloman accepted the proposition, and executed his part of it punctually; but Charles, in consequence of his message, having received a message from the pope, pretended he was bound in conscience to comply with it; and, while Carloman was returning into Germany, marched directly to Rome, where he was received with applause, and on Christmas-day received the imperial crown from the hands of the pontif. This affair was very expensive, but Charles took care that it should cost him nothing; for the first act of his imperial power was to seize his predecessor's treasures, and out of them he gratified those who had been instrumental in this business⁴.

The death of Lewis, king of Germany, division of his dominions, and fruitless attempt of Charles the Bald.

AT the opening of the succeeding year, the emperor sent to Pavia, and held there an assembly of the states of Lombardy, in which he received the homage and oaths of fidelity of all the prelates and great lords in that kingdom. There was, however, one thing that made him still uneasy; his nephew and predecessor had left an only daughter in the care of the duke of Frioul, and he was very apprehensive, that some Greek prince, by espousing her, might set up a title to the kingdom of Italy at least; and, to prevent this, he could think of no better expedient than to advise Boson, whose sister he had married, to carry away this young princess, and espouse her by force⁵. This done, he affected to be exceedingly displeased with the ravisher, and to threaten him with the severest punishment; but, as soon as he perceived that the action was not so ill taken as he expected, he suffered himself to be appeased; and, that his brother-in-law might in some measure appear worthy of so illustrious a consort, he created him duke of Lombardy, and left him his viceroy in *Italy*⁶. In the mean time, Lewis, king of Germany, had invaded France in his absence, penetrated as far as Champagne, and had committed divers devastations; but hearing that Charles was returning from Italy with a great army, and that the pope was unalterably attached to his interest, he retired into his own dominions; where he continued to make great military preparations, tho' at the same time he did not neglect to make overtures of accommodation⁷. His new title had a great effect on the mind of Charles the Bald; he appeared almost always in the Greek habit, and with the ensigns of imperial dignity; treated his subjects, ecclesiastics as well as laics, with great haughtiness; and, in conjunction with the pope, sought to lessen the authority of the prelates in his dominions, though he had more than once stood indebted to them for the preservation of his own⁸. By the accession of Italy to the rest of his dominions, he was certainly become more powerful than his brother Lewis; yet he was very apprehensive of being attacked by that prince, who was not only an able statesman and a great general, but had also a strong party amongst the French nobility. However, he was delivered from all these fears by the death of that monarch; who, of all the descendants of Charlemagne, resembled him most. His dominions, in pursuance of a partition made four years before in a general dyet, were divided in the following manner; Carloman had Bavaria, Bohemia, Carinthia, Sclavonia, Austria, and part of Hungary; Franconia, Saxony, Frisia, Thuringia, the lower Lorraine, together with Cologne, and the cities on the Rhine, fell to Lewis; and all the country between the Maine and the Alps was the lot of Charles. In modern history, Carloman is generally stiled king of Bavaria, Lewis of Germany, and Charles the Gross, or the Fat, of *Almain*⁹. The emperor had no sooner intelligence of this, than, supposing that these brethren would fall out amongst themselves, he marched with a great army, in order to seize that part of Lorraine which he had yielded to his brother, and which he pretended ought to revert to him upon his decease. The scheme was well imagined, but the emperor found himself mistaken; the brothers lived in perfect unity, and though Lewis, king of Germany, sent ambassadors to intreat his uncle not to attack his dominions, yet he passed the Rhine at a the same time with an army to offer battle. Charles the Bald had fifty thousand men, his nephew was far inferior in number; but having caused the village that was before his camp to be occupied by a great body of infantry, who made an obstinate defence, and, when they were at last forced, Charles thought the victory secure; but as his forces advanced in much disorder, Lewis attacked them in flank with his cavalry, and defeated them totally with great carnage. This loss, and the news that the Normans were come up the Seine with a numerous fleet, and a great body of troops on board, obliged Charles to turn his eyes on that side, and to leave his nephews quiet. These disappointments affected him so much, that he fell dangerously ill, and was, with great difficulty, recovered.

b THE pope being at this time beset with enemies, and depending solely on the emperor's protection, pressed him vehemently to enter Italy with an army, though he knew he was but just recovered from a pleurisy, which had brought him to the very brink of the grave. Charles, whose interests were closely connected with those of the pontif, yielded to his intreaties. But before he left France, he held, in the month of July, an assembly of the nobility and prelates, to concert the proper measures for the defence of his dominions, and for the maintenance of their tranquillity in his absence. He made choice of his only son Lewis for regent, and fixed a proper council about him. He gave the command of his numerous army to duke Boson, his empress's brother, abbot Hugo, Bernard count of Auvergne, and Bernard marquis of Languedoc; when he had done this, he set out with the empress, who had a most magnificent equipage, and, with a small corps of troops, which ought rather to be esteemed an escorte than an army, passed the Alps, and marched directly towards Rome. The pope, to shew his affection, came as far as Pavia to meet him; but they had scarce conferred together before they had news that Carloman, king of Bavaria, had entered Italy with a very numerous army, claiming the imperial dignity and the kingdom of Italy, in virtue of the late emperor's will. Upon this the emperor Charles repassed the Po, and returned to Tortona, where the pope crowned the empress. The design of Charles was to wait for his army; but the four lords, who commanded it, entered into a conspiracy, and refused to pass the Alps; and on this news the empress retired to Morienne, and the pope fled to Rome. In the present critical juncture of affairs, the emperor judged it most expedient to return into France; and, what is very extraordinary, his nephew Carloman, on a false rumour that all the French forces had passed the mountains, retired precipitately into his own dominions. Charles, having joined the empress at Morienne, felt a return of his distemper, notwithstanding which he prosecuted his retreat; but a Jew physician, whose name was Zedeckias, having given him poison, he felt himself so ill that he was obliged to stop at a village called Brios; where the empress found him in a miserable cottage, and where he breathed his last, on the sixth of October, in the second year of his empire, the thirty-eighth of his reign, and the fifty-fourth of his age. His body was embalmed, with an intent to carry it to the abbey of St. Denis; but the poison he had taken corrupted it in such a manner, that they were forced to inter it by the way: however his bones were afterwards carried thither, or at least it is certain, that a tomb erected to his memory is extant in that convent. He appointed, by an instrument, his only son his successor, and sent him by the empress his crown, his sword, and other ensigns, as well of the imperial as regal dignity, in token of his desire that he should possess both (C).

(C) In the reign of Charles the Bald, there were many excellent laws made for the government of the church and state; but he wanted attention, and perhaps he wanted authority, to carry them thoroughly into execution. In his reign they began in France to date according to that which is styled the Christian æra. He held frequent councils, and was present in them himself (1). Before he became emperor he was a zealous defender of the episcopal rights; he grew afterwards more complaisant to the pope, and suffered his legates to give law, even in his presence, to the prelates of France (2). He compelled them also to acknowledge Ansegise, archbishop of Sens, in quality of primate of the Gauls, and of Germany; which lost him his old servant Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, who opposed this stretch of papal power with great vigour and steadiness. Charles, however, had one great point in his favour, the practice of translations; that is, removing a bishop from one see to another was coming into use, and he knew perfectly well how to avail himself of such advantages (3). He became, in the latter part of his life a great politician, and by a variety of methods both raised and secured his authority, at the expence, however, of being generally hated by his subjects of all ranks. His first consort was Hermentrude, by whom he had four sons and one daughter; that princess herself being the daughter of Eudes, count of Orleans: of his eldest son Lewis we shall

As soon as Lewis, the son of the deceased emperor, who, from an impediment in his speech, had the surname of Stammerer, received the news of his death, he left the frontiers, in order to meet the empress, and the great lords who came out of Italy, at St. Denis. As he was sensible of the exorbitant power of the nobility and clergy, he thought to secure the tranquility of his reign, by attaching to his interest such as were about his person; and therefore he distributed lands, honours, governments, abbies, and other preferments, with a profusion that evidently discovered his fear, much more than his affection for those on whom he bestowed them^a. But for certain causes, with which he was acquainted on the road, he turned aside to Compeigne. The empress, on her return from Italy, joined with the malecontents, who affected to make it a crime in Lewis that he had given away so many posts before he was inaugurated; but the real offence was, that they were afraid of not having their share; however, after mature deliberation, they held it the best expedient to come in and take what was left^b. Accordingly the empress delivered up the instrument and the ensigns of royalty, which had been committed to her care; and, in the beginning of December the king was crowned, by Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims^c. The pope made as great a stand as he was able in favour of the new king, in hopes of having him elected in the place of his father; but being opposed by the duke of Spoletto, and the marquis of Tuscany, he abandoned Rome, and went by sea into France. He was received there with all possible respect, and, on the thirteenth of August, opened a council at Troies, where many canons were made in support of the episcopal power; the first of them is too remarkable to be passed over in silence: all secular powers are commanded, under pain of excommunication, to pay bishops proper respects, and all persons, of what dignity soever, are forbid to sit in their presence without their permission^d. At the request of the king, the pope crowned him with his own hands; but those historians, who say he was now crowned emperor, are certainly mistaken, since neither in the charter which he granted, or in the addresses that were made to him after this time, is he ever so stiled^e. But the pope absolutely refused to crown his consort Adelaide, for reasons that the reader will see at the bottom of the page (D).

speak hereafter. Charles he declared king of Aquitaine, and tho' he died very young, yet it was not before he shewed himself undutiful, and in a great measure unworthy of the honour conferred upon him. Lothaire became an abbot. Carloman was forced to receive deacon's orders; was of a vicious headstrong disposition, and, as we have shewn in the text, gave occasion, by his frequent rebellions, for his father to punish him with the loss of his sight and imprisonment; but, by the assistance of two monks, made his escape, blind as he was, and died in the dominions of his uncle (4). His daughter Judith had none of the fairest characters. She became first mother-in-law, and then sister-in-law, to our famous king Alfred (5). Afterwards, returning to her father's court, she ran away with Baldwin, the forrester; and being reconciled to the king, by the interposition of the pope, he was created count of Flanders (6). His second consort was Richilde, the sister of count Boson, a very artful woman, who had a great influence over him as long as he lived; and, after his decease, joined with her brother, and the rest of the malecontents, though they had procured a Jew physician to poison her husband. By this princess Charles had four sons; but none of them survived him (7). The empress, seven years after his decease, caused the remains of Charles to be removed, as some historians say, to the abbey of St. Denis; which we mention, because of the reason assigned, that he was once abbot there (8). The popes, in writing to him, stiled Charles the most Christian king; which form they had also used to his ancestor Pepin (9). We are not informed, that the Jew who poisoned him was punished; which renders it probable that he was protected by the faction by whom he was employed.

(D) Lewis had probably an education suitable to his birth; but we do not find him celebrated for his abilities.

The family of Charlemagne declined apace. Lewis, while a young man, was too much under the dominion of his passions, which led him not only to countenance his sister Judith, after she had been twice a queen, in running away with an adventurer, but also made a very idle match himself with Ansgarde, the daughter of one count and the widow of another, but we know not the names of either; with which his father was so much offended, that he would not be reconciled to him till he parted with her, and, in all probability, disavowed the marriage; which drew into controversy the legality of the births of Lewis and Carloman, who nevertheless succeeded him. He married a second time Adelaide, or Alex, an English lady, the sister of Wilfrid, abbot of Flavigny; but it is supposed that Ansgarde was still living, when the pope crowned king Lewis, and refused to crown her, as doubting of the validity of their marriage; but, concerning this, there is somewhat more to be said. Both the *Tillet*s, that is, John du Tillet, secretary to the parliament of Paris, who wrote the Inventory of the kings of France, and his brother John du Tillet, bishop of Meaux, who, from antient authors, composed a chronicle of the kings of France, affirm, that Lewis was crowned emperor by the pope, in which they are followed by Dupleix, Mezeray, and other historians, and by us, in the title of this section, that it may correspond with other histories of France. Yet, as we hinted in the text, this notion appears to be false, for the reasons there assigned. We will add, that, in a very antient chronicle, and of the greatest authority, we find something that confirms this; for we are told, that two bishops presented to the pope, in council, letters written by Charles the Bald, in which he nominated his son his successor, and, by way of investiture, sent him the sword of St. Peter; whence they inferred, that the kingdom mentioned was that of Italy, and the sword

- a The truth is, the pope found the king's power very much weakened, and therefore he entered into a close friendship with duke Boson, who had married Hermenigard, daughter to the emperor Lewis the second, and who conducted him back to Pavia; in the progress of which journey the pope permitted him to use his utmost endeavours to prevent Carloman's getting possession of the kingdom of Italy. Before his departure he so far gratified the king, as to excommunicate some lords who were in rebellion; but without any great effect^f. After he was gone, the king wrote to his cousin Lewis of Germany, assuring him of his sincere desire to live in perfect friendship with him and his brethren; and, upon receiving assurances of the same kind from him, the two kings had an interview in the month of November, in which they concluded a treaty for their mutual benefit; and, which rarely happens amongst princes, parted as good friends as they met, and perfectly satisfied of the rectitude of each other's intentions^g.

- It was, among other things, stipulated at this interview, that a general assembly should be held in the month of February following; to which Charles and Carloman, as well as the king of Germany, were to send their ambassadors; but this was prevented by the rebellion of the marquis of Languedoc, who, notwithstanding the excommunication pronounced against him by the pope in the council of Troies, and the king's having disposed of all his places and governments to other persons, not only maintained himself in the possession of Languedoc, but made excursions also into the adjacent provinces^h. To suppress these disorders, the king marched with all the forces he could draw together, taking his route through Burgundy; but when he arrived at Troies he fell dangerously ill: he caused himself to be removed from thence to Compeigne, where finding all hopes of recovery vain, he committed his sword and crown to the care of two of his counsellors, with instructions to carry them, without delay, to his son *Lewis*ⁱ. He departed this life, April the 10th, which was Good Friday, after a reign of about eighteen months^k. He was, beyond doubt, a prince of weak parts and great infirmities. At his demise, he left his dominions in confusion, and for his heirs two sons by his first consort, and his second, queen Adelaide, pregnant, who, some time after his decease, was delivered of a son, baptized by the name of Charles.

- THERE followed upon the death of Lewis the Stammerer a kind of interregnum, occasioned by the weakness of the government, and the factions of the great. The deceased king had intrusted the care of his sons to four great lords, some of whom had not shewn themselves very well affected to his father: these were duke Boson, his father's brother-in-law, a man of great art and abilities, which were all employed to gratify the ambition he had of becoming a sovereign prince; the second was Hugo, sometimes stiled the abbot Hugo, and sometimes Hugo l'Abbé, or Hugo the Abbot. It seems very clear that he was first intended for the church; but, betaking himself to arms before he had received orders, he altered his views, and turned that into a surname, which was before a mark of dignity. He was an ambitious and designing man, but had more respect to his character than most persons of his rank, being the grandson of the famous Robert le Fort, count of France. The third lord was Thierry, the king's chamberlain, who was attached to the late king's family, but from views of interest; and the fourth, Bernard count of Auvergne, of whom we know nothing particularly^l. Boson and Thierry quarrelled about the county of Autun, which the former wanted to serve his purposes, and which the king had given to the latter. Hugo l'Abbé, with some difficulty, reconciled them: in the mean time abbot Goslin, who had been a favourite, and much intrusted by Lewis, had formed another project, and drew into it Conrade, count of Paris, and several other lords. His pretences were the prosperity of France, and the glory of Charlemagne's family; and the expedient he offered was to set aside the children of Lewis, and to offer the crown to the king of Germany^m. In order to carry this into execution, while the other lords were assembled at Meaux, they had a meeting at Creil, where they came to a resolution to invite Lewis of Germany, in the name of the nobility and prelates of France, to become their sovereign; which proposition he accepted, notwithstanding the treaty he had signed and sworn to the father of the princes he was to set aside. The news of this amazed the lords at Meaux, who very probably had acquiesced under it, if Hugo l'Abbé had not bethought himself of proposing to the king of Germany, who was now in full march for France with an army, to yield to him that part of Lorraine which had been possessed by the two last kings; which acquisition appeared a mark of the imperial dignity. This was so much the more probable, as Charles himself, though so fond of coronations, was never crowned king of France. But the pope paid no regard to this, and we are told the reason: he likewise produced a paper written by Charles the Bald, in which he promised him the abbey of St. Denis, which he desired Lewis to confirm; and, as the king declined this, the pope did not think fit to do the other. So early, it seems, it became a maxim at Rome not to do any thing for nothing.

to him so considerable, that he readily accepted it^a. But the abbe Goslin, and his faction, a finding themselves abandoned, applied to the queen Lutgarde, a woman of boundless ambition, who promised them her protection, and her interest with the king, to induce him to pay no greater regard to the new treaty than he had done to his old one. At this time died Conrade, king of Bavaria, one of the bravest, wisest, and most equitable princes of that age^o. He left only a natural son Arnold, to whom he gave Carinthia and Tyrol; the rest of his dominions he shared between his brothers, Lewis having Bavaria, and Charles the Gross the kingdom of Italy^p.

Lewis and

The assembly of Meaux, in the mean time, resolved to crown both the sons of their deceased king, though he had explained his intention to be that Lewis only should succeed him; but duke Boson had married his daughter to Carloman, and, next to another great design b he had in his head, he was desirous of seeing her a queen^a. This scheme was managed by his emissaries, so that he appeared to have no hand in it, till it came to the execution. Boson, in his government of the southern parts of France, had rendered himself very acceptable to the clergy; he had also a great interest with the pope, and had behaved very obligingly to the nobility. Three archbishops, twenty bishops, and a great number of counts, assembled at the town of Mante; where, taking into consideration the confusions and calamities of France, they judged it expedient to erect a new kingdom, that might remain happy through the superior wisdom and equity of its monarch; which kingdom was that of Provence; and this incomparable prince Boson, to whom, by a solemn instrument subscribed by them all, they offered the crown, and he very graciously, and with many expressions of gratitude and c humility, accepted it^r. It appears from their subscriptions, that this new kingdom was composed of the countries now stiled Lyonnois, Dauphiny, Savoy, Franche Comté, and part of the kingdom of Burgundy, extending on one side into Languedoc, and on the other beyond the lake of Geneva, and was sometimes called, from its capital, the kingdom of Arles^s. Thus the two young kings found themselves despoiled of countries of a vast extent on each side of the dominions that were left them. Hugo, who had now the sole conduct of these princes, carried them, under an escorte of a small body of troops, as far as the lake of Geneva, to confer with Charles, king of Almain and Italy; who treated them very kindly, and promised them all the assistance in his power. Upon their return they found the king of d Germany, with a considerable army, almost in the heart of their own dominions; though, in some measure, forced into it by the solicitations of his queen, and partly by the importunity of the malecontents, who were not able to perform near so much as they promised; and therefore the king willingly listened to the proposal of an interview, where all things were amicably settled, and a congress appointed in the month of June, at Gondreville on the Meuse, at which all the descendants from Charlemagne were to assist^t. Charles came thither on purpose from Italy; Lewis and Carloman were likewise there; and the king of Germany sent deputies, being himself indisposed. There the two young kings made a solemn resignation of their rights to Lorraine and the kingdom of Italy, in consequence of which the other two monarchs promised them assistance against all their enemies; and the king of Germany actually furnished e them with an army to dispossess Hugo, the bastard of Lothaire, who had seized several strong places in Lorraine. This done, they marched through Burgundy to the territories of Boson, where the army was joined by a reinforcement, under the command of Charles le Gros, who directed the siege of Macon in person; and, after having reduced it, formed that of Vienne, in which was Hermingard, the consort of Boson, whose presence engaged the garrison to make an obstinate defence. Charles was obliged to leave the army to go to Rome, where Christmas-day had been fixed upon for crowning him emperor, and the two young kings were, not long after, obliged to separate; Lewis, who was stiled king of France, marching against the Normans, and Carloman, king of Aquitaine, remaining before the place to command the f siege^u.

THE great merit of the two kings consisted in their cordial affection for each other, and f which manifestly appeared in the sorrow they expressed at parting. Lewis gave the Normans battle at a place called Sacour; was so fortunate as to defeat them, and to kill near nine thousand of their men^w. It is, however, certain, that he did not prosecute this victory; for which he is much blamed by some, though others say, that his forces were so much weakened by that engagement, that he durst not run the hazard of another^x. The Normans, finding themselves at liberty, and having great advantages from their manner of making war, with horse and foot, and a fleet attending them, ruined all the frontiers of his and the German kingdom, burning towns, villages, castles, and palaces, wherever they came; and, what did

- a not a little augment the confusion, was the death of Lewis, king of Germany, without issue : upon which the inhabitants of Lorraine offered their crown to Lewis of France, who declined it, either through political motives, or, as himself affirmed, out of respect to the late treaty ^y. A. D. 881. Carloman continued all this time before Vienne, having changed his siege into a blockade. Lewis, though he respected the right of Charles le Gros to the kingdom of Lorraine, yet he generously contributed to its defence against the Normans, by sending a good body of troops to their assistance. Immediately after he had made this detachment, he received a strenuous invitation from the duke of Bretagne to join him with his army, in order to act against another body of Normans, with which he immediately complied ; but he had not advanced further than Tours before he felt himself so much indisposed, that he directed those who were
- b about him to convey him to the abbey of St. Denis ; where he died, in the month of August, in the twenty-second year of his age ^z. His actions shew him to have been a brave and equitable prince : some writers, indeed, say, that he was very debauched, and that his excesses proved fatal to him ; but it may be they received this account from some of the great lords, who were very strongly suspected of poisoning him, as they did his father ; so that, probably, if he had been less active, he might have lived longer ^a. 882.

- THE nobility of France went immediately to salute Carloman as their sovereign, and to assure him of their fidelity. He was still before Vienne ; but, at their request, he left the command of the blockade to some of his chief officers, and went to put himself at the head of the forces which his brother had levied to act against the Normans, whom he defeated twice ; but,
- c at length, he was obliged to compound with them for money, finding their strength to be greater than any that he could oppose to them ^b. The price at which he purchased tranquility, or rather a respite of their depredations, was twelve thousand pounds of fine silver. To balance this he had the satisfaction of seeing Vienne surrendered, by capitulation, after a siege of near thirty months, Hermingard being permitted to retire to Autun ^c. Charles le Gros, who came out of Italy into Germany, with an intent to expell or to exterminate the Normans, who had in the same manner wasted his territories, had the like misfortunes as Carloman ; for diseases prevailing in his army, which was very numerous, he thought it best to treat with them ; which he did, and granted one of their chiefs a settlement in his country of Frise, upon his becoming a Christian ^d. Charles and Carloman lived in perfect harmony, and acted jointly
- d against those who were enemies to either of them ; but the young king of France found himself not a little embarrassed by the disobedient and refractory behaviour of some of his nobility ; who, knowing too well that he was unable to reward them to their wish, or to punish them as they deserved, respected his commands no farther than they appeared consistent with their own interests ^e. In time, perhaps, he might have brought his affairs into a better situation ; but, being one day hunting, one of his domestics, throwing a javelin at a boar, wounded him in the thigh, of which he died in seven days ^f. Some say he was wounded by the boar ; but we are told by an antient writer, that this story was only given out by the king himself, to prevent his domestic's suffering for an involuntary fault ; which adds very much to this young prince's character. He deceased on the sixth of September, when he had just entered the sixth
- e year of his reign ^g. He was contracted at least, if not married, to the daughter of duke Boson : it is not very clear whether that marriage was consummated ; but it is very certain that he died without issue ; so that the crown ought to have descended to his brother Charles, then about five years of age ; and there wanted not some who pretended, that his right was prior to that of his two brothers ; whereas some again make it a doubt whether he had any right at all ^h.

- THE family of Charlemagne had been long declining ; the nobility of France were anxious about their own safety, which was very natural and very allowable ; and this made them very wary in the disposal of the government ⁱ. Hugo l'Abbé, who had been hitherto the firm protector of the children of Lewis the Stammerer, exerted himself strenuously in favour of the
- f infant Charles ; but it was to no purpose, the major part of them being devoted to the emperor ^k. At this distance of time their conduct appeared strange, since under a minority it should seem they might have aggrandized themselves more easily than under a prince advanced in years, and who was already very potent ; but very probably they dreaded the advancement of Hugo to the regency, who in that case would have exerted regal power in support of his pupil ^l. The pretences by which they covered their choice were, that the emperor Charles, when declared king of France, would have dominions nearly equal in extent to those of Charlemagne ^m ; without considering, that a great empire is a great weight, and that a prince, who may be able to conduct his affairs while restrained within a certain compass, may notwithstanding a prove very unfit for directing a government of much greater extent; and of this they were convinced by experience; for Charles had governed the countries left him by his father without any visible defect of judgment, had raised himself to the imperial dignity, and had shewed, on several occasions, that he wanted not courage or conduct, and on others, that he was a prince of a mild disposition, and had a great regard to justice and equityⁿ. It was no wonder, therefore, that the French promised themselves much happiness under this reign, or that they should be disappointed^o, since the genius of Charles was of such a kind, as, instead of enlarging itself to the size of that empire to which he gradually attained, it was indeed oppressed, and contracted itself in such a manner, that at length his incapacity became too visible to be disputed^p.

THE emperor was not long in discovering the fault he had committed in granting an establishment to the Normans in Frizeland; for their king Godfrey, who had married the natural daughter of Lothaire, persisted still in his intrigues in favour of her brother Hugo, who had made many attempts on the kingdom of Lorrain. The Normans still continued to harass France; and therefore, when the emperor saw that this king of Frizeland was bent upon a war, he listened to the advice of Henry, duke or governor of Saxony, esteemed the ablest man in his service, and gave him full power to act in this matter, in the manner most advantageous to his government^q. Henry, upon this, entered into a negotiation with the monarch of Frizeland; and, in one of their conferences, encouraged a nobleman, whom he had injured, to cleave his skull with a battle-axe. Soon after this, the bastard Hugo, having been drawn by fair promises into the hands of the emperor's ministers, they caused his eyes to be put out, and shut him up afterwards as a monk in the abbey of Prum, in the forest of Arden^r. These bold strokes ought to have been sustained by a like conduct throughout; but that was beyond the abilities of this prince. The Normans understood this perfectly, and, under pretence of revenging the death of their king Godfrey, came up the river Seine with a fleet of seven hundred sail; and, having taken several places in the neighbourhood, attempted to surprise Paris; but through the prudence of the bishop Goslin, and Eudes, who commanded in the place, they were disappointed; which so enraged them, that, after having blocked up the place for some time, they determined to undertake a regular siege; though, in these kind of military operations, they were far from being able, and had seldom been successful^s.

he came with a fleet and army before Paris, and besiege that place both by land and water.

THE city of Paris, thus besieged, consisted only of that part of the place now so called, which is expressly and particularly stiled the city, built entirely on an island in the Seine, over which were bridges on both sides, the heads of which were well fortified, at least for those times^t. The army of the Normans consisted of about thirty thousand men; they were commanded by Sigefroy, who was fierce and cruel, but not at all deficient in the talents then thought requisite in a general. He sometimes soothed, and sometimes threatened, but was never idle. He ravaged all the adjacent country, not only to amass booty, but to hinder the besieged from receiving any provisions. He employed all the machines that in this age were in use to batter the walls, and open a passage to his troops: he caused several assaults to be given with great fury, but in vain^u. Hugo l'Abbé, then count of Paris, gave his advice in all things, and directed the manner of the defence. Eudes commanded the troops, and by his example encouraged them to behave gallantly on all occasions. The bishop went from place to place, exhorting and consoling the inhabitants: his nephew Ebbon behaved very bravely on all occasions: but, notwithstanding all this, things sunk at last so low, that Eudes was sent to the emperor to solicit relief^v. Upon this, Henry, duke of Saxony, was sent with an army, which, though not strong enough to drive the Normans from before it, enabled him to enter the place, and carry with him considerable succours^w. He afterwards augmented his army, and made an attempt to attack the Normans in their line; but behaving in this with a little too much spirit, or rather too little prudence, his horse and himself fell into a ditch, covered with straw upon hurdles, where he was presently murdered. Upon which his army disbanded, and Paris was left more exposed, and in a worse condition than ever^x.

The emperor goes in person to its relief, and makes a treaty with the Normans.

IN the course of this siege the bishop Goslin departed this life; as did also Hugo l'Abbé, who was succeeded in the title of count of Paris, or rather count of the isle of France, by his nephew Eudes, who continued to make an admirable defence, though the Normans exerted all the arts of fraud and force to carry their point, and were sometimes very near it^y. At length the emperor Charles was exceedingly pressed on all sides to deliver a city of such consequence out of the hands of these barbarians, who were otherwise bent upon fortifying it, and converting it into the capital of that principality which they were so eager to raise in France. With this view he assembled, through the whole extent of his dominions, a prodigious army, with the

- a best part of which he advanced out of Germany, to the relief of Paris; appeared with his whole army under arms on the mountain of Montmart, fully persuaded that, at the sight of his standards, the Normans would retire with precipitation^a. He quickly found his mistake; they continued in their works, and shewed not the smallest disposition of raising the siege. The emperor upon this changed his measures, began a negotiation with them, and, by a pecuniary sacrifice, induced them to promise they would withdraw their troops and their vessels^b. This was in the month of November; and as he was not able to collect the money before the spring, he consented they should take winter quarters in Burgundy, in which country the people had not, as yet, acknowledged his authority. They had some difficulty to open a passage thither; for the Parisians absolutely refused to permit their vessels to sail under their bridges^c. In this situation the Normans found themselves obliged to carry their vessels over land, and launch them again upon the Seine, at a certain distance above Paris; which, when they had done, they proceeded into Burgundy, laid waste and destroyed the country on every side, and amassed, exclusive of the ransom they were to receive, an immense booty in cattle and valuable effects, as well as in money, to the amazement of the whole French nation^d.

- THIS ignominious treaty ruined the reputation of the emperor, which was much declined before. He returned into Germany, indisposed as to his health, and distracted as to his mind. He had no ministers in whom he could confide; for they did not either love or fear him. He had suspicions in his mind about the chastity of his empress Rachael, and this as to Ludard, bishop of Vercell, the only person of weight or authority still remaining in his service, and in this fit of ill humour he forbid him his court, and confined the empress^e. The latter kept no measures; she insisted upon being admitted to her purgation, affirming, that she was not only innocent with respect to that prelate, and every other man, but also that she was untouched by the emperor himself, and a pure virgin; in support of which she was ready to undergo any trial that should be assigned her. The emperor had appointed a diet, as the last resource for settling his affairs; but, falling sick at Tribur, a place between Mentz and Oppenheim, it very quickly appeared that his faculties were quite gone^f. In such a situation, it might naturally be expected that Charles would arise, and that the great lords of the court would be more attentive to their own particular interests than to the miserable state of their languishing prince; but one would scarce imagine that they should be so far lost to compassion and decency, as well as duty, as to forget that he was living and in distress; and yet it so fell out, being so absolutely abandoned, that he would not have had bread to eat, or a servant to attend him in his sickness, if it had not been for the archbishop of Mentz, who, on a principle of charity, generosity, and duty, supplied all^g.

The unfortunate emperor Charles declines at once in mind, body, and estate.

- ARNOLD, the natural son of Carloman, king of Bavaria, upon the deposition of Charles, succeeded him in the imperial dignity, and to his discretion he was left for a subsistence, during the remaining part of his miserable life; and the allowance, at length given him, was in proportion to the necessity he was in, and not at all to the dignity he had possessed, consisting only in the revenues of three or four villages. It is true he made some efforts to recover such of the nobility as owed their grandeur to his favour, in hopes that, by their assistance, he might have risen again into some degree of splendor, more especially as no public step had been taken to his prejudice in France: but finding it to no purpose, and seeing himself scarce the object of jealousy to those who were struggling for and seizing his dominions on every side, he seems to have reconciled himself to his fate, dying in the condition of a private man, on the 14th of January, in the year of our Lord 888^h (E). He was certainly a prince as free

Deserted and decrepid, is found to accept a subsistence from his enemies, and dies in this distress.

(E) In speaking of Lewis the German in the text, we have shewn that this prince, the youngest of his sons, was not exempt from the foolish ambition of that age; but was, at some times, in arms against his father. But whether it arose from penitence, from a melancholy constitution, or from some grievous malady, so it was, that in his youth he fancied he saw the devil, and that he was possessed by him, having, indeed, very grievous convulsions, so that six strong men had much ado to hold him. It is from hence conjectured, that he was never thoroughly cured of this disease; but that the indisposition, with which he was from time to time afflicted, were the relicks of this disorder. He was learned for those times, and very religious, being much given to fasting and prayer, which left him too much in the hands of his minister. By his first consort, with whose name we are not acquainted, he had a son, who died young. He had also a natural son, whose name was Bernard, and for whom he had a great affection. The notion which some have, that he was not king in his own right, but only regent to his cousin Charles the Simple, the posthumous son of Lewis the Stammerer, does not seem to be very well founded, since in the public instruments of this monarch, that are still remaining, he styles himself Rex Francorum et Romanorum: but that he was very ill obeyed, and but very little esteemed, by the French, seems to be true. Yet it does not appear, that the French lords had any hand in deserting or dethroning him, which was chiefly owing to his being attacked, in his return to Germany, by a violent pain in his head, for which he suffered such incisions as are supposed to have affected his understanding. The intrigues of the women also had some share in this business. The widow of Boson, who had assumed the title of king of Arles, pressed him exceedingly to adopt her son Lewis, as being on the mother's side directly descended from Charlemagne, with which

from vices, and as sincerely religious, as any of that age; but wanting genius and application, ^a and being rather inclined to the pleasures of privacy than to the splendid enjoyments of a court, he suffered himself to be guided by such of his ministers as were near him, and to be imposed on by the representations of governors, and other officers, at a distance; so that he had never any right apprehension of the state of his dominions¹. His death threw the kingdom of France into a general consternation, as they were still harrassed by the Normans, oppressed by a kind of independent nobility, who racked their tenants to gratify their avarice and ambition, and without any form of government, or so much as the appearance of it, to which they might resort for protection against foreign invaders or domestic tyrants. It is true they had still the posthumous child of Lewis the Stammerer amongst them; and many affirm that they considered him as the lawful heir of the crown, and Charles the Gross only as his tutor or protector; but ^b of this there is no distinct or uncontroverted proof. On the contrary, it is very plain that the titles of Lewis and Carloman had been called in question, as they had been no better than bastards, because their mother was repudiated; and, notwithstanding this, the title of their younger brother was also questioned, upon a supposition that, if the marriage of their mother was valid, then the mother of Charles was but a concubine, and himself a bastard². Had he been of age, however, and in any degree capable of either conducting a party or an army, these objections had been quickly silenced: as it was, the nation could not be without a king, and therefore the nobility thought it both their interest and their duty to choose one, as we shall see in the next volume.

which he complied: and it may be this gave offence to his sister Hildegard, abbess of Zurich, who was very forward in advising the lords about him to leave him, and to join Arnold, who had taken the title of king of Germany, and to whom the emperor sent his natural son, to procure the best terms for him he could. He continued all this time in a weak and languishing condition; but whether he died of his malady, or of despair, is very uncertain; since some writers intimate, that, both causes acting too slowly, in the opinions of those who wished to see him removed, his death was hastened by a dose of poison; a practice but too frequent in that age, as his competitor experienced in his turn. ~~It does not appear,~~ in this whole affair, that pope Stephen, whom some reckon the fifth, and others the sixth, of that name, interposed in this behalf, though few of the Roman pontiffs have been abler statesmen, or had greater credit: but the intrigues that were then carrying on in Italy, and his connection with some of the principal authors, occupied all his attention, and prevented his expostulating with those who quitted the part of the emperor, because his friends were to be enriched with that monarch's spoils. In the end, however, Rome paid very dear for this kind of trimming policy, and had cause sufficient to regret the protection that had been ever afforded them by the family of Charlemagne.
